

Accessions

Shelf No.

4320.1

V.1.

FROM THE Phillips Fund.

Added May 22, 1865

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2011 with funding from Boston Public Library

<http://www.archive.org/details/indexweeklyjourn01hotz>

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS;

DEVOTED TO THE EXPOSITION OF THE MUTUAL INTERESTS, POLITICAL AND COMMERCIAL, OF GREAT BRITAIN AND THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

4320, 1

VOL. I.

FROM MAY 1ST TO OCTOBER 30TH, 1862.

London:
13, BOUVERIE STREET, FLEET STREET, E.C 1862.

THE INDEX

CONTAINS

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRIVATE LETTERS FROM THE SOUTHERN AND NORTHERN STATES.

LEADERS ON TOPICS OF INTEREST.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

THE COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

REVIEWS OF BOOKS.

CONFEDERATE STATE PAPERS.

MAGAZINE ARTICLES.

GLEANINGS FROM THE NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN PRESS.

SOUTHERN STATISTICS, &c., &c.

Page

218-5

65922

CONTENTS.

	PAGE	FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE (continued)—	PAGE	LEADERS (continued)—	PAGE
Amenities of United States' Congress	223	Havana	6, 86, 117, 213, 358	Garibaldi's Attempted Revolution	268
American Question, the	79	Madrid	22	Italy, Manifesto of the Republicans of	379
„ Confederacies	379	Mobile	85	Intervention—What does it Mean?	57
Arrest of British Subjects in New Orleans	134	Nassau	38	Interference, the Right of	170
Baton Rouge, Fight at	335	New York 5. 38, 53, 164, 180, 196, 213, 230, 260, 277, 293, 307, 325, 341, 356, 373, 388, 404		Law, the Higher	361
Battles of 27th and 28th of June	195	Paris 5, 20, 38, 53, 69, 85, 102, 117, 132, 150, 164, 181, 196, 213, 230, 260, 277, 294, 307, 325, 341, 357, 388, 404		Latest Intelligence, the	248
Butler (Gen.), Letter to the Editor on	127	St. Thomas	54	Last Card of the North, the	233
„ Order for Execution of W. B. Mumford	159	Southern Planter	39	Louisiana Purchase, the	411
„ List of Southern Patriots	350	„ Prospects	54	Mexican Intervention	25, 41
„ Method of Disarming the People of New Orleans	327	Washington 4, 20, 37, 53, 85, 102, 116, 150, 181, 197, 373		Mexico, French Defeat at	122
„ Special Orders of	119, 166	French Defeat in Mexico, Mexican Account of the	127	Mean Whites of the South	201
„ and the French Consul	310	Gaines Mills, Battle of	243	Mediation : A Northern Notion	331
Campbell's (Lord) Motion	230	Governor of Virginia's Proclamation	237	Mason and Dixon's Line	346
Carmichael (Hon. R. B.), Arrest of the	133	„ Louisiana's	238	Maryland, Operations in	360
Circassian, Capture of the	143	Grand Conflict, the	211	Millowners, the : Are they to Blame?	315
CONFEDERATE STATE PAPERS—		Gunboat Fight at Fort Huooger	108	News-making, Federal	26
Messages of President Davis on the Negotiations with the Washington Government, 93, 94, 95, 302		„ Letter from Richmond on	165	New Orleans, Federal Occupation of	40
Summary of Official Report of Campaigns in the West and East in February and March	149	Halleck's (Gen.) Despatches	182	No News	136
Official Report of the Naval Engagement in Hampton Roads	158	Harper's Ferry, Northern Account of the Capture of	367	Neutrality (English), and American Gratitude	267
Official Report of General Morgan's Campaign	318	Hatred of the Negro, the	271	Navy, the, of the Confederate States	344
Official Documents	134, 135	Honour to the Dead and Living	110	Our Name	8
Beauregard's General Order, Corinth	82	Lasley (Mr.) and others, Murder of	246	„ Object	8
Surrender of New Orleans	134	LEADERS—		Pearce, Signs of	41
Confederate Conscription Act	286	Allegiance, Oath of	10	Poor Law, the	42
Letter from Secretary of Navy	47	Army, Condition of the Federal	377	Pacification, an Opportune Moment for	104
Official Report on the Destruction of the Virginia	180	Armies, Ingredients of the Contending	153	President Davis's Message	312
Lee's Order after the Chickahominy Battles	327	„ Position of the Federal	248	Parliament, Prorogation of	152
Confederate Congress, the	22, 302, 388	„ Collapse of the Federal	230	Pickwickian Threats	137
„ Confiscation and Emancipation Bill	230	American Indians	332	Presidential Election, The Last, in the United States	168
„ Cause in Europe, the	255	„ Question, Debate on the	203	Political Parties	58
„ Reprisals, Correspondence on	276	„ Question in the House of Lords	232	Press, the Confederate	362
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—		Abolition Edict, Aspects of the	376	Past, the Errors of the	105
Cotton Prospects	34	Battles, the Recent	120	Productiveness of the South, the	105
Liverpool Letters, 2, 18, 34, 50, 66, 85, 99, 115, 130, 146, 163, 179, 191, 210, 226, 243, 258, 274, 291, 306, 323, 340, 355, 372, 387, 403		Belligerents, Position of the	216	Policy, the Want of a	408
London	82	„ Strength of the	264	Prussian Crisis, the	410
Manchester Letters, 2, 18, 34, 50, 66, 82, 99, 115, 131, 147, 163, 179, 195, 211, 226, 243, 258, 274, 291, 306, 324, 340, 356, 372, 388, 403		British Flag, Continued Insults to the	56	Recognition v. Mediation	120
Cotton	174	Bermuda, Seizure of the	73	„ Europe, England, and the English Government	296
„ Trade,Neill Bros. Circular	70	British Protection	234	Reprisals, their Justice and Duty	282
„ Prospects	34	Cotton Prospects	9, 34	„ Confederate	313
„ Supply, the	343	„ the Supply of American	73	Resources, Federal and Confederate	282
CRUIZE OF THE SUMTER—		„ Famine, the	154	Rebellion or War: the Consequences of a Misnomer	283
Our Confederate Flag on the Sea	11	„ Manufacture and Famine	249	Retaliation, Southern	395
Our First Prize	11	„ Substitutes for	363	Southern Securities	25
Good Hunting Ground	27	„ Supply and India	345	„ Feeling towards England	40
Still on the Spanish Main	27	Consuls, Federal Treatment of Foreign	90	„ Patriotism in Europe	186
No Sport	43	Canada, Defence of	121	State of Europe, the	74
A Sail: Friend or Foe	43	„ Position of, in the American War	200	Seward's Despatch	394
The Trail too Fresh	59	Corinth, Evacuation of	104	South, the, as a Literary Market	89
On the Look Out	59	Confederates—Are they Rebels?	136	„ the: What Constitutes it	344
The Yankee Captain and his Dollars	76	Campaign, the End of the Spring	152	Situation, the: What it Requires	184
Living in Clover	76	„ the Two	251	Slave Power, the	185
Cornered	187	„ in Virginia, the End of the	328	„ Trade, the, and the South	360
The Escape	187	Co-operation	314	„ States, the Westminster on the	393
A Yankee Skipper	204	Continental Money, Assignats and Greenbacks	297	Sheffield Manifesto, the	250
Burning Prizes	205	Delusions of the North	24	Smith, Mr., on England and Canada	300
Capture of the Vigilant and Evan Dodge	218	Diplomacy (French) in America	58	Thanksgiving, National	346
A Cruise in the Western Ocean	235	Decisive Moment, The	217	Union—What does it Mean?	72
At Cadiz	235	Despatch, The, of the 28th of May	265	Veracious Story, a	28
Burning of the Neapolitan	235	Editorials, 10, 26, 42, 58, 74, 106, 123, 139, 171, 204, 234, 252, 269, 333, 348, 364, 379		War, Latest News from the Diplomatic Relations at Washington	63	Disunion, The Undercurrent of	280	„ the, in America	!
District of Columbia, the	396	Disruption of the Union, the Cause of the	314	„ the	!
Extracts from English Papers	71	Duplicity, Northern, before the War	409	„ Who Commenced the „ Southern Papers, 7, 47, 135, 167, 199, 255, 261, 277, 295, 303, 319, 335		Federal Position in the South, the	296	„ News, the	184, 3
Evacuation of Maryland, English Press on	358	Financial Prospects, the	217	„ Features of the	200
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—		Finances, Federal and Confederate	266	„ Extension of the	232
Battle of Shiloh	39	„ Confederate	395	„ Tag of, in the North	264
Berlin	6, 196, 389, 405	Financial Prospects of the United States	138	„ Duration of the	298
Brussels	150	Factory Operatives, The Case of the	299	„ the Fortune of the	329
Charleston	164	„ Folk, the	378	„ a Long	329
Confederate States	85	German Unity	363	West, the	168
		Gladstone on America	392

LEADERS (continued)—	PAGE	PRIVATE LETTERS (continued)—	PAGE	REVIEWS (continued)—	PAGE
West, The Celestial Empire of the	169	Columbus	36	Church in the Army	207
Wheat Trade, the, of Great Britain, France, and America	330	" April 29	84	Short Notices	236
Word with our Readers, a	216	Frankfort-on-Maine	68	Northern View of the American War	252
Lee, General	211	Gainsborough, U.C.	163	Recognition of the Southern Confederation	253
Leech's Sketches	334	Henderson, Kutecky	67	Home and Foreign Review	269
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—		Houston	69	Three Letters from a South Carolinian, relating to Secession, Slavery, and the Trent Case	269
Southern Prospects	30, 45, 54, 78, 109	Liverpool	67	Port and Trade of London	285
Sydney Johnstone, Sketch of	36	Louisville	259	President Jefferson Davis	301
Short War	35	Mobile	3	Discovery of America	317
Present and the Future	48	" April 15	84	Washington Irving	333
Secession from a Northern Point of View	46	" 18, 30	101	Short Notices	334
American Civilization	62	" 30; May 2, 3	116	Southern Statement	349
Diplomatic Relations at Washington	63	" 28	293	Short Notices	350
Remunion: Is it Possible?	63	" July 4	293	Public Life of Lord Macaulay	366
Confederate Gunboats at the Mississippi	78	" 10	307	Blackwood: Ten Days in Richmond	381
European Political Heresies	78	" " "	19	Fraser: the Two Constitutions	382
England and the Confederate States	87	" April 13	20	Novel: a Bad Beginning	382
Bermuda and Circassia	110	" 9	101	Imperialism in France	398
Englishman in the South	102, 133	" 30; May 2, 3, 5, 6, 7	102	Distinction of Races	413
United States and Canada	157	Norfolk	3	America in the Quarterlies	414
Policy of the War, the	158	New Orleans	20	Short Notices	14, 415
Commercial Views on the late Co-partnership of American States	158	" April 2	37	Richardson (I. M.) on the Defence of Cities	260
Algerian Cotton Scheme	173	" March 15, 21, 23; April 4	115	Richmond Battle, Confederate Press on	131
Differential Tables	189	" April 23	164	" English Press on	118
Constitution and Spirit of the Opposing Armies	189	" May 15	180	" Southern Account of	148
Secession of the West	199	" June 21	212	Russell (Earl) and the Liverpool Shipowners	247
Federal Outrages	253	" July 27	260	Seward (Mr.) and Earl Russell	245
France and the Confederate States	253	" 4	324	Sibley's Campaign in New Mexico	319
Canadian View of Affairs, a	317	" August 9	36	South (The) in the Social Science Congress	106
Telegraphic Strategy	319	" 28	67	Southern Prospects	78, 109
Northern Angling for Sympathy	335	" April 26	148	" Railroads	143
Decree for a Servile War, the	383	" May 1	293	" Securities, Table of	55
Lindsay's Motion	198, 214	" 16	372	" Planters' View of the Coming Crop	39
LISTS OF KILLED, WOUNDED, AND MISSING—		" June 12	356	Stonewall Jackson, Account of	191
Shiloh	83, 100, 147	" August 3	36	" Achievements	270
General	226	" Sept. 23	52	" Defeat of Fremont & Shields	195
Battles before Richmond	275	" 1	84	Sydney Johnstone, Sketch of	31
In Alabama Regiments	291	" April 25	148	State Prisoners in Fort Delaware	404
Secessionville	258	" May 6	259	THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—
Fort Republic	274	" 16	259	Off to the Wars	12
Lovell (Gen.) on the Fall of New Orleans		" 30	324	En Route to Virginia	11
Mason (Mr.) on the Effects of Recognition	391	Richmond	36	A Famine and a Feast	27
Maury on the American Struggle	254	" 13 and 23	37	A Military Election	28
Mexican Intervention, "New York Herald" on	87	" July 10	115	Our First Adventure	60
Nashville, the Hunt of the	237	" May 21	67	A Triumphant March	60
New Orleans, Evacuation of	86	" Aug. 14 and 16	101	Taking the Oath	75
" Fall of	175	Savannah	132	Our First Camp	75
" Correspondence on	134	" 10, 22, 28	148	The Tune of Dixie	140
Northern Press, Gleanings from the	22, 47, 70	The Oaks	271	On the Scene of Action	140
" View of the State of the North	270	Winchester	143	My Messmates	348
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK—		West Florida	108	Soldiers' Duties	348
1, 17, 33, 49, 65, 81, 97, 113, 129, 145, 161, 177, 193, 209, 225, 241, 257, 273, 289, 305, 321, 337, 353, 369, 385, 401		Wilmington	123	The First Visit of Death	365
Outrage in Alabama	247	Wisconsin	43	A Dinner Party in Camp	366
Pan-Handle, the	364	Ram Arkansas, the	13	The First Fight	397
Permanent Government of the Confederate States	15	Reign of Terror, the	14	Luxurious Living	398
Present and Future, the	45	REVIEWS OF BOOKS—	29	Mischief and its Cure	406
Press (English) on the Battle of Richmond	118	Beveridge's History of India	61	Conclusion	407
" (London) on the Evacuation of Maryland	358	Colden on Panics	44	TODACCO MARKET—
PRICES CURRENT—		Constitutional History of the United States	76	July 2	147
Charleston, April 17	67	Life of William Pitt	91	" 8	163
New Orleans, March 14 to April 1	3	Southern Wealth and Northern Profits	108	" 16	180
" April 12 to 14	35	A Historical Parallel	123	" 24	195
" March 21	51	The American Disruption	124	" 31	211
Mobile, March 8 to 19	19	History of Frederick the Second	140	Aug. 6	256
General	35	Historical Parallel, No. 2	142	" 28	274
Prospects of the South	45	Abel Drake's Wife	156	Sep. 4	291
PRIVATE LETTERS—		Historical Parallel, No. 3	172	" 11	306
Anderson, S. C.	June 28	Embassy to the Court of St. James's, in 1840	155	" 25	340
Baltimore	April 22	Historical Parallel, No. 4	188	Oct. 2	356
" May 29	132	" No. 5	205	" 23	403
Charleston	April 30	Precis of the Wars in Canada	205	Van Dorn (Gen.) Advance of	303
" July 23	341	Trolope on Secession	236	Virginia, Destruction of the	180
Clarksville	May 8, 10	Historical Parallel, No. 6	206	Voice from Pennsylvania, a	286
		Colonial History of Virginia		Wood (Hon. Benj.) on the State of the Union	125
		Colonial History of Virginia
		Southern Statistics
		" Cotton Production
		" Distribution of Property, Schools, and Churches " Crime and Pauperism Presidential Contest of 1860

LIST OF SUBSCRIBERS.

THE Publication of this List is postponed at the earnest request of Friends, in whose opinion such publication might, under present circumstances, compromise some of our American Subscribers.

8022 Ch. fd. May 22, 1862

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Vol. I.—No. 1.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 1, 1862. to May 23, 1863 [PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	1
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET	2
Liverpool Letter	2
Manchester Letter	2
Money Market	2
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Prices Current	3
Marriages and Deaths	3
Private Letters and Extracts	3
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Our Washington Correspondent	4
Our New York Correspondent	5
Paris—Attitude of the French Government	5
Berlin—German View of American Affairs	6
Havana	6
LEADERS—
Our Name	8
Our Object	8
Latest News from the War	9
Cotton Prospects	9
Oath of Allegiance	10
Editorials	10
CRUISE OF THE SUMMER—
Our Confederate Flag on the Sea	10
Our First Prize	11
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—
Off to the Wars	11
En route to Virginia	11
REVIEWS OF BOOKS—
History of India	12
Mr. Cobden on Panics	14
ADVERTISEMENTS	16

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE booming of cannon has just announced to London that the International Exhibition has been opened. The gorgeous ceremonial, the bright sunshine, and the considerable influx of foreign visitors, have not excited much enthusiasm. The metropolis is neither very gay nor very full. Perhaps the vacant chair of state has renewed the national sorrow for the loss of the good Prince, to whose sagacity the world is indebted for whatever advantages may be derived from International Exhibitions. And it is not unlikely that the great show at Kensington could not drown the remembrance of the cotton famine in Lancashire. It is certain that the distress in the manufacturing districts will cast a gloom over the season of 1862; a gloom that will deepen until the day of alleviation, though distant, becomes certain.

By an arrival from the Confederate States we have advices and files of Southern papers to the 2nd inst. The most essential items of intelligence will be found under their appropriate heads. Savannah was considered effectively fortified, when our informant left; and the fall of Fort Pulaski, long expected and inevitable, is regarded by him as not materially endangering the city itself. Fort Jackson must yet be taken before the Federals can come within shelling distance of the town.

Commander Buchanan, of the Virginia, reported to have been killed, was, at last advices, in Richmond, recovering from his wound, and the Virginia was under the command of Commodore Tatnall, so favourably known to the British public in connection with the Peiho affair.

Considerable quantities of goods and warlike stores had been lately introduced at Confederate ports, notably at Charleston.

The Nashville had been sold by the Confederate Government, and had since made a successful return trip with a valuable cargo.

The determination of the Washington Government to gag the press of Europe, is very particularly evinced by refusing to allow Mr. Russell to proceed to join the army before Yorktown, and the the English public is convinced that no reliance is to be placed on Northern intelligence. The Times had a brilliant leader yesterday upon the Northern News Manufactory. Our contemporary wants to know the use of loans and levies, when a salute of 100 guns, a thanksgiving, and a fiction, can be substituted for a victory; and further suggests that the Pittsburg Landing story "is only the first of many great campaigns yet to be accomplished in this tempting region of fiction." The Times also comments on the obstinacy of the Confederates in pretending to be alive after they have been killed by Mr. Stanton's pen:—"For ourselves, we are perfectly prepared to admit that Beauregard is dead. The press of Federal America is now the voice of the War department; the press 'obstinately persists' that Beauregard first had his arm shot off and then was killed. News from America is now an official matter, and this is the news. Beauregard may exclaim as much as he pleases, but for all newspaper purposes he is dead, and there ought to be an end of him. If he is going about the lines of Corinth and pretending to be alive, it is very indecent of him." A little more such action, and the despotism of the North will cease to be a crime, by becoming a palpably ridiculous blunder.

The capture of three Union vessels by the Patriot Henry, and the Teazer, under the shelter of the Virginia (Merrimac), in the presence of the Federal fleet, has produced the impression in Europe that though Mr. Stanton may easily capture the Virginia, or kill her commander, or sink her, with his goose-quill, it is certain that the Monitor thinks her a troublesome customer, and is not particularly anxious to come to close quarters. The English are eagerly looking for the news of the next fight between the iron foes; and this eagerness is participated in by the French. H. M. steamer Rinaldo, and the French war steamers Catinat and Gassendi are so anchored in the Hampton Roads as to command a view of the expected engagement.

On Thursday last Mr. Gladstone addressed the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, and, of course, dwelt upon the topic which now engages the attention of statesmen, merchants, and even our artisans. The Right Hon. gentleman complained of the unmanliness of the North in asking us to make the six or ten million of the South our enemies. The struggle he considered well described by Earl Russell, as being on one side for supremacy and on the other for independence. Upon the principles of the war, he observed, "The Northern States of America have undertaken a military enterprise of enormous difficulty. It is but fair, I think, that we should record our sense of the vast and gigantic energies which they have unfolded in its prosecution. They have had certain successes in the field. But here again I fall back on our English experience. Revert to the annals of the War of Independence between the American colonies and this country, and see where were the successes in the field. It was not for want of such successes that we did not conquer those colonies. It was because we found that when we had been successful in the field we were no nearer our object than before. It is not the question—when you are endeavouring to conquer a country—whether you can break up its embattled armies and drive them off the plain where they contended with you in fight. The question is this, and this alone—whether the heart of that country is set upon separation?"

We direct especial attention to our Paris correspondent's letter. We cannot venture to speculate on the effect of the Emperor's last appeal to the British Government; but we know that the influential classes in England would deeply regret the French taking precedence in the recognition of the Confederate States of America. Nor we do imagine that our Government can be uninfluenced by the condition of Lancashire. The memorable declaration of Earl Russell in reference to the accounts of the English army in the Crimea, that "they were horrible and heartrending," is truly applicable to the reports of the sufferings of our artisans in the north. It was stated on Monday that in Blackburn and the district of four miles around, it is computed that there are 154 mills and weaving-sheds, which in prosperous times employ nearly 40,000 operatives. Of these mills 16 are working full time, 13 five days per week, 46 four days, 38 three-and-a-half days, 17 three days, 1 two days, and 23 stopped. In the 23 which are closed, 8459 are entirely thrown out of employment, while about 20,000 are engaged four, five, and six days per week; and another 10,000 operatives only two, three, and three-and-a-half days per week. So there are nearly 20,000 operatives wholly and partially unemployed, representing nearly 40,000 of a population who are more or less dependent on parochial or other relief for the bare sustenance or necessities of life. An eye-witness of the misery has addressed a letter to the Times, in which he remarks, "Yesterday I was told of a poor factory girl, who was said to have been starved to death. I went down towards her house; but the funeral was to take place that afternoon, and I forbore to enter; for I felt that, even there, sorrow was sacred. But I made inquiries in the neighbourhood, and learnt that what was told me was almost literally true."

A meeting of factory operatives was held in Manchester on Tuesday evening. There were some sad tales of suffering told. The meeting adopted two resolutions:—1. "That in the opinion of this meeting the modicum of relief afforded by the Poor Law Guardians is totally inadequate to meet the existing distress." 2. "That in the opinion of this meeting the present mode of applying the labour test is unjust in principle and cruel in its operation on the labouring classes."

The opening of the Southern ports could not now prevent the ravages of famine; the wolf is already at the door. But it would prevent despair, by giving an assured hope of the return of plenty; and an attempt would then be made to efficiently aid the poor starvelings, for the effort would not seem hopeless. We repeat our earnest conviction that these things must give additional weight to the urgent appeal of the Imperial Government, as notified by our Paris correspondent.

The visit of M. Mereier to Richmond is regarded as extremely significant of the determination of the French Government to put an end to the blockade. The suggestion that the journey was undertaken in consequence of the intention of France to withdraw her concession of belligerent rights, owing to the Confederate defeat in Tennessee, is worthy of the masterly genius of Mr. Stanton, and of the reputation of the Northern News Manufactory.

Our Berlin letter indicates an important and favourable change in the German view of American affairs.

The Russian loan of £10,000,000 has been eagerly subscribed. We may see by this, that a plethora of money is not always an indication of prosperity. The stoppage of trade, consequent upon the war in America, compels capitalists to seek new and less profitable investments. At the present moment, joint stock hubbles are at a premium. It is not surprising that the unnatural paralyzation of our chief trade should induce commercial gambling.

Another startling yet logical sign of the glut of unemployed capital, is the large amount subscribed for public works in India, and the consequent withdrawal of Indian labour from agricultural pursuits. It is highly probable that the American war will check rather than stimulate the production of Indian cotton.

Parliament reassembled on Monday, but no business of importance has been transacted.

In a Vera Cruz despatch, dated the 3rd of April, published in the Paris journals, it is stated, that France, not approving the convention of Soledad, the French troops at Tehuacan would return to Vera Cruz on the 4th, and set out again for the city of Mexico on the 15th of April. According to the same despatch, Admiral Jurien de la Gravière was to take possession of the forts along the coasts. A perfectly good understanding existed between Admiral Jurien de la Gravière and General Lorencez.

We have received telegraphic news from India. The Persians have occupied Herat, and are advancing on Candahar. British aid has been asked by the Afghans. Three days since, on the occasion of Lord Canning's return from India, our journals were reasonably enough congratulating Lord Elgin, his successor in the Governor-Generalship, upon the prospect of a peaceful reign. The little cloud in Afghan may frustrate such expectations.

We have two important items of intelligence from Italy. Victor Emmanuel has met with an enthusiastic reception at Naples. On the other hand, a well-organized military conspiracy has been discovered in Milan. The Neapolitan soldiers concerned in it were provided with poignards, pistols, and other arms, and contemplated attempting to get up a reactionary movement in Lombardy. About forty of them have been arrested. A similar conspiracy has been discovered at Monza.

A telegram from Ragusa, notifies that Hussein Pasha having attacked the insurgents, had been defeated with a loss of 2,000 men, 1,000 horses, four pieces of cannon, and heavy quantities of ammunition and provisions.

Amongst the noted and distinguished visitors to London are the Japanese Ambassadors.

The Presbyterian, Methodist, and Episcopal churches of Marietta Ga., have all voted to give their bells to the Confederacy to be made into cannon.

As lead is in great demand, it is suggested that old tea-chests contain each from two to five pounds, which, cleaned with little trouble and melted, make a very fair article of lead. Every pound helps.

A balloon was seen to pass over a portion of Burke county, Ga., a few days ago. It descended on a plantation, threw out a lot of sand, ascended, and disappeared.

General Widder, of Alabama, has been assigned to the command of Port Pillow, on the east bank of the Mississippi River, about 70 miles above Memphis.—New Orleans Picayune, 15th March.

We have good news from Mississippi. The planters are piling up their cotton and getting it ready for the faggot the moment the enemy advances. They are also sending their servants up the river to work on the fortifications; and they say they are ready to make any sacrifice the Government may require.—Memphis Appeal, March 27.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, 30th April.

No other branch of commerce has been so much affected by the American War as the trade in the great staple article of cotton; other commercial pursuits have been made to suffer, either directly or indirectly; but the intimate relation of the cotton trade, as it existed between this country and America, prior to the serious disruption in the latter, makes the present state of things so much the more regretful and deplorable. Much of the world's wealth, and still more of its comfort, has either a close connection with, or has sprung out of, this particular trade; violent interference with any of the sources of supply could not, therefore, be otherwise than detrimental, but to be cut off altogether from the main channel of support, even for a limited period, involves an amount of calamity not very easily estimated, even by those most conversant with the subject. It is not, however, our intention now to enter upon details, the facts and figures bearing upon the present condition of the trade are almost too familiar to need comment at our hands. For months past the question has ceased to belong to one section only of the commercial community; the interests involved are of vital and national importance, and must, ere long, command the attention and sympathy proportioned to their magnitude. Fortunately for the world, the bounteous productions of a late series of years had stocked, to almost overflowing, all the great markets, and textile fabrics everywhere proved to be in such excessive abundance, that most of the contemplated evil has hitherto been averted. Now, however, the long period of shortened supplies of the raw material, and consequent lessened production of goods and yarns, is telling most seriously in many quarters, and prices are commencing to ascend a scale betokening a coming famine.

The possible effect of the world's demands upon the restricted supply at command can only be conjectured, nor can we venture to stay to contemplate the fearfulness that may arise when actual famine of the article shall force itself into unwilling observation. The apparent apathy now reigning must soon give place to the sternness of the reality, and then perhaps, if not before, will the true character of the American War receive its just appreciation.

Among those most immediately connected with the trade of the staple, it seems to have become a maxim that "anticipated scarcity is never realized"—periods in the cotton history have so often arisen when dearth seemed imminent but without having been realized, that we now still hear the old cry from some, that cotton will come somehow; the careful observer must, at any rate, yet fail to see it coming from the only good source of supply,—America; and it needs no prophet to perceive inadequacy from all other sources. The stock of American cotton in Liverpool, 1st January, was 279,400 bales, of all kinds 622,600. Total import since, 329,755. Stock of American, April 25th, 124,250. Total, 298,990 bales. The quantity afloat to arrive from Bombay is about 170,000 bales, or 50,000 less than at the corresponding period of 1861. These figures show the total available supply in the port, 1st January, to 25th April, to have been 953,000 bales. Spinners and exporters together have not taken out of the market two-thirds of the quantity used in the same time in 1861. Yet a decided inroad has been made upon the stock of 224,000 bales. With the falling off that we see must now take place in the imports, one of two things is inevitable, viz., a greater curtailment of consumption and export, or a rapid absorption of stock. Upon this phase of the subject, every one will be at liberty to make his own deductions; the figures are sufficiently alarming, without remarks from ourselves. Opinions may vary as to what might now have been the condition of things had no interruption of supplies from America taken place; but after so many months of curtailed production, it is obvious that none can doubt the truth of the assertion that stocks of manufacturers must everywhere be greatly reduced. The evidence of this meets buyers on every market day in Manchester; week after week increases their perplexity, as the advancing tendency of prices, and the firm position of manufactures become more decidedly manifest.

Of necessity, under the peculiarity of existing circumstances, some change of feeling and of action will ever and anon be seen in the Liverpool market. For the last four weeks there has been more uniformity of procedure, the intelligence from America giving no hope of any immediate peaceful indication. The spirit of warfare has, indeed, rather grown in intensity, and every new development has seemed only to add obscurity to the previous complications, increasing the anxiety as the termination of the strife has appeared at a remoter distance.

The daily transactions in cotton during all the past month have been on a large scale, activity of demand has been met by firmness, and higher pretensions of holders, and a weekly advance of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. has been secured in American descriptions, middling Orleans being worth 13 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per pound. The sales of the week, ending 25th instant, were 59,400 bales, spinners taking 33,900, speculators 19,820, and exporters 5710 bales. A quieter but yet firm tone has been apparent the last few days. The news by the Niagara tending to some perplexity of opinion none see any probability, even in the distance, of any new supplies. The Cotton Market at New York was firm and active; but certain idle rumours are afloat that the Federal Government are desirous of a settlement of differences, and without further loss of life and treasure. The French Minister's hasty departure from Washington to Richmond is not understood; and as most people would gladly hail the indication of returning peace, the pacific element is for the moment in the ascendant, caution enforces itself, and largeness of profits in some cases induce a readier inclination to realize. The sales of the past four days, including 5000 to-day, are about 24,000 bales, maintaining previous quotations, viz., Middling Uplands, 13 $\frac{1}{4}$; Middling Mobiles, 13 $\frac{1}{4}$; and Middling Orleans, 13 $\frac{1}{4}$ per lb.

MANCHESTER, 30th April.

As regards the stock of goods in hand here and the surrounding locality, it is quite impossible to give you the information required, as there are no statistics published, either for private or public circulation. From the fact of manufactured goods having remained stationary in price for many months now, and sellers finding much difficulty in effecting sales, at even lower prices than quotations, it is evident that the present stocks and production (which is now much curtailed), and abundant for all requirements, the home consumption, especially in Lancashire, will not now be more than one-half in ordinary years. I estimate the stocks held here in speculation for re-sale when prices advance at about one-third of the whole; and in most cases these stocks are held largely by individuals, who are sanguine of much higher prices, under all circumstances, as they contend that, in the event of your ports being open for commerce, the demand for goods will counterbalance any depreciation that in ordinary times would arise from a fall in the price of the raw material, from the fact that the Confederate States will require large supplies.

MONEY MARKET.—The Trade returns issued yesterday for last month. Compared with the corresponding month of last year there has been a falling off of £1,286,181, equal to 11 $\frac{1}{2}$ in the declared value of exports. Of this amount £1,118,353 occurs under the head of cotton yarn and cotton manufactures. The past quarter, compared with the same period in 1860, shows a decrease of £4,058,144, equal to 15 per cent.

Money is plentiful, and the prices of securities are generally firm. Yesterday the Russian loan stood at $\frac{1}{2}$ to $\frac{3}{4}$ prem.

The Corn Market was heavy, and sellers were obliged to submit to a reduction.

There is reported to be much demand for freight on steamers attempting the blockade. Ten and eleven guineas per ton were asked for ordinary freight, and as much as ten for military stores. Insurances against capture were daily being effected, at rates ranging from £15 to £26, the latter having been paid only in an exceptional case of peculiar risk. The recent private advices of the success attending ventures between Cuban and Gulf ports, and more especially at Charleston, will probably tend to considerably reduce these rates.

ORDERS OF GENERAL BEAUREGARD TO THE PLANTERS OF THE MISSISSIPPI VALLEY. HEAD-QUARTERS ARMY, OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Jackson, Tenn., March 8, 1862.

More than once a people fighting with an enemy less ruthless than yours, for imperilled rights not more dear and sacred than yours, for homes and a land not more worthy of resolute and unconquerable men than yours, and for interests of far less magnitude than you have now at stake, have not hesitated to melt and mould into cannon the precious bells surmounting their houses of God, which had called generations to prayer. The priesthood have ever sanctioned and consecrated the conversion, in the hour of their nation's need, as one holy and acceptable in the sight of God.

We want cannon as greatly as any people whoever, as history tells you, melted their church bells to supply them; and I, your General, entrusted with the command of the army embodied of your sons, your kinsmen, and your neighbours, do now call on you to send your plantation bells to the nearest railroad depot subject to my order, to be melted into cannon for the defence of your plantations.

Who will not cheerfully and promptly send me his bells under such circumstances?

Be of good cheer; but time is precious.

G. T. BEAUREGARD,

Mobile Register, March 18. General Commanding.

The Nashville Patriot says that, on March 25th, Governor Johnson directed a letter to the officials of Nashville, requiring them to take the oath of allegiance, but the Common Council, by a vote of 16 to 1, refused to do so. The sixteen declined on the score that it was never contemplated that they should take such oath. The one who voted aye, said he would subscribe to the oath, but immediately resign.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

NEW ORLEANS PRICES CURRENT.

(From the latest received New Orleans Papers.)

CORRON. March 14th.—The sales reported during the past week comprise 300 bales on the spot, sold to the Navy Department at —; 150 bales for future delivery in New Orleans at 8½ cents for middling; and 100 bales on plantation at 7½ cents for middling; and 81 bales on the spot at 10½ cents to 11 for middling. We have heard of no transactions recently at more than 8½ cents for future delivery, although last month we noticed sales at 9 cents. Middling on the spot is quoted at 11 cents, but has sold higher for good staple.

There have been some further receipts, but as they were on special permits from the Governor of the State for immediate transshipment, they have made no addition to the stock.

Week's receipts, 1159 bales; last year, 22,450; total since Sept. 1, 26,333; last year, 1,714,900. Week's exports, &c., 1159 bales; last year, 69,550. Total exports, &c., 25,437 bales; last year, 1,469,470, including 885,930 to Great Britain and 295,240 to France.

STATEMENT OF COTTON.

Stock on hand, Sept. 1st, 1861 ..	10,118
Arrived to date	26,031
„ to-day	302
	26,333
	36,451
Exported to date and in transitu ..	25,337

Stock on hand not cleared, exclusive } of amount in transitu } 11,214

Stock on hand last year .. 319,400

March 17th.—100 bales on the spot, sold to-day at about previous quotations. No receipts.

March 26th.—The sales comprise 600 bales on plantations, for early delivery at —. No receipts.

TOBACCO. March 15th.—There has been a good demand, but factors have either withdrawn their stocks from the market, or ask a greater advance than buyers are willing to pay; and we have not a sale to notice.

Week's receipts, 20 hhds.; last year, 503 hhds.; total receipts since 1st Sept., 1018 hhds.; last year, 17,320. Total exports, 3000; last year, 19,575.

STATEMENT OF TOBACCO.

Stock on hand 1st Sept., 1861 ..	13,121 hhds.
Arrived to date	1,018 „
Stock on hand not cleared	16,139 „
Stock on hand last year	18,375 „

SUGAR.—The market opened this week with a less active demand, and the receipts being quite liberal, prices for the better qualities—the only description which have been in brisk demand—gave way ¼ to ½ cent.; while during the past three days this downward tendency has been more general, and the prices have become so completely unsettled that we are compelled to omit quotations. The sales comprise 2600 hhds. during the early part of the week, fair to fully fair, closing on Tuesday at 2½ to 3 cents., and 2700 hhds. since, including 1200 to-day. This makes a total for the week 5300 hhds.

Sales, corresponding week last year, 6000 hhds. at 4½ to 5¼ cents. for fair to fully fair.

Week's receipts, 14,070 hhds.; last year, 7250; total since 1st Sept., 166,906 hhds.; last year, 138,750.

There is a great want of force to move the receipts, the labourers having mostly gone to the war; and planters are urgently advised to forbear shipments until there is a favourable change.

MOLASSES.—With moderate supplies, and a slack demand, the market has continued inanimate throughout the week; the sales embracing 1800 brls. during the first three days, at 13 to 14 cents for fermenting, and 16 cents for prime to choice, and 2500 brls. since, including 800 to-day, at 12 to 13, for fermenting, and 14 cents for re-boiled, which may be regarded as fair quotations. This makes a total of 3500 brls. In half brls., we notice sales of 650 packages, at 15 to 17 cents, for fermenting, and 18 for prime.

Our receipts are about 70,000 brls. in excess of last year's to the corresponding date.

Week's receipts, 6744 brls., and 426 half brls.; last year, 8430 brls. Total, since Sept. 1st, 337,931 brls.; last year, 268,480.

FLOUR.—The market has again exhibited a slight but already upward tendency, under which prices have improved 50 cents to 1 dol. per hrl., the sales up to last evening comprising about 2000 hrls. (in brls. and sacks), at 12 dols. for common, 14 dols. for fine, 15 to 15½ for superfine, and 16 to 18 dols. for good to choice extra.

Week's receipts, 3578 hrls. and 305 sacks.

CORN.—The receipts have been ample, but with pretty fair demand. Prices have been maintained without any variation, the sales comprising 3000 sacks, white and yellow, during the early part of the week, all at 1 dol. 10 cents, and 10,500 since, including 3000 white and yellow in store yesterday, at 1 dol. 7½ cents, and 2500 on the Levee, in several lots, at 1 dol. 10 cents.

Week's receipts, 20,534 sacks.

HAY.—The sales this week include 100 bales western hay at the extreme rate of 70 dols. per ton.

BEEF.—The market has continued quiet, and we have heard of no sales of any moment. At retail, dealers have realized 30 dols. for the prime, and 35 dols. for mess. The stock in the Inspection Warehouses, on the 1st inst., comprised 2000 brls. and trs., all army stores, against 1981 trs. and 1260 brls., at corresponding date last year.

Week's receipts, 437 brls.

PORK.—The receipts continue limited, and dealers realize at retail, 45 to 50 dols. for mess. The stock in Inspection Warehouses, 2000 brls., all army stores, against 9582 brls. at corresponding date last year.

Week's receipts, 106 brls.

DRY SALTED MEAT.—The receipts during the early part of the week comprised 100,000 lbs., which were sold at 25 cents hog round, since which there have been some further transactions at 23 to 25 cents.

BACON.—The receipts continue light, but there have been some further sales at 23 to 25 cents hog round. At retail, dealers realize 26 cents for shoulders, 28 cents for hams, and 30 cents for sides.

Week's receipts 106 hhds. and 15 trs.

COFFEE.—About 500 sacks sold at auction, at 50 to 50½ cents for Rio, and 51 to 55 for Cuba. Rio sells in retail lots at 60 cents.

SALT.—Dealers supply their customers at 8½ for Liverpool coarse, and 10 to 11 for fine. The stock of fine is nearly exhausted. Packing kinds sell at 4 to 5 dols. per sack of two bushels, and screened at 7 dols.

LATER DATES.

OFFICE "DAILY TRUE DELTA," April 1st, 1862.

COTTON.—The sales comprise 175 bales on plantation, for future delivery here of 8½ for middling, and 160 yesterday at the same. Receipts were nominal; stock, exclusive of amount in transitu 11,214 bales.

Clear sterling bills 65 to 70 per cent. premium; francs 2-75 to 3 fcs. per dollar. Sight dfts. on Confederate State Bank, par.

The following sales of stock at auction made this day:—

25 shares Crescent City Bank ..	85½
17 „ Canal Bank	134
10 „ Bank of America	130

MARRIAGES AND DEATHS.

DIED.

On the 5th of March, at Decatur, Jerome Bruce, aged 21 years, a member of Scott's Louisiana Cavalry.

On Saturday, 8th March, at New Orleans, Joseph, infant son of Raymond A. and Jennie M. Bourk, aged two months and eight days.

On Sunday, 9th March, at New Orleans, James Freeman, a native of Dublin, Ireland, aged 36 years.

On Sunday, 9th March, at New Orleans, David W. Farrier, a native of Glasgow, Scotland, aged 34 years.

On Monday, 10th March, at New Orleans, of consumption, Richard Walsh, a native of Ireland, aged 25 years.

On Monday, 10th March, at New Orleans, Jerome Joledano, in the 65th year of his age.

On the 8th March, at Belair Plantation, in the 69th year of his age, Captain Thomas J. Ioy, a native of Va., but for 25 years a resident of New Orleans.

On the 10th March, at Grand Junction, Tennessee, Nicholas Walsh, aged 22 years, a native of County Kilkenny, Ireland.

On Tuesday, March 11th, at New Orleans, H. H. Cogreve, a native of Germany, aged 42 years.

On Wednesday, March 12th, at New Orleans, Marie Antoinette Jagot, aged 59 years.

On Tuesday, March 11th, at New Orleans, John Sharkey, aged 56 years.

On Monday, March 14th, at New Orleans, Margaret Keller, wife of P. W. Macken, aged 23 years.

On Monday, March 17th, at New Orleans, H. Williams, aged 41 years, for 16 years, a resident of the city.

On the 19th March, at New Orleans, Mrs. Eliza I. Colson, at the age of 66 years, a native of Thomaston, Maine.

On Monday, March 17th, at New Orleans, Octave Le Blanc, Jr., aged 80 years.

On the 19th March, at Columbia, South Carolina, Alice Ann Rutledge, relict of the late Benjamin Huger Rutledge, of Sumter District, in the 66th year of her age.

On the 20th March, at New Orleans, William Garthwaite, aged 68 years, a native of Elizabethtown, New Jersey.

On Friday, 21st March, at New Orleans, Mrs. Frederica Woolficy, aged 22 years.

On Wednesday, March 26th, at New Orleans, Anne Brennan, wife of Mathew Brennan, aged 43 years, a native of the County Sligo, Ireland; for 14 years a resident of the city. (Sligo papers, please copy.)

On Wednesday, March 26th, Mary O'Connell, wife of James Walsh, a native of Fremont, County Cork, Ireland.

MARRIED.

On Tuesday, March 4th, W. C. D. Vaught to Miss Isadore L. Walker, daughter of Felix Walker, at and all of New Orleans.

Oh Thursday, March 6th, Mr. James Goodwin to Miss Emily Augusta Hamilton, at and both of New Orleans.

On the 2nd of March, C. M. Bisbee to Miss Mary C. Giese Cramer, at Pass Christian, and both of Mississippi.

On the 13th March, Mr. William Tell to Miss Jane Eliza Richardson, at and both of New Orleans.

On Thursday, March 13, Robert Roberts to Miss Eliza M. Hammond, at Algiers, and both of New Orleans.

On Monday, March 24th, Mr. M. F. Burk to Miss B. M. Quinn, at and both of New Orleans.

On Monday, 17th March, Mr. William Roberts to Miss Amelia L. Carria, at and both of Algiers Lo.

On Monday, 17th March, Mr. Thomas M. Boland, of New Orleans, to Miss Sallie C. Miller, at and of Vicksburg, Mississippi.

On the 11th March, Mr. Eugene H. Duflilio, of New Orleans, to Miss Helena Guidry, of the parish of St. Landry.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

We have a mass of private letters from various portions of the South, kindly placed at our disposal by the recipients. Unfortunately, many of them, and those the latest and most interesting ones, came to us too late to receive that careful revision, which is indispensable, in the use of private correspondence.

We have, however, sufficiently noted their contents to agree heartily with a friend who writes from Liverpool, on the 29th April:—"A heavy mail is up to-day from the C. S. A., with dates, New Orleans, 29th March; Charleston, 26th; and I think I can safely say, that no letters have ever been received from the same quarter written in a more determined tone. The reverses of March had roused the country."

This is well and simply represented in the following extract, dated New Orleans, 27th March, 1862:—

"Our few reverses have produced no discouragement; the entire population is up in arms; the active operations of our revolution are only beginning, and will be briskly carried on. The hope of our final success is greater than ever."

The following is an extract from a letter by a lady of Mobile, whose husband and two sons are in the army, to her sister in Europe, dated March 16th. Referring to the general expectation of an attack on that city, she says:—

"The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth," and we poor worms of the earth have to bow to his decree. Whatever that may be, time will determine. . . . We regret to leave our house shortly, having sold it to an English gentleman, the only means, probably, to save it from at least temporary confiscation. Husband leaves to join his regiment below the city, and I shall board until it becomes time for me to leave. I wish I was on the other side of the water—not that I am afraid, or unwilling to do my share if I could help; but every woman is in the way now. We are awaiting, from day to day, the order requiring all women and children to leave the city. I have not decided yet where to go, but have a choice of a number of places of refuge tendered me. I hear often from ——. He is in fine spirits, and preserves excellent health, and is quite confident of winning his regiment before the war is over. I daily pray it may soon be. — bears the trouble better than I, or, at least, appears to do. She is a brave young woman, and her only regret seems to be that she is not a man, that she also might go out to fight these barbarous devastators of our homes and firesides. I am not so young and high-spirited as she is; but I do sometimes feel like her. Was there ever so inhuman, so unnecessary a war, since the world began? What have we done to these people, that they should come and take away our husbands and sons, destroy our property, or cause us to destroy it ourselves in very despair?"

Another letter, also by a lady, from Mobile, a few days later, says:—

"A schooner is about to run the blockade, and I am writing while Mr. — is preparing a bundle of papers, from which you will get the political news. It has not been good for us, but we must have reverses sometimes. We are all hopeful and confident, though many persons are very much alarmed at the danger of our city. I shall remain until the commanding-general orders the women and children to leave. — is already gone to the plantation.

"We had a great review of all the companies when General Bragg was here. He was splendidly mounted; and as he passed, men cheered him, and the ladies greeted him with their handkerchiefs, blessing him from their inmost hearts. His saddle-cloth and saddle was a present from a young lady—a just tribute to a brave man and a good man. He worked a great reformation among the soldiers while he was here. His first act was to close all the bar-rooms. Every soldier is at his post. No permits are granted, unless in cases of sickness, to leave the camps. All business in the city is suspended after three o'clock. The afternoon is devoted to drilling. Every man is required to be a soldier. John, too, is gone to the army; Dr. — kept him out a long time on account of his delicate health; but no one with a drop of blood in his veins can keep quiet in these times. If I had a dozen sons, I should say, 'go' to each of them, and could not love them if they were sluggish in such a cause. The women are working, too, in their way—nursing at the hospitals, and doing all they can to aid the soldiers. I was one of a party of ladies who cut out 3500 sandbags in half a day; 50,000 were ordered, and done almost as soon. We stand ready to do, and to die if necessary. Husband, and what is more, General —, are confident that we can hold Mobile. If the city is shelled, we are beggars. But I would rather live in Europe as a lady's-maid or house-keeper, than remain here, if the Yankees are to overrun us. I do not believe that any man or woman of gentle birth or rearing, will want to live here with that vulgar barbarian to rule over them. . . . Apart from these considerations, I do admire the Queen. She is a noble and a good woman, and was a devoted wife. I do really sympathize with her in her afflictions. . . . I am glad you are so well situated. Mr. — thinks as I do, and would give his eyes to have me with you at this time.

"I feel sometimes dreadfully despondent at the prospect of losing —, and —; but I do not despair when I think that God watches over all — wants me to go to the warm springs, but I could not live where I cannot get the news. I shall go to some place on the railroad. I do not like to leave home, and I feel like fighting myself at the thought of being driven from it."

Still, another is in a more cheerful mood:

"You must not think from what I tell you, that we have been at all gloomy. Tableaux vivants, fairs, etc., succeed each other, and we have quite a respectable theatrical corps, made up by the young gentlemen of the city, who are stationed at a convenient distance. All these things are for the benefit of the poor soldiers' wives and children; and this reminds me, that I must thank you ladies, individually and collectively, for your generous contributions to the relief of our sick soldiers. When I came to —'s name on the list, I was touched to tears at her generosity; but you have all been good and generous in thinking, so far away, of the poor and afflicted at home."

"There is great but quiet rejoicing over our magnificent victory at Corinth, for it is mingled with trembling dread at the details which soon will come; for many a wife here will be a widow, and many a mother childless, when they come."

One of the largest commission merchants of the city of New Orleans writes, under date of the 14th March. The writer's whole wealth consists in debts due him by the planters on their crops.

"Our cotton crop will probably all be burnt by the Confederacy. The expenses of the war are great, and the people in every State are determined to spend all they have to conquer, or die in the struggle. Old men and boys are going. Women will go—they want to go now. All ought to go against these mendacious Northern hordes."

The following little item, with which time and space compel us to conclude, will be interesting to many. It is dated Savannah, 27th March:—

"Provisions, though scarce, are not unreasonably high; some, indeed, are cheaper than ever before, because the planters, or rather, their overseers, send many more things to market than has been usual with us. At Athens, Georgia, beef is worth only 6½ cents a pound; eggs, 15 cents per dozen; chickens, 30 cents per pair, and turkeys, 1 dol. per pair. These rates do not look like starving prices. Even coffee and salt, though still enormously dear, are not as high as they have been."

Foreign Correspondence.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT.

[The chief value of the subjoined correspondence is its genuine impartiality, and the remarkable accuracy with which it reflects the drawing-room and official war-gossip, and the alternating hopes and fears entertained at the enemy's capital. With the most scrupulous care to hold an even balance between the contending parties, it is morally impossible for our correspondent to wholly withdraw his views and opinions from the colouring of the medium through which he receives them. He cannot be blamed, therefore, if he sometimes states as facts what we know to be partly, if not wholly, erroneous, and expresses doubts and makes comments which we know to be unjust to the South, and to the loyalty and unalterable resolution of its people. But we have thought it our duty to lay this correspondence before our readers precisely as we ourselves receive it, without the slightest attempt to make it conform to our own views or even to our own knowledge of facts. Thus forewarned, the reader cannot fail to find in it much exclusive information, not allowed to ooze through the hermetically sealed press of the North, and also valuable materials for forming a correct opinion of the progress of the war.]

WASHINGTON, April 8th.

It is probable that this steamer may carry out some important war news, as military movements at all points are now in rapid progress. Island No. 10 has proved a considerable obstacle, but the immense military importance of New Madrid, which was so shamefully abandoned, is now manifest, as our latest accounts represent that the Union forces are crossing over from that point below the Island, and that a land investment and attack will now be made. The Federals have thus far succeeded in all their minor and preparatory arrangements, having captured, almost without opposition, several batteries, and spiked the guns. From present indications, I think the fate of the Island will be decided within the next forty-eight hours, and that the probabilities are that it will be overcome. The Federal armies in Tennessee are now rapidly approaching the Confederates near Corinth. This expedition will move ultimately towards Memphis. There will probably be a great battle at this point within the next three days.

We hear nothing from the fleet which is attacking the forts at the Balize. There is no doubt of the attack having been commenced. We may hear also from that quarter in a few days, as also from Fort Pulaski and Savannah, at which points the operations have been renewed with vigour. But the great interest appears, after all, to concentrate on McClellan's advance in Virginia. I had already advised you of the removal of his troops to the York River, and his army has now commenced its march up the peninsula which is formed by the York and James Rivers. At the time I write this, we know that the advanced divisions of his army are in front of the Confederate defences near Yorktown. The place is defended by Magruder, with a reputed force of 30,000 men. I think this, as usual, over-estimated; but it is said that the defensive works are very effective, offering far greater obstacles than were expected. The advance has evidently been momentarily checked. No battle has yet been fought. There has been some artillery practice between the armies, resulting in trifling loss, but no approach to a regular fight. McClellan endeavours evidently to accomplish as much as possible without sacrificing life; and he may therefore make a regular siege approach to these intrenchments, instead of ordering them to be stormed. Should he do so, several days would elapse before any result could be reached. Except at this point we have no important demonstrations in progress in Virginia. If it was intended to attack Norfolk the design appears to be for the present postponed. The Merrimac has been daily and hourly looked for, but has not yet made her appearance. The Federals have made great arrangements to capture her when she makes her appearance, but I think she will prove a tough customer.

At no time since the commencement of the war has the suppression of communication between the two sections been more rigid than at present, and it is therefore impossible to learn anything of the existing condition of public sentiment in the Southern States. If the feelings which you entertain were universally shared, there would be no doubt of the determination of the Southern people; but you must not forget that you are able to enjoy so many things of which they are deprived; that your position and your situation is in every important respect so different from those who are now cooped up within their own territory, deprived of all comforts, and almost of necessities, such as salt and coffee; with their plantations desolated, their negroes escaping; and, above all, going forth to the battle field to offer up their lives—that these people, being after all but human, and having ties which render life and property valuable to them, must not be judged so very harshly if, finding resistance vain, they should finally yield—not that I now find any indications of this character. At present it certainly looks as if the resistance and determination of these people had increased rather than diminished; but it is well to keep in view these considerations and these influences.

We must now await the result of these military movements, as they cannot fail to have an important bearing although they may not bring any decisive political result. The success of the Federal army in Virginia must lead to the evacuation of Richmond and the abandonment of the principal portion of the state. The Richmond authorities would then, doubtless, remove to Montgomery. I await the effect upon the Governments of England and France of the new aspect of affairs. There will be, undoubtedly, great disappointment at the immense financial strength which has been shown at the North. The Government securities still continue strong, although not up to the highest point, but they have rallied from the recent depression; and yet it is well known that the expenditure is not less than two millions daily. Gold is rather higher, current rate 2¼ to 2½; sterling is therefore affected, and now ranges at 112½ to 113, the latter for Brown's bills, though, is easy.

WASHINGTON, April 12th.

Just as I was closing my last letter, we received the news of the surrender of Island No. 10. The particulars which have come to hand show that the movement of the land forces under General Pope, who crossed over from New Madrid, must have rendered the place untenable, and that they were compelled to abandon it. At the time of its capitulation it was only occupied by about 400 men, but contained seventy large cannon, a great deal of ammunition, several thousand small arms, &c. It is the loss of the ammunition and arms which are the severest evils to the Confederates, and it does appear to me as most extraordinary that, having in view its abandonment, they did not remove these things, which were portable and could have been carried away. Subsequently to the capitulation General Pope surrounded General MacCall with a force of 2000 men, and he also surrendered. No fighting was done. And this is again most unaccountable, and shows great pusillanimity on the part of the officer in command. Something is said of the unwillingness of the men to fight; if so, then the evil is still greater. Since the occupation of the island by the Federals we have no further accounts of their downward progress, and I do not know at present whether they will meet with any obstacles between this point and Memphis. The movements on the river have for the last forty-eight hours been almost forgotten in the contemplation of the serious fight which took place near Pittsburg Landing on Sunday and Monday, 7th and 8th April, and which has been, beyond all comparison, the greatest battle of the war.

For some days the Confederates had been concentrating near Corinth, Mississippi, to oppose the progress of the Federals, who had landed at Pittsburg Landing, about twenty miles from Corinth. On Sunday morning, the Confederates commenced their attack with about 30,000 men, the Federals having an equal number. The battle was desperately fought all day, but at nightfall the Federals were completely beaten. Their camp with all its equipage, 36 pieces of artillery, General Prentiss, and about 2000 men, were in possession of the Confederates, and the Federal army was pursued back nearly into the river. Reinforcements were, however, rapidly pressing forward to them, being already on the opposite side of the river; and during the night about 60,000 men, 40,000 under Buell and 19,000 under Wallace, were added to the Federal side. Next morning the battle was renewed with great fury. The Confederates were reinforced also in the course of the morning by several thousands, and had, no doubt, 50,000 men in the field. The fight continued with varied fortune; but the freshness of the Federals and their overpowering numbers were finally too much for the Confederates, and in the afternoon they gradually retired towards Corinth, at which place it is supposed they are now entrenched. On this second day they are said to have lost not only the artillery which they had captured the day before, but several guns of their own. The slaughter has been terrible. The first accounts that reached us put the Federal loss at 18 to 20,000 killed and wounded, and the Confederates at 35 to 40,000. Such news sickened everybody. I never saw so palpable an effect produced upon a community. Men who had been most active for the war were staggered by such wholesale butchery. Whilst the Union men claimed a victory, it was felt that such victories were as bad as defeats. Subsequent accounts have, however, considerably modified these first statements. The Federal loss is now estimated at about 10,000, whilst that of the Confederates is regarded as equally large, if not larger. We have no Southern accounts thus far, and therefore have no other than the incoherent statements which have drifted over from the battle-field; no official statement having yet appeared. It is reported, and I believe it to be true, that Sidney Johnson was killed. Beauregard is also reported to have lost an arm, but this lacks confirmation. The loss of officers on the Federal side has been very severe, comprising many of the principal commanders. It will be many days before all the damage is known. The result of the fight has evidently been a drawn battle. The advantage of Sunday was evidently with the Confederates, and Beauregard believed that on Monday he would be able to capture the entire army; but the overwhelming numbers of the reinforcements not only destroyed his hopes, but resulted in his repulse and the necessity of retiring to his intrenchments at Corinth. The Southerners have fully redeemed themselves from any previous suspicions of unwillingness to fight by this battle. All the Federal accounts concur in the gallantry of the Southern soldiers, and the great ability and generalship of their officers. At the same time, the Northern men showed equal valour, otherwise the whole Northern army would have been dispersed on the first day. The Southern army was composed of Alabamians, Tennesseans, Mississippians, Texans, and Louisianians. The Northern men were from Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri, Michigan, and a few from Pennsylvania. Whilst there is great anxiety to receive other particulars of this fight, and to know all the details, the public turns still more anxiously to the York peninsula, where the next great battle must take place.

McClellan's advanced columns reached the front of the Yorktown intrenchments on Monday. He finds that the entire country, about six miles wide from York River to James River, has been thoroughly intrenched. In front of their intrenchments the ground is low, swampy, and almost impassable. The weather during the week has been very bad, and the troops, being without shelter, have suffered greatly. McClellan has about 125,000 men and 500 pieces of artillery. These intrenchments were originally held by Magruder with about 20,000 men; but it is now reported that heavy reinforcements have been sent to him, and that General Jo. Johnston has taken the command in person, and that there will be 60 or 70,000 behind these fortifications. Thus there will be considerably more difficulty than was expected, and the advance of the Federals looks likely to be most seriously contested; and the slaughter in Tennessee will be renewed at this point, perhaps exceeded. It may be several days before anything important transpires, as McClellan will probably endeavour to reduce the fortifications by gradual siege approaches, rather than risk the enormous loss of life which would follow an attempt to take them by assault.

We are also looking every moment for the re-appearance of the Virginia (Merrimac); and as the Federals have made very great preparations to destroy her, there will be a most terrific naval engagement whenever she presents herself. She would have been out before this, but for the severe storm. Yesterday and to-day being fair, we may hear important news from her by to-morrow.

We have no important military news from any other quarter; nothing from Porter's mortar fleet, which is at work at the Balize; nothing from Fort Pulaski, or from Burnside's corps. Fort Magon refuses to surrender, and will stand a siege.

Weeks are now valuable to the Confederates. May will soon be at hand, and you know the warmth of the sun, even as far north as Camden, South Carolina. The fate of Northern troops exposed to the heat of the latitude below 33 deg., with its attendant diseases, cannot be mistaken. Already we hear of very great sickness in the camps that have proceeded southward. The Southern accounts say, that nearly one-half of the soldiers that have been occupying Ship Island have died.

Taking the stock market as a barometer of the popular feeling, the effect of the news this week has not been invigorating. Stocks are all down, with the exception of Governments, which hold their own barely. The public are evidently stupefied at the contemplation of the loss of life that has taken place, and that which is still pending. Sterling exchange was scarcely so firm, but is held at 113, by regular bankers; gold went back to 101½—a most remarkable condition of affairs, and which cannot be explained on any of the well-established principles of political economy; but which, I think, can only be regarded as an abnormal state, and that ere long the legitimate laws of finance must assert their sway, and that the precious metals, in view of this enormous inflation, must speedily rise. Mr. Stevens, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and, of course, the highest authority on the subject, said, in his speech closing the debate on the Tax Bill, “that our debt on the 1st of July would be 800,000,000 dollars, and that our daily expenses are now 3,000,000 dollars per day.” And yet Government 6’s command as high a price to-day (94) as they did before the commencement of the war. How it is that this is managed it would be difficult to say.

I saw, yesterday, Mr. — (whom you know as one of our principal merchants), who had been to Nashville, and just returned. He is a very strong Union man, and has no sympathies with the Secession movement. In reply to my inquiries, he stated that the feeling in Nashville was intensely bitter and hostile to the Government; that even many who had been somewhat indifferent were now very much opposed to the Union; under a feeling of mortification that their section had been overcome—sectional pride having much to do with it—that his opinion was, that it would take many years to bring back anything like the former condition of things; and that if the Union troops went away, the country would go right back to secession; and that it was only in the presence of our troops that the people were restrained. Altogether, his account was entirely confirmatory of the absence of any change of sentiment. Still, he said, there were a great many Union men in Tennessee; but they had been Union men all the time, and that these men would now take possession of the political organization of the State, under the protection of the Federal armies, and that Tennessee would be nominally back into the Union. That the courts would soon recommence their jurisdiction; but, of course, their mandates could only be executed where the Government possessed the power to execute them.

The Bill for the Emancipation of the Slaves in the District of Columbia, having passed the Senate, is now before the House, and will become a law, as I do not believe the President will veto it. I doubt, however, whether there will be any other important agitation in the negro question.

OUR NEW YORK CORRESPONDENT.

NEW YORK, April 15th, 1862.

The most important intelligence since my last, is a confirmation of the belief then expressed, that the Confederates won the day in the two days’ fighting at Tennessee Landing. In the Sunday battle, it was freely admitted that the Federals received a terrible thrashing; but it has since been asserted by newspaper correspondents of the press only, that the disaster of Sunday was recovered from on Monday, though without any advantage being gained. Not a line confirming this alleged Union victory on Monday has been received officially by the Government; while the Confederate authorities have been promptly apprized by General Beauregard, that the result of the two days’ fighting was a complete success of the Southern arms. The victory has been duly acknowledged in the Confederate Congress, and it is believed in by the mass of the Northern people themselves.

Why, the people ask, if the Union forces actually won the battle, does not the commanding General officially announce the important fact? Why remain silent a whole week if such an immense triumph has been achieved? Why was it, if we won the victory, that only a few hundred prisoners were taken by our army, while the Southerners took eight or ten thousand, including one whole regiment en masse? Why was it, if our success was real, that we literally withdrew from or abandoned the field on the second day, and permitted the Confederates to return unmolested to their strong entrenchments, with thirty-six of our guns, a large quantity of ammunition, and thousands upon thousands of prisoners? These are pregnant questions, and hard to answer by those claiming a Federal victory; but they will carry their own answer to all unbiassed minds; for they show on their face a brilliant, and, as General Beauregard expresses it, a “complete victory.”

So much for the two greatest and bloodiest battles that have thus far, in this campaign, been fought on land; the South, under Beauregard, and the smiles of an approving Heaven, has won them both; and henceforth, whatever may be their future destiny, Bull’s Run and Tennessee Landing (or “Shiloh,” as Beauregard names the battle-field in his despatches) will occupy the very brightest pages in the history of Southern conquest,—pages whose lustre shall be dimmed alone by the one that shall record the glorious birth of Independence!

Since the great two days’ contest, the Federals have been busy with their despatches, killing off General Beauregard; but their despatches rest on no more foundation than do the false newspaper despatches concerning the result of the (to them) fatal engagement.

The latest admitted loss of the Federals in that engagement—is killed and wounded, 10,000; prisoners, 8,000; or a total of 18,000. These are their own figures; but it is probable that their actual loss was several thousand greater, or little short of 25,000! This would comprise about one-third of the army engaged.

Since Saturday last, the Northern public have been anxiously inquiring why it was the Monitor, the crack vessel of the Federal navy, permitted the Merrimac and her consorts to perform the bold stroke they did on the previous day, without an effort to block them in their “piratical” act? The fact is certainly a remarkable one; yet no explanation of the failure to “pitch in,” has been offered. The Confederates, with an air of defiance and conscious strength, steamed up to the Union sailing vessels, of which there were a score or so near by; but they all put to sea at a double quick rate, excepting three, which were secured, and taken into Norfolk. Contrary to the first report, they all had valuable cargoes on board, which, of course, came very acceptable in replenishing the Confederate locker. Several shots were fired at the saucy fellows by some of the Federal craft; but the great Monitor took the affair very quietly, and suffered the rich prize to escape with their booty.

The letters from Fortress Monroe state, that it was deeply mortifying and humiliating to witness the daring capture of the vessels, and I do not doubt it; but, strange to say, the only word offered in defence of the Monitor for lying carelessly by, a silent spectator of the scene, is “Red tape!” Of course there was a true reason for the inactivity of the Monitor, but what that true reason was is more than the writer can tell. What the writer and everyone else does know, however, is, that the assertion has been frequently and confidently made, on the part of the Federals, since the first encounter, that the Merrimac would be taken or sunk the very next time she ventured out. Yet here she was, on a fine clear day, and within easy range of the Monitor; but not a shot was fired, not a motion made to draw her antagonist into battle!

That the very mention of the word Merrimac keeps the public in a flutter, is easily perceivable; while to the army of McClellan, in its move toward Yorktown, she is decidedly in the way. If she sees fit, she can keep hovering about the defences in the vicinity of that point, and thus compel the Union army to suck their thumbs, instead of sleeping within the tents of Yorktown. She is, also, a secure protection to Norfolk from a sea attack; and, in helping to guard the defences of Yorktown, she at the same time has a vigilant eye upon the great naval storehouse of the South, at Norfolk. Were the Merrimac out of the way, the Monitor could probably shell Norfolk, and capture it; but, with such a “monster” around, she prefers to keep as quiet as possible.

All sorts of schemes have been set afloat by the Yankees to destroy this impediment in their progress in the Peninsula; no less, it is said, than two hundred plans having been received at the Navy Depot within a fortnight! Their nature, however, is kept mum, as the publication of them would put the enemy on his guard. A plan to board and capture her has been freely talked about; but such an exploit is out of the question. Before the Cumberland went down, it has transpired that three efforts were made by her desperate crew to board the leviathan, but they were abandoned as impossible; and this fact (the impossibility of boarding) is also confirmed by those who have been in close and full view of the Merrimac: her build is such as to secure her from capture by boarding, and the only way she can be disposed of is, to knock holes in her by means of powerful shot, and sink her.

From the best information I have been able to gather, the Merrimac was not materially injured in her five hours’ furious contest with the Monitor. A ball, entering one of her port-holes, dismounted a gun; and in dashing into the Monitor, her ram was knocked into a sort of curve; but both these mishaps have now been remedied, not only by a more formidable ram, but by the addition of heavier guns than she carried on her maiden-trip. She is at present under command of Captain Tatnall.

The entire fleet of the Confederates, on their reappearance, fairly numbered twelve vessels; a very respectable squadron for a single Confederate port. The South has certainly not slept much over its naval preparations the past year, while the quietness with which their movements were conducted is the marvel of the longest-headed Yankee in the land.

There is little new in commercial or financial affairs. Stagnation reigns supreme. Stocks are still dull and lower. Exchange flat at 12½, and cotton rather firmer.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

(FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.)

PARIS, 29th April, 1862.

I WRITE to prepare you for events of the utmost importance in their bearings upon the solution of the American problem. Without communicating to you details which are as yet, and perhaps will always be, secrets of State, and which come to me in such a manner, that I am not at liberty to use them, I may state that the Emperor has twice, through official channels, invited the British Government to co-operate with him in such a policy in regard to American affairs as would be most likely to bring about the termination of hostilities, and the opening of Confederate ports. I am further able to state, on undoubted authority, that he has for some time past been prepared either to recognize the Confederacy, or to declare the blockade ineffective, and, therefore, not obligatory. You will scarcely suspect me of making myself the chronicler of empty rumours when I add, that the Emperor has decided upon armed intervention, if friendly but firm remonstrances to the Federal Government should prove insufficient to put an end to the war.

From the first, the Emperor’s American policy has been far in advance of that pursued by Great Britain, and the delay of decisive action on his part heretofore may be ascribed solely to the obstinate inaction of your Government. His first representation was made as far back as June last, the second, some five or six weeks since. To both evasive and unsatisfactory replies have been made. I have reason to believe that France is now making to England the most urgent appeals for prompt and decided action. What may be the result, I have no means of foreseeing, but I am not without hopes that, reluctant as the Emperor is to act without the consent of England, if she still persists in her inaction, he will not much longer wait for her. You will have seen, by the newspapers, that a large squadron at Toulon, has received orders to take on board provisions, &c., for three months, and that the Couronne, an iron-clad steamer of the first-class, is to make an experimental voyage to America. I am inclined to think that these movements are intimately connected with, and closely concern, the cause of the Confederate States.

The three quasi Ministerial journals, the Patric, Pays, and Constitutionnel, which, for some months past, had observed most ominous silence on American affairs, have within a few days taken a very decided stand in favour of the South. All these symptoms I look upon as exceedingly encouraging to the cause you advocate, and lead me to believe that recognition, at least, is not very far distant. But I again repeat, the Emperor is unwilling to act without the concurrence of England; the continued obstinacy of whose Minister of Foreign Affairs, and blindness to what all here consider her obvious interest, may still produce delays. It does seem to me that if the next steamer does not bring news of any decided advantage obtained by the Federals, even Earl Russell will have to succumb to the pressure of popular opinion, which, from my point of view, appears to be well nigh unanimous in England, and is certainly so here in the higher classes.

I shall scarcely need to direct your attention to the sudden departure of the French Minister from Washington, on a visit to Richmond, as a most significant item of intelligence, especially when taken in connection with the information I send you.

I enclose the Constitutionnel of yesterday, 28th. The article I mark is valuable, from its being “inspired,” as I know positively, by M. Persigny.

Friends and foes of the South alike here consider the battle on the Tennessee as a brilliant success achieved by Beauregard. The “authorized” despatches from Washington, which attempt to palliate the disaster, are too clumsy to deceive anybody. It may be regarded as virtually admitted by the Federals, that the Confederates fell back slowly, and still fighting, behind their entrenchments, carrying with them all the prisoners (about 2000) taken, and 36 pieces of artillery they had captured the first day. Private letters received here cast strong doubts on the alleged death of General A. Sidney Johnson, and pronounce that part of Beauregard’s despatch referring to it fictitious.

The evacuation of Island No. 10 appears to offer a precise analogy to that of Manassas Junction, having taken place five days before the Federals were aware of it. No wonder it was a bloodless conquest. The 6000 prisoners so boastfully claimed by the Federals, evidently to counteract the effects at home and abroad, of the Corinth disaster, dwindled down to a few hundred sick and wounded. You should hear the comments of French officers on General Halleck's bulletins

THE GERMAN VIEW OF AMERICAN AFFAIRS. (FROM OUR BERLIN CORRESPONDENT.)

BERLIN, 24th April, 1862.

PERHAPS nowhere in Europe has more sympathy been evinced for the North than in Germany. This is mainly attributable to the prejudice of the Germans against slavery, and their ignorance of American affairs. When the war broke out in America there were not, probably, more than a score of men in Germany that would have been prepared to admit that the old Federal Union did not constitute a sovereign central Government. It is not difficult to discover the reason of this. The intercourse between Germany and the United States had been confined almost exclusively to the North. To the Northern States had flocked the hundreds of thousands of German emigrants, in search of employment, and with the exception of the tobacco, cotton, and naval stores shipped from a few Southern ports, nearly the entire commerce between Germany and America had been conducted through Northern channels. At this period very few Germans possessed well-founded conceptions of the nature of American politics, or the state of American society. The works published on these subjects were either too meagre, or too grossly inaccurate, to convey correct impressions. Amid the prevailing ignorance, however, it was known that the North was opposed to slavery, whilst the South favoured it. Strange as it may appear, Uncle Tom's Cabin probably did more than everything else to create a definite, though entirely, erroneous idea with respect to the South. As a consequence of the influence of this libel upon Southern society, it is not unusual to meet persons in Germany, who conscientiously believe, that, in the Southern States, the masters possess unlimited powers of life and death over their slaves, and may commit the most horrible enormities upon them with impunity.

By a certain class of the German population, America was usually considered a land of liberty, where every man could do as he pleased, pay no taxes, and grow wealthy at will, almost without effort. The German Governments, on the other hand, were accustomed to regard America as an asylum for their domestic enemies, a source of impoverishment to their states, in attracting a considerable portion of their industrial resources, and skilled labour; and as an arrogant Power, which demanded immunities for its citizens greater than the German States were willing to accord to their own citizens, or those of another state.

News of the commencement of the disintegration of the Federal Union reached Germany at the moment when the idea of a German Union had already acquired no insignificant importance. At once, those that advocated Union in Germany proclaimed their attachment and sympathy for the American Union, which was to serve as the model for Germany. There were not a few statesmen, however, who, jealous of England, saw in the dissolution of the Federal Union, the destruction of the political equilibrium of Europe, as Great Britain, it was thought, would recover the supremacy of the sea. Others, again, saw without regret the fall of a Government, that had rendered itself obnoxious to Europe by its pretensions. In most of these cases, there was no inquiry made about the differences between the North and the South. The Union was sustained or opposed for its own sake.

Before the fall of Fort Sumter there were few statesmen, if any, in Germany who supposed that a war would be the result of the secession of the Southern States. When, however, the news of the proclamation of the blockade, and of the preparations for war made by Mr. Lincoln, was received, the Germans commenced to give to the subject their attention. Their interest in American affairs increased, as the consequences of the war made themselves more and more felt. Trade with America became stagnant, owing to the impossibility of procuring Southern productions, and of getting German manufactures to the South through the North. The Morrill tariff-bill had already created great dissatisfaction amongst the manufacturing and commercial classes in Germany. Still, the disastrous effects of this measure of protection on German industry were forgotten in the general commercial stagnation produced by the war. And so the one wish for peace took the place of all others.

Even before the commencement of hostilities, as uniformly since, the Federal Government had assiduously endeavoured to produce the impression through its agents in Germany, that the secession of the Southern States was only a rebellion of a small minority of discontented persons in those States. A few weeks, it was said, would suffice to suppress the Rebellion. In the meantime, the only information which reached the public in Germany was that contained in extracts from ultra-abolition journals of the North, and in the newspaper correspondence from Germans in the Northern States. Not a word was received from the South, and not a single journal in Germany is known to have undertaken to advocate the claims of Southern independence. It seemed generally conceded, that a conspiracy of slave-owners—for such the Washington Government proclaimed secession to be—could not be other than wicked. Can we, then, wonder, that the sympathies of the masses of the Germans at once became enlisted in behalf of the Union? Besides, not a doubt of the ability of the Federal Government to suppress the Rebellion was then entertained, and it was popularly accepted, that slavery must now receive its final blow.

The Washington Government, counting upon the prejudice against slavery existing in Germany, spared no pains to produce the impression that the great philanthropic object of the war was, the extinction of slavery in the United States.

When the news of the Battle of Bull's Run reached Germany public opinion received a shock, from which it has never recovered. The astonishment caused by this news was greater than that which followed upon the Battle of Solferino, and the war thus acquired an importance which it could not easily have obtained otherwise. Yet the German press continued to produce only the Northern side of the question. Whatever could be found in favour of the North was carefully translated and published in the newspapers.

The press, with very few exceptions, not only advocated the cause of the Union, but refrained from publishing anything from the English or French journals favourable to the South.

The series of defeats experienced by the North, on the heel of the destruction of the "grand army of the Potomac," and the incessant boastings of the Federal Government, finally produced their natural results. Military men in Germany began to examine the question attentively. The results of the operations of the Federal army, the information furnished by the English and French press, and that derived from intercourse with Southerners travelling or residing in Germany, were sufficient to cause a large number of officers to view Secession and the war from a far different standpoint. Nothing, perhaps, gained the South more consideration and sympathy with military men in Germany than the superiority of its army-organization over that of the North. Moreover, the prevalence of a strong esprit de corps amongst German officers contributed most materially to the extension of more just opinions with regard to the South.

At the same time, the Governments of Germany were not long in discovering, through their diplomatic agents, the true state of affairs in America. Gradually public opinion was undergoing a change, the more thorough because of the deceptions sought to be practised by the Government and press of the North. Still, there remained many of the type of the ultra-abolitionists of the North and of England, who rejected all propositions for the restoration of peace, except at the price of the extermination of slavery. With certain classes it continued to be a source of national pride to hear it stated by correspondents of the press, that the German population in America was rendering the most important services to the Union. By degrees the belief impressed itself upon large numbers that the preservation of the Federal Union depended entirely upon the German element in the North. The party opposed to extreme democratic institutions naturally espoused the cause of the South. A partiality for slavery cannot be said to have induced this result; it was simply the notion that the South was farther removed from Red Republicanism than the North. The friendship of this party for the South was alone potent enough to render the opposition of the ultra-democratic party more unrelenting.

By whatever party-name they may designate themselves, the Red Republicans of Germany have shown the bitterest hostility towards the South. Without regard to consistency, the so-called National party in Germany has supported the Federal Union. For if the avowed programme of this party is entitled to credence, it has for its object to secure a union of the German States very similar to that of the Southern States of America, although far more limited. Any attempt to institute a form of union which ignored the sovereignty of the separate German States would meet with no more violent opposition than from the National party. Not from any just appreciation of the differences between the North and the South has the Union received the support of this party. It was the magic influence of the word "union," effacing all defects, and revealing only perfections. Slavery and union have been the two words of direful import for the cause of the South in Germany.

As time passed away, and the North failed to gain any success over the South, the enthusiasm of the friends of the North in Germany began to abate. The press, although reproducing everything which could benefit the North, ceased to comment upon the prospects of the Union. For several months scarcely a leading article appeared in a German newspaper on the American War. Quite remarkable is it, that not more than two or three pamphlets in the German language have been published to compensate for the meagreness of the information regarding American affairs afforded by the German journals. Whilst England and France have been flooded with defences of the South, only a single work has appeared in Germany as the champion of Southern rights.

Yet, with far inferior advantages for judging correctly, the public sentiment of Germany has been considerably modified, if not materially changed, in favour of the Southern Confederacy.

When the vastly exaggerated accounts of the Federal victory at Fort Donnellson were received, confidence in the ability of the North to conquer the South was rapidly expiring. This event served to revive the hopes of the friends of the Union in Germany, and had considerable influence upon those who were not yet convinced that the efforts of the North must prove futile. The censorship of the press in the North is having an effect unfavourable for the Union. One cannot fail to perceive a tendency to discredit everything reported by the Federal Government. Newspapers have commenced the practice of adding a note of warning to the telegrams received; and special confirmation of any accounts reported are beginning to be absolutely necessary, as many attach little or no importance to Northern accounts on their first reception. Pertinacity in false representations and boastings on the part of the Washington Government, the puerile statesmanship of the Northern Secretary of State, and the action of the North in the case of the Trent, have done much, though slowly, to alienate the sympathies of the Germans from the North, and to destroy all confidence in the Federal Government.

Nothing has probably so astonished the Germans as the conduct of the negroes in the South during this war. Where they have been expecting to hear of slave-insurrections, they have heard of slaves fighting for their masters. The colonization schemes of the North are beginning to be understood; and the Germans are rapidly ceasing to consider the extinction of slavery the object of the war. Dispel this illusion, and the principal link of sympathy between the Germans and the North will be broken.

If we restrict our inquiries to the two great Powers of Germany, Austria and Prussia, and to the commercial part of Germany, the Hanse-towns, we find that there is in reality no sympathy for the Union on the part of the Governments of either of these States. The Republican Administration made its first blunder with Austria by sending as Minister to the Imperial Court the most objectionable man in all America, the man that had moved the recognition of the Italian Kingdom in the United States Congress. Martin Kosta has not yet been forgotten by the Austrians; and although Austria breaks no faith towards the Federal Union, she has no sympathy for it.

To Prussia the arrogance of the Federal Government for the last few years, in demanding immunities for adopted citizens of Prussian birth, has become intolerable. The United States Government has not hesitated to enforce its demands by implied threats, without regard to the public law of Europe or the municipal law of Prussia. We do not believe that there exists at this moment any sympathy whatever on the part of the Prussian Government for the success of the Union over the South.

Evidently the higher classes and most of the officers of the army in Prussia sympathize heartily with the Southern Confederacy. The Government organ has gone so far as to express the conviction of the impossibility of a reconstruction of the American Union, and to counsel a peaceable separation as the most advisable for both North and South.

Bremen and Hamburg are cities which derive a great part of their prosperity from trade in Southern productions. Although these two cities experienced great advantages, by speculation, from the blockade for a time, the effect of no trade with the South has already commenced to react severely upon them. It is no secret that they would gladly acknowledge the Southern Confederacy if they dared; but that they would prefer to see the South victorious. Their sympathies are strongly in favour of the South, whether they be actuated by interest or sentiment.

Daily the Germans are becoming more familiar with the questions at issue in America, and in the same degree as their acquaintance with facts increases, do their sympathies change from the North to the South.

OUR HAVANAH CORRESPONDENT.

HAVANNA, 6th April, 1862.

Two steamers have arrived from New Orleans from Beswick's Bay, bringing several well-known merchants from New Orleans, with whom I have conversed; they tell me that the cotton burning question is settled, and that the possession of the cotton ports by the enemy will not open the cotton trade, or induce planters to send their cotton to market. The people feel assured, and believe that even should they fail to hold the ports, they cannot at any rate hold the country, and prevent cotton being sent to the ports; it will be a life and death struggle, and may be indefinitely prolonged.

The Southerners who have arrived here all agree in saying that though the North may carry on the war for years, they feel certain of their ability to resist. This is the universal feeling; and such people in such a country cannot be conquered; their powers of resistance will be severely tested, but the final result is not doubtful.

Since the arrival of the Vera Cruz steamer, rumours are rife here that the American Minister, Mr. Corwin, is about to conclude, or has already concluded, a treaty with the Juarez Government, contemplating pecuniary and military assistance against the allies, in consideration for important cessions of territory. These rumours are generally believed to be well founded.

MR. YANCEY'S RETURN HOME.

(From the New Orleans Picayune.)

We have the pleasure of announcing the arrival in our city, by the Opelousas Railroad, of the Hon. Wm. L. Yancey, one of the Confederate States Commissioners to Europe. He came from Havana, as announced in a special telegraphic despatch, in the schooner Wide Awake.

Mr. Yancey is in excellent health and spirits, though somewhat fatigued by his voyage.

He was received at the Opelousas ferry landing by a number of his friends and fellow-citizens, by whom he was accompanied to his lodgings.

On entering the rotunda of the hotel, on his return from dinner, about ten o'clock in the evening, a large crowd met Mr. Yancey and insisted on his addressing them, which he did in a speech of about a half hour.

He remarked, on rising, that it was within ten days of a year since he left the country as the representative of the Confederate States, to endeavour to procure the recognition of that independence for which his countrymen were gallantly contending. He should, undoubtedly, surprise his auditors when he told them that they had no friends in Europe; that they must depend for the accomplishment of the end for which they are striving upon themselves alone. And what he said of European feeling with regard to this Confederacy was equally true of its feeling towards the North, whose people, whose government, and whose press, the statements and writings of whose public men and literary writers, they believed to be altogether mendacious. The sentiment of Europe was anti-slavery, and that portion of public opinion which formed, and was represented by the Government of England, was abolition. At the same time it is very well understood and believed, that the pretences upon which this war was inaugurated, and is carried on by the North against us, were utterly false. They would never recognize our independence until our conquering sword hung dripping over the prostrate heads of the North. Their opinion of the character of the people of these States, and of the cause in which we are engaged, was derived altogether from Northern sources. They never see the journals and the periodicals of the South, and all the accounts they receive with regard to us come to them filtered through those of the North. They believe that we are a brave and determined people, and that we are resolved upon obtaining our independence by the most unyielding devotion to the cause in which we are contending. But they would like to see the two confederacies crippled by the war, and so would give aid to neither. He alluded to the erroneous and hostile opinions entertained in England with regard to the people of these States, which had been sedulously inculcated by the North, by whom we were habitually represented as cruel, lawless, and oppressive; that the owner had the liberty to treat his slave without reference to the laws of society or nature, and that the slaves were bred as the English breed their Durham cattle, &c. As to the blockade, he said that the nations of Europe would never raise it until it suited their interest. In his own private opinion, he believed that that necessity would occur by a very early day. He said it was an error to say that "Cotton is King." It is not. It is a great and influential power in commerce, but not its dictator. He alluded to the dependence which British statesmen placed upon the probability of obtaining cotton from other sources than America, and showed that this, to any practical extent or purpose, was impossible, and that the idea was a fallacy. He thought, he said, that the blockade was a blessing to the Confederate States, for it was teaching, nay, compelling, us to depend upon ourselves, and to do that for ourselves for which we have hitherto been depending upon others, and they our deadliest foes. Mr. Yancey then counselled a firm, united, and generous support of the Government which has just been inaugurated. The chosen and the choosers were both in the same boat. The storm was raging, the wind was howling, and the waves were beating upon our bark. We had placed them at the helm. They might commit errors, but all history teaches that when there is mutiny in the crew the bark must go down. He concluded by expressing the strongest confidence in the final success of the cause in which we are engaged; and at the close was greeted with the most enthusiastic cheers.

After a few eloquent remarks by Dr. Holland, in the same vein, and in the course of which the speaker bore testimony, as an eye witness, to the able and faithful manner in which Mr. Yancey discharged his mission in Europe, the assemblage separated.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

[From the Richmond Examiner, March 19.]

We learn that yesterday a Message from the President was sent into Congress, in secret session, recommending that all our prisoners who had been put on parole by the Yankee Government be released from the obligation of their parole, so as to bear arms in our struggle for independence.

The recommendation was urged as a retaliation for the infamous and reckless breach of good faith on the part of the Northern Government with regard to the exchange of prisoners, and was accompanied by the exposure of this perfidy in a lengthy correspondence conducted by the War Department. We have been enabled to extract the points of this interesting correspondence.

It appears, from the correspondence, that at the time permission was asked by the Northern Government for Messrs. Fish and Ames to visit their prisoners within the jurisdiction of the South, our Government, while denying this permission, sought to improve the opportunity by concerting a settled plan for the exchange of prisoners. For the execution of this purpose, Messrs. Conrad and Seddon were deputed by our Government as Commissioners to meet those of the Northern Government under a flag of truce at Norfolk.

Subsequently, a letter from Gen. Wool was addressed to Gen. Huger, informing him that he (Gen. Wool) had full authority to settle any terms for the exchange of prisoners, and asking an interview on the subject. Gen. Howell Cobb was then appointed by the Government to mediate with Gen. Wool, and to settle a permanent plan for the exchange of prisoners during the war. The adjustment was considered to have been satisfactorily made.

It was agreed that the prisoners of war in the hands of each Government should be exchanged, man for man, the officers being assimilated as to rank, &c.; that our privateersmen should be exchanged on the footing of prisoners of war; that any surplus remaining on either side, after these exchanges, should be released, and that hereafter, during the whole continuance of the war, prisoners taken on either side should be paroled.

In carrying out this agreement, our Government has released some 300 prisoners above those exchanged by the North, the balance in the competing numbers of prisoners in the hands of the two Governments being so much in our favour. At the time, however, of sending North the hostages we had retained for our privateersmen, Gen. Cobb had reason to suspect the good faith of the Northern Government, and telegraphed in time to intercept the release of a portion of these hostages, (among them Col. Corcoran,) who were en route from points further South than Richmond to go North under a flag of truce to Norfolk. A number of these hostages, however, had already been exchanged.

It now appears that, in contravention of the solemn agreement of the Northern Government, not one of our privateersmen has been released, and the Port Donnelson prisoners, instead of being paroled, have been taken into the interior, where they are still confined.

As a judgment upon this open and shameless perfidy of the North, it is proposed that our prisoners, who have been paroled by the Yankees, shall be released from their obligations. There is as little doubt of the honour of such a proposition as there is of its justice and meetness as a retaliatory measure for an act of flagrant perfidy.

At a large meeting at Ashton-under-Lyne on Wednesday, the following resolution was adopted by a majority:—

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, it is the bounden duty of the people in the manufacturing districts of Great Britain and Ireland to use every moral means in their power, and to memorialise Parliament for the recognition of the Southern Confederacy, and an alteration in the maritime law of nations, that neutral ships of commerce shall pass freely over the waters of the world."

THE RUSSIAN ARMY.—For a long time after her Crimean disasters Russia ceased to recruit. A letter from St. Petersburg of the 21st, states that, "among the serious reforms contemplated in the War Department, that affecting the recruiting system is expected very shortly. The commission appointed for the purpose has decided on the principles of the project, and the Emperor has approved of them. All classes, without exception, will be liable to serve. Those who may be disposed to exonerate themselves will have to pay a certain fixed sum, and the Government will find substitutes in their place, choosing old soldiers in preference. The term of service is to be ten years, instead of fifteen."

WHO HELPS THE SOUTHERNERS?

THE following passages occur in a letter in the Globe of this evening, signed "A Liverpool Shipowner":—

"For the information of your contemporary, therefore, I may tell him—the greatest adepts in getting in screw steamers both from English ports and the Continent, are the Americans themselves located in Europe, who, since the repeal of the Navigation Laws, find no difficulty in making a vessel quasi English. But what is England's position and interest all this while? Is it to her interest to be with the Confederates and their 'domestic institution' and free trade, or with the Federals in their hostile tariffs and hostile institutions? for there can be no mistake about the latter. I fancy many of your readers would say, 'Free trade and peace for me' (and which, whenever the Confederate Government is recognized, we shall have)—whilst, I am quite certain, were even the Member for Birmingham himself to go round and poll the whole of the manufacturing districts tomorrow, he would find the majority in favour of 'Free trade and the Confederate States.'"

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

The Times correspondent in Mexico, reviewing the state of affairs in that country on the 26th of March, the date of his letter, says that the Juarez Government has begun to levy forced contributions and taxes on foreigners. Numbers of foreigners, he says, have been ruined by these exactions, but the United States Minister, Mr. Corwin, has, nevertheless, gone out of his way to declare the tax legal. "Not satisfied with the forced contribution, the Government has just decreed a 'forced loan for 1,000,000 dols., to be apportioned among forty individuals, of whom some are Spaniards, and clearly exempted by treaty.'" The correspondent then continues:—

"All these iniquities, however, sink into insignificance when compared with the execution, or more properly speaking, the murder of General Robles. This gentleman, formerly Minister to the United States, served under Miramon; when the outrage upon the British legation was perpetrated he at once threw up his commission. He was arrested when within three leagues of the French outposts. The news of his arrest was telegraphed by Mendoza, the commandant of Puebla, on the night of the 21st. No reply was sent to this telegram, as Mendoza was known to be a friend of the general's, but a courier was sent off at once with directions to avoid Puebla, and make his way direct to San Andres de Chichicomula, the head-quarters of the Mexican army, with orders to try him under that disgraceful law of the 25th of January, and shoot him at once. Immediately his arrest became known every possible interest was made on his behalf. Being universally respected as a gentleman, a man of honour, and one who had the interest of his country really at heart, he commanded the sympathies of all parties. This was enough to insure his condemnation with the present party. Notwithstanding the most urgent interference on the part of Baron Wagner, and in open violation of the preliminaries, he was shot as a traitor on the morning of the 24th. Within my recollection no event has created so great a sensation in Mexico."

"The number of French troops who took up their quarters at Tehuacan appear to have been about 3000. Since then further reinforcements have arrived at Vera Cruz; and it is expected by the end of the month that General Lorencez will have about 10,000 men under his command—a force more than sufficient to make their way from one end of the Republic to the other. Yesterday advices reached this city that General Prim had been superseded by General Dulce, who had arrived at Vera Cruz, some say, with an additional 6000 men. Mr. Corwin has been indefatigable in his endeavours to frustrate the objects of the intervention. He has been doing his utmost to support the present Government by every means in his power; and to-day it is confidently reported that a treaty was signed yesterday, 'by which Mexico was to cede to the United States a portion of the Northern States and the waste lands in other parts of the Republic, receiving in return some 20,000,000 dols., and the assistance of 8000 men.' Although I cannot positively affirm that this treaty has been signed, yet I know that it has been for some time under consideration, and that it is nearly sure to be so as soon as certain intelligence of the march of the French reaches the capital."

"A Conservative organ, published under the rose, has just been handed to me, which states that the chiefs of that party have agreed to the following Articles:—

"1. To recognize Almonte as chief of the Republic and of the forces which adhere to this plan."

"2. The said Almonte to be fully empowered to enter into an arrangement with the chiefs of the allied forces to convoke a National Assembly, to take into consideration the deplorable state of the country, decide upon the form of government, put a stop to anarchy, and assure to Mexicans peace and order."

"This shows pretty clearly the opinion of that party."

The Little Rock True Democrat asserts, that when the enemy invaded Benton and Washington counties, Ark., the Federal commanders, took all young men they could find, put arms in their hands, then placed them in the front ranks, and told them they must fight. They were compelled to take the oath.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 1, 1862.

Our Name.

THE choice of name for a newspaper must needs be arbitrary, and is even more a matter of fancy than the choice of name for a child. No one expects an "Examiner" to be more acute in penetration, a "Spectator" to be more contemplative, an "Observer" more quick-sighted, or a "Courier" more expeditious than other journals less well-named. Nor would it be easy to discover any special appropriateness or inappropriateness in the currently accepted newspaper nomenclature, which ransacks the firmament and all that therein is, the beasts and fowls of the earth, and even the insect world, in search of its vocabulary.

While, then, we may claim that our name is no more inappropriate, nor more oddly sounding to the ear when first used, than newspaper names generally, we may also claim for it the rare merit of originality and novelty. But we contend that our name is by no means so inappropriate as at first glance might appear. If THE INDEX should be fortunate enough to point the way to a more speedy settlement of the unfortunate American war, or if it should serve as a guide to a better understanding of the real character of a greatly-calumniated people, we might well congratulate ourselves on the choice of our title.

The manners and customs of the Confederate States, their resources and capabilities, and the real status of their people in the work of civilization, are still a sealed book to the intelligence of Europe, despite the labours of statisticians, travellers, publicists, and philosophers. If to this sealed book, which contains much worth studying, THE INDEX can act that humble part which is intended to awake the interest of an indifferent reader, and induce him to turn over the pages, we shall have attained the highest reward of our labours. And if we can perform the same modest office for the people of the Confederate States, and tempt them to delve more deeply than heretofore, into the rich mines of British thought, and bring them back to a closer intellectual communion with the parent source of their language and literature, we shall have made THE INDEX both a significant and a proud name.

Our Object.

It has been thought advisable to issue this Journal for the following reasons:—In the first place, there are many millions of people, kinsmen of the people of this country, who have now been for some time shut out from all communication with the rest of the civilized world. To any statement of the loss and suffering they endure, it will be replied, that these are the consequences brought upon themselves by their own act; but the blockade which stifles them is also, in one most important direction, a blockade of the industry of Europe. Great interests are affected by it, entirely innocent of offence. If the Southern States formed a country like Japan or Madagascar, it might be of little concern here what the destruction of property or life with which they are visited, simply because they desire that self-government which Englishmen practise themselves, and usually commend to others. But, instead of isolation of this kind, they are more peculiarly and closely connected with the largest industrial class of Europe than any other country whatever. When interests so great as these are thus interwoven, nothing that affects the one can be matter of indifference to the other.

In the next place, it is notorious that the Government of Washington exercises now another rigid blockade,—that of the intelligence of the Northern people; permitting only that to pass which has first obtained its approval. The system of passports, and the employment of spies, has indeed been abandoned; but its control of the telegraph and censorship of the press have become more and more rigid. In many countries freedom of the press is restrained by law, and infractions of such law are visited with the penalties provided for them. In the United States the perfect freedom of the press is an absolute provision of the Federal Constitution, which declares, "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." Hence it is altogether beyond the power of the Supreme Legislature of the country to enact any law interfering with the liberty of the press, which stands upon the same foundation, and is sanctioned by the same authority as the Congress or the President, for all came into existence under the provisions of the same instrument. And if there be any one of them which was held more sacred than the others by those who framed that Constitution, that one is the freedom of the press. Thus, when the State of Virginia ratified the Constitution, she passed a declaratory Act, bearing date 26th June, 1788, in which are these words,—"The liberty of conscience and of the press cannot be cancelled, abridged, restrained, or modified by any authority of the United States." But what the law cannot do, and what the Constitution absolutely prohibits, is now in full operation by those who are urging this war in the name of that Constitution; who vindicate their reverence for it by treating its enactments with contempt, and, with a logic happily unknown in Europe, break it to keep it intact.

Three great political principles were especially cherished by the founders of the Republic—freedom of person, of speech, of the press. The whole of these have been violated, not in some special instance, under peculiar circumstances, with hesitation or regret, but openly, throughout the whole of the North, on the most trivial occasions, and without the slightest affectation of concern. Apologists plead as an excuse, that the national safety is in jeopardy. Is, then, a Constitution intended as a guide in days of tranquility and ease alone? Freedom of person or of speech will not be endangered in times of prosperity and peace, but in those of turmoil and excitement; and thus at the only time when these safeguards of the Constitution come into vitality, they are spurned. This is as if a shelter should be carefully preserved so long as there be sunshine, to be levelled with the ground when it begins to rain.

And where is this national safety endangered? The Federal Union consists of an indefinite number of distinct states, each separately organized. At what particular cypher of an indeterminate number does the national safety reside? That number is now 34 states, but the national safety was not a matter of apprehension when there were but 20. It may be answered, that there has been a principle of constant growth, entirely free from danger. But the Union has safely existed under a reduced number. Of the 13 original states only 11 were in the Union for a period of two years. Where was the national safety then? Texas was an independent sovereign state, acknowledged as such by several Powers. The safety of no one was endangered by this, and if there was security at that period, why this alarm because Texas reverts to the position she held before? Further, the Constitution expressly provides for a condition of affairs in which one-third of the states then existing might be apart from and foreign to the rest. This is all that Secession amounts to—that a third of the states desired to occupy that position, in relation to the rest for which the Constitution expressly provided in the first instance.

But whatever the hollowness or the validity of the excuses for the existing state of affairs, there can exist no doubt as to the fact that all the intelligence permitted to the public in the Northern States, and transmitted to Europe, is confined to such statements as meet the views of the Washington Government. The ear of Europe is condemned on the one side to silence, and on the other to listen only to that which has passed through a bureau, and has been approved by a censor. If this be so, it cannot but be desirable that some means should be provided through which the public may be enabled to hear both sides. None will dispute the old adage that "one tale's good until the other's told." The only manner in which intelligence can be obtained from the South, at the present time, is by the letters arriving, many of them from Englishmen and from writers whose standing in the community is well known. Of these not a few are coloured with strong personal feeling, but the majority contain information of much value. We shall be enabled largely to avail ourselves of these sources of information, and it is believed that, by a continuous and careful selection from them, much truth may be elicited. We propose to give weekly all intelligence of interest received from the North, and to accompany it with a commentary, in which we shall endeavour to point out what may appear to us entirely fictitious and what exaggerated. In this task we have reason to expect the assistance of those who, from long residence in the country, will be able to bring to the investigation the best of all implements—knowledge.

Of the importance of arriving at the truth in the present conjuncture few can entertain a doubt. There is, indeed, no problem of which the correct solution is so essential to Europe at the present moment as that which involves the question, whether a new Power is really added to the family of nations—whether a great outlet for the industry, and a vast field for the enterprize, of the Old World, are cleared from artificial obstructions; or whether this great movement is to prove but any abortive effort, to be crushed by greater power, and swell still further the magniloquence of 4th of July orations? It may be said that time will assuredly answer the question. But the steed starves whilst the grass is growing. Tens of thousands are pining in want this day, and their number must increase week by week; these cannot bid their hunger wait for years. The day will assuredly arrive when it must become the imperative duty of the European Governments to decide the question for themselves. Here, over a dominion the size of twenty kingdoms, there exists a Government now in the second year of its existence, appointed by the formal action of the Legislature of each of the Confederate States, and in each of them sanctioned by a vote of the people—maintaining in the field an army of more than 300,000 men—upheld by many millions of people, with a self-sacrifice, a devotion, and a unanimity rarely equalled in modern history, and sustaining law, order, freedom of speech and freedom of the press throughout its wide domain. As a question of fact, is this a Government or is it not? Once admitted to be such, it is then the bounden duty of other Powers to acknowledge and recognize the fact. If disputed, and held to be only an effort to form a Government, the Powers will, in that view, await the development of events. When and how finally to decide is an anxious consideration very rapidly approaching, critical in its consequences both to the Old and the New World. What effort can be idle whose aim is to bring forward evidence, and throw light upon the subject?

But when we state that the leading object of this journal will be to advocate the cause of the Southern Union, let it not be assumed that this will be done in the spirit of heated partizans. We believe it to be the cause of justice and of truth, and hold that it cannot be served by suppressing truth or distorting it. Our columns will be open to any writer of ability on the other side. The defects and shortcomings of the Southern States we shall make no attempt to conceal; on the contrary, we propose to call an error an error, and a defect a defect; taking as a guide the last message of the Southern President to its Congress, in which facts grievously depressing are stated in simple English, with that manly candour which is above the fear of shrinking from the truth. There are those who thought the tone of that message, contrasting so directly as it did with the Northern style, was a proof of debility, if not of abandoned hope. Let those who thus judged study the events that have since occurred; the endurance of that little island, the vigour displayed at the battle in Tennessee, the judgment in the defence of Yorktown, the skill in the construction of the Merrimac; and they will find that these qualities may exist, and do exist, without Mr. Lincoln's policy of concealment, or the boastful arrogance of the North.

The Latest News from the War.

THE latest news from the war is calculated to verify the opinions of those who, from the first, held it to be impossible to subjugate a country so vast and so difficult as the Southern States, if the people were resolved to be free. For the first campaign of the Northern army allowances were naturally made. It was obvious that sufficient time had not elapsed to permit of that degree of discipline, without which an invading army must be exposed to disaster, and, if repulsed, to ruin. This cannot now be alleged. Six months were devoted to drill, and nothing but drill; all the materials of war were collected with an energy and recklessness of cost both unequalled. The number was stated at 700,000, and probably has actually reached 500,000 men under arms; and when so enormous an army was launched against forces very much smaller, with very inferior equipments, with resources impoverished and blockaded, it was natural for all who regarded merely the surface of things to look forward to a triumphal march. To the eye of the politicians of New York, the prospect would be still more delusive. With regiments of brave men hourly passing along Broadway; with evidences on all sides of the marvellous energy, wealth, and power, which every visitor to that city beholds with astonishment; with drums and flags and news-boys, and sympathetic excitement so contagious and so intoxicating—how was it possible for men, animated by passionate feelings and surrounded by such circumstances, to withdraw the mind from their influence, and look thoughtfully into other considerations distant and obscure, but which, on the actual field of battle, decide the fate of a campaign, or the issue of a war?

In truth, correct opinions were equally impossible with either section of the excited combatants, and could only be expected from those able to judge with calmness, to estimate the real proportions of facts, and, from experience or study of military history, to appreciate and foresee the difficulties which would be experienced in such an enterprise. This great army, after long preparation, moved forward, apparently with irresistible weight. The usual expression in the North was, not that it would defeat its opponents, but that it would "crush" them. At first there were small successes magnified, and proclaimed so loudly that many wavered in opinion as to the result. But who ever heard of an invasion that was not at first successful? No movement of the kind is attempted except by a superior force; and at the first onset that superiority sweeps all before it, as a great wave moving onward to the shore. But after a time that wave has lost its united force, it sinks into the sand, or falls back broken and subdued. This is really the question; not what may be the invading force or the effect of its first onset, but how far the impulsion will carry it, whether overwhelmingly to the end, or but midway to idle purpose.

The campaign is now, in point of time, far advanced; and what is the position of the Northern armies? That in the far West, as a result of the so-called victory of Pea Ridge, is driven out of Arkansas, and has fallen back into Missouri. That of the centre has narrowly escaped destruction on the Tennessee, and claims a victory because it was not wholly destroyed, and only lost a few thousand prisoners and 30 or 40 guns. That of the East, after an unhappy march, solely to contemplate the scene of former defeat and return from it, is now arrested at Yorktown, with all military probabilities strong against it. From the expeditions on the coasts there come few tidings. To the North no news is bad news. An expenditure of three millions of dollars every day, and the rapid approach of the sickly season, are matters that cannot brook delay. In addition to these facts, there are others of grave importance. The empty theory, so often reiterated, of "Union sentiment" is thoroughly exposed; the negroes, said to be so cruelly used, strange to say, took no advantage of the opportunity to rise upon or even to desert their old masters; and the determination of the people of the South is proved in the destruction of their property as the invaders approach it.

The latest accounts render it plain that the battle on the Tennessee was a decided victory for the South. On the first day they routed the Northern army, captured a division with its general, drove the Federals to the river's brink, and occupied the whole of their camps. Night came on, during which the Federals were largely reinforced; but in spite of this the Southern army renewed the attack on the following morning, and again with success up to two o'clock. The magnitude of the reinforcements received by the Federals then induced General Beauregard to fall back to his original position, which he did in perfect order, unmolested by the enemy, who were in little condition to follow him; and taking with him the prisoners and guns he had captured. These are the facts deduced from Northern accounts. By the present mail it appears that Beauregard asserts the number of his prisoners to be 8000 to 10,000. In that of the guns he differs by one only from a detailed Northern account.

It appears that a Northern "semi-official" account has been published, which states that the Southern army was routed, and is now shut up in Corinth. Statements of this kind are a matter-of-course. What can be the use of controlling all the intelligence of a country to give facts simply as they occur? All Governments desire to avoid, if they can, the publication of disaster: and, in this case, the war, and all its consequences, absolutely depend on credit which may be prostrated any day by a panic. The statement itself is very easily seen through. If the Confederates were "routed," how comes it they were able to carry off, not only their own guns, but thirty-five or thirty-six of those of the enemy; and if General Grant pursued, how comes it he only went as far as "previous orders permitted?" Was anything in war ever heard of more absurd than orders to prevent a commander pursuing a "routed" enemy? What is the object of fighting a battle if the fruits of success are not to be gathered? Besides, General Grant himself states: "My force was too much fatigued, from two days' hard fighting and exposure in the open air to a drenching rain during the night, to pursue immediately." The account given by a Northern paper, the Gazette, appears to give the real truth, in these words: "On Sunday we were pushed from disaster to disaster, till we lost every division camp we had, and were driven within half a mile of the landing, when the approach of night, the timely aid of the gunboats, the tremendous efforts of our artillerists, and Buell's approach, saved us. On Monday, after nine hours' hard fighting, we simply regained what we had lost on Sunday; not a division advanced half a mile beyond our old camps of Monday except General Wallace's. The lowest estimates place our loss, in killed and wounded, at 3300, and in prisoners 3300 to 4000." That this was a great battle, and a victory to one side or the other, is very clear; and it is usually considered that victory rests with those who take the prisoners and guns, and not with those who lose them. Its moral effect throughout the South is apparent in many directions, and this is the most important of all the results of victory.

The statement that Fort Pulaski has fallen appears to be true, although given in the form of all most improbable—that of a surrender to gunboats. That it must fall if attacked from the rear has been regarded as certain, and this may have occurred. Isolated as it stands at present, the event would have little importance, were it not that it will enable the gunboats to enter the Savannah River, and proceed towards the city: which, however, has repelled before now the attack of a great fleet and a combined army, and that when a village as compared with its present importance.

The Merrimac has again given considerable annoyance by the capture of three Northern vessels within sight of their fleet. Surprise is expressed that she did not proceed to attack the Monitor; but the harbour of Hampton Roads is very much restricted by shallows, as the last conflict proved, and it would hardly suit the Merrimac, with her draught of water, to give to the Monitor the selection of the spot for an engagement. Besides, she has a far more important duty to perform than that of engaging the Monitor, which is to keep the James River closed. In the present critical state of affairs at the lines of Yorktown, her service in sealing the James River is of more value than an army of 30,000 men. It would, therefore, be unwise to enter from choice into any encounter in which she might be disabled, even but for a few days.

The latest telegram gives the important intelligence that "General McClellan is in the best spirits, and sanguine of his ability to drive the enemy out of Yorktown and Virginia." Favourable facts must be very scanty when such information as this is conveyed to Europe. Nor is it apparent why that General's spirits should be so buoyant on making the discovery that he has placed himself in the most hopeless position ever occupied by an army in modern times. The Southern States cover a million of square miles, and in all that expanse it is difficult to discover a more awkward position for an army invading them, than to be planted on the end of a peninsula, between two rivers, and shut out from the country by a wall of fortifications. If these are of such strength as to require regular approaches—in other words, the slow operations of a siege—how many generations of men will be born and die before a country of that extent will be conquered at this rate of progression?

The truth is, that these advices simply vindicate the sound opinions expressed from the first in Europe—that, assuming the people of the South to be in earnest, the conquest of such a country is an impossibility. The Federals have done all that men could do, far more than they themselves believed to be within their power, far more than any one in Europe would have credited had it been predicted. But all this is vain. Let anyone consider their position at this moment, before they have even begun to feel the effects of exhausting marches, of deficient food, of a dangerous climate; and he will have little difficulty in seeing that they have undertaken what they cannot accomplish, and that a continuance of the war will only be ruinous to themselves and disastrous to other countries.

Cotton Prospects.

THE important intelligence we publish to day from our well-informed Paris correspondent gives a definite and tangible shape to the vague rumours which, for some days past, have been rife in the City and in Liverpool. There seems to be little room for doubt that the French Emperor has decided upon such measures as may most speedily lead to a termination of the war—friendly but firm remonstrance at Washington—an armed demonstration if this proves ineffectual. We fully concur with our Paris correspondent that France sincerely desires the co-operation of England, and would be reluctant to act without it; but if the repeated appeals to the British cabinet fail, as heretofore, in producing practical results, we believe that the Emperor will not reconsider a determination once deliberately taken. Surely a more tempting opportunity for playing in America, as in Europe, the role of tutelary Power of oppressed nationalities, and of placing England in the second rank in the decision of great problems of international politics, could not be offered to his comprehensive genius, than the continued refusal of Great Britain to take a decisive stand in a question so closely concerning her most important interests.

Our object, however, is not at present to speculate upon the political bearings of this interesting intelligence. Assuming that French intervention is nearer at hand than we believe it to be—delayed as it still is by diplomatic complications of a serious nature—and that, in consequence, the Confederate ports are again opened to the commerce of the world, what will be the probable effect of this event upon the industry of Lancashire and the markets of Liverpool and Manchester?

To form an intelligent judgment on this subject, it must be kept in mind that, under the most favourable circumstances—the immediate repudiation of the blockade, supported by a competent naval force, to sweep every blockading vessel from the Confederate coast—the supplies of cotton must still continue for many months to be scant and dear. Nature has arranged for the Southern States a business season which man cannot invert. As the staple matures, the rivers, without which cotton lands are of little value, begin to rise; and during the long harvesting of the crops—the so-called picking season—bale after bale, in small lots, so soon as ready for the market, are placed on board the fleet of steamers which swarm on every navigable water-course. At the same time the seaport cities become healthy, and admit of the immigration of a large white labouring-class from the North, who are indispensable to the proper and prompt disposal of the crop. Thus, the picking, ginning, baling, transportation, and sale of the staple, are so nearly simultaneous, that when the last bale is picked on the plantation, the business season in the seaport is already drawing to its close.

Contrast with this the conditions under which the crop of 1861 is to be moved, should the ports be opened during the summer. The rivers are low, and navigable only for boats of the lightest draughts. Of such boats no new ones have been built for the trade, as is usual even in ordinary seasons; but a great many have been converted to warlike purposes. The cotton lies unginned in the plantations, and though a bountiful supply of Gunsey bags and iron ties from this country may, in a measure, remove this difficulty, these supplies must first reach the planter ere the cotton can be made ready for shipment. Suppose all these obstacles removed, whence shall come the necessary labour at the seaport? The class which always supplied it—even if it could endure the fatal summer heats, and yellow fever was banished from the Gulf coasts—now composes the bulk of the Federal armies. Will these be instantly disbanded, and if so, will the Confederates permit, without question, the same invasion which in another form they have poured out their life-blood to resist?

These are but a tithe of the insuperable practical difficulties in the way of a regular and sufficient supply of cotton until the winter months. But there is yet another and still weightier consideration. The cotton will not be sent us: we must send for it. The ships which will hasten westward will not go empty. We know that the South is quite as destitute of manufactured goods as we are of the raw material; and if there are five millions on this side the Atlantic waiting for cotton to give them work and bread, there are eight millions on the other side waiting quite as anxiously for cotton fabric to clothe their limbs. It can scarcely be estimated what an enormous amount of sheetings, shirtings, prints, muslins, and every form that manufactured cotton takes, the Southern population will be ready to absorb when their ports are open. Besides, this is the only manner in which the staple can be paid for; the whole former system of exchanges being levelled to the ground, and its very foundation upturned. The first in the race to take advantage of the change will find cheap cotton, and high prices for goods; the last in the race will find glutted markets for goods, and cotton scarce and dear.

We predict, therefore, that the effects of intervention, for at least the next six months, must be, not any considerable reduction in the price of cotton, but an unprecedented appreciation in the value of manufactured goods.

The Oath of Allegiance.

Or late years the common convenience of nations, and the maintenance of public peace and morality, have sanctioned a conviction at law in the case of absent persons charged with particular offences and termed, in legal parlance, par contumace. But this has only held in criminal cases, and has been narrowly watched in constitutional countries, as was notoriously the fact in the trials which arose out of the infamous Orsini Conspiracy. It has been reserved for the Government at Washington to endeavour to extend something like this principle to cases which widely differ from those to which this legal process has been allowed to apply. They have proposed an Act to Congress, to compel all subjects of the United States to appear before the consul or other accredited agent of their Government in foreign countries, and to take the oath of allegiance, of course under pains and penalties in case of non-compliance. Now, although past history and experience does not allow us to lay much stress upon the care or caution of the Federal Government in conducting its proceedings towards those whom, in defiance of common sense, and the unanimous and widely expressed feeling of civilized Europe, they persist in calling rebels, it will be useful to protest, in the name of law and order, against such assumption, and to point out how vitally it militates against the declared spirit of British freedom, as well as the interests of humanity at large. And, although such a protest would, of course, little affect persons who view with acquiescence, if not with favour, the overriding of the law of the land by the dictum of one man, and the annulling of the Supreme Judges' decision, or even action, by the bare authority of a Secretary of State, as has lately been perpetrated by Mr. Seward—the only instance in the history of the last century, except the infamous Committee of Public Safety in the French Revolution; yet there are others who may view this attempt in its proper light, and whose voices may yet be heard with effect, when the howl of passion has exhausted itself by the mere force of its violence. In all cases where penalties are sought to be enforced against persons who do not comply with requisitions, the first duty which justice requires from those who seek to enforce the penalty is, to fix beyond a doubt, personal service of notice on the offender, and his reasonable knowledge of the requirement. The only instance where such action is known to us in England, as affecting foreigners enjoying the hospitality of this country, is the edict of the Czar of Russia, recalling to their country subjects of his, who either transgress some law of the Empire, or break some rule or condition, under which they were allowed to leave it. We have had an instance this week, in the public journals, of exile pronounced against Prince Dolgorouky, and penalties announced against him under such conditions. There are, also, certain cases of Prussian officers, with similar attendant circumstances; but there is this very marked distinction between their character and that of the persons sought to be affected by this Act: they left their country with this very condition attached to their absence, while the liability is sought here to be affixed by ex post facto legislation. Now, the law of asylum, accorded both by this country and France, to those foreigners who live peaceably under the protection of the laws, militates most materially against the assumption of penal jurisdiction over them, except in cases of criminal offences, provided for by extradition treaties; and, as to the spirit of the people of these realms, we need only suppose an exactly parallel case to test with what scorn and indignation an attempt of the kind would be scouted by the entire nation. Let us suppose a public notice was given by the Emperor of Austria to cite Kossuth before the ambassador, to take the oath of allegiance to the Government he has defied and fled from. Espartero, flying for his life after his unsuccessful bombardment of Seville, was safe from all process the moment he touched the deck of Her Majesty's ship Malabar, in the bay of Cadiz; and even the ruffian

Miramon was protected by the French captain, Le Roy, the moment he came under the tricolor, though justly branded as a burglar and murderer. It is fair to conclude, that any attempt at a public enforcement of penalties against persons peaceably living under the protection of the English and French laws, would rouse the just indignation of both those magnanimous peoples, who have proclaimed to the world their determination to support the droit d'asyle to the last drop of blood, and the last mite in the treasury. And yet, without a public and formal demand, how can the Act be brought home to individuals? On the whole, therefore, we must judge this to be but one other attempt at supreme and unaccountable despotism, which is the principle and action of the Government at Washington. Le Roi le veut is Mr. Seward's maxim; but there is another will which, perhaps, he will one day or other find out to his cost. In the meantime he may rest assured, that as far as the people of this country are concerned, they will take care that in these realms, at least, the Act, if passed, will remain a dead letter, as well as a lasting reproach against those who have endeavoured to foist upon the records of human law an edict which offends common humanity.

A SINGULAR illustration of the courteous and cousinly feeling entertained by the Northern Americans towards the people of this country has just come to our knowledge. One of the largest commercial firms in the United Kingdom, equally well known on both sides of the Atlantic, had returned to them, by the last New York steamer, all the circulars they had, according to long-standing usage, addressed to their numerous correspondents in the United States, with the following stamped endorsement:—

SENT BACK TO ENGLAND,
WITHOUT A REASON FOR NON-DELIVERY.

At first it was supposed that the American correspondents had really refused to receive the circulars, the more as the firm had reason to believe that a war of persecution had been inaugurated against them on account of the views of one of the members of the firm on the American difficulties. Shipmasters had been warned that they must have no connection, however slight, with the firm in question, if they expected to be employed in Northern ports. But the existence of such private hostilities could not be made to account for the simultaneous return of business circulars by hundreds of correspondents living at places widely remote. It becomes apparent, therefore, that this return can only have taken place in pursuance of a general order from the Post Office Department, refusing to these circulars the facilities of the mail, a course quite familiar to the Washington authorities in the case of obnoxious newspapers, but never heretofore practised by any civilized Government towards the business correspondence of a friendly foreign country. It must be added that even Jeffries himself could not have detected treason or connivance with treason, in the contents of the circulars, and that the only imaginable reason for this summary disposal of them must have been the name of the firm printed on the back of them.

WE have great pleasure in announcing that the daring gallantry of Captain Wilson, of the Emily St. Pierre, and his cook and steward, is to be suitably rewarded by the merchants of Liverpool, who intend making a handsome presentation to them on Saturday next, the 3rd instant, at the Marine Association Rooms there. We also hear that it is proposed by the Mercantile Marine Association to present Captain Wilson very shortly a gold medal, as a mark of their approbation.

ONE of the rarest instances of patriotism on record, is that afforded by the banks of the city of New Orleans, which, though restrained by the authorities from paying out specie in large amounts, have for some time supplied, and at last advices still continued to supply, the Confederate soldiers daily leaving New Orleans for the seats of war, with gold and silver in small amounts, at par, either for the bank notes of the respective States, or the notes of the Confederate Treasury.

THE spirit of poetic love for Old England has not died out in the Southern States, if we may judge from the following stanzas, which we find in the New Orleans Picayune of the 15th March:—

ENGLAND.

HER TWO DEFENCES.

Thou hast thy mighty bulwarks,
Thou Island of the Brave,
Who sittest on thy sea-girt throne
The Empress of the Wave:
Stretching thy sceptre o'er the sea,
With proud imperial smile,
Waving the banner of the free
O'er ocean and o'er isle.

Thou hast thy bristling ramparts,
Where thund'ring cannon roar;
Thou hast thy stately "walls of oak,"
At vigil round thy shore;
And many a gallant argosy Breaks proudly ocean's foam,
Streaming thy pennon on the breeze
That waits thy treasures home.

Aye! spears like forests will arise
Around thy peaceful bowers,
Ere banner of a foreign foe
Shall flaunt on England's towers.
The strong will man thy battlements,
The weak will scorn to flee:
E'en woman rise in thy defence,
Oh, Island of the Free!

But thou hast a nobler bulwark
To guard thy hallow'd sod:
The Church, all glorious, lifting up
The banner of thy God!
The Church, though weak in carnal might,
Yet strong in faith and love—
Drawing her stores of life and light
From Treasury above.

Thou hast a dauntless people,
Right loyal to their Lord,
Whose ægis is the "Shield of Faith,"
Whose might, the spirit's sword.
Firm and gallant is their strife,
'Gainst wrong, and grief, and sin,
Their battle-field, the path of life,
Their warfare, all within.

Exhaustless are their treasures—
Though some do prize them not—
The Word of God, in palaces,
The Word in hall and cot:
The Balm of Life and words of peace
For every grief and wound,
And jubilees, or full release,
For souls that sin hath bound.

Oh, England, mighty England!
No towers can be thy trust,
No battled walls nor banner'd heights
Soon crumbling into dust:
The Church—thy life, thy true defence—
The arm of God shall be
For bulwarks and for battlements,
'Lone Island of the Free!

THE Federal generals have at last discovered a short and speedy road to Richmond, as will be perceived by the following from the New York Post:—

General Porter went up in the balloon at 5 o'clock this morning, and when about 100 feet above the ground the rope anchoring the balloon broke, and the General sailed off south-westerly toward Richmond. He was alone, but had sufficient calmness to pull the valve-rope, and gradually descended, reaching the ground in safety, about three miles from camp.

The Cruise of the Sumter.

FROM NOTES TAKEN ON BOARD BY ONE OF HER OFFICERS.

THE CONFEDERATE FLAG ON THE SEAS.

On the 20th of April, 1861, the steamer Havana (of the New Orleans and Havana line) was lying at the wharf in New Orleans. About 12 o'clock a tug boat came alongside, with orders to take her across the river to Algiers; she had been bought by the Confederate Government, and her name was hereafter to be the Sumter.

On the 21st, carpenters were at work on her, tearing down the cabins on deck, cutting her up into different compartments, ripping up the decks, making store rooms, strengthening her with heavy beams for guns, &c. More than a month elapsed before she could receive her armament. At length the happy day arrived when we were to go into commission with the following list of officers:—

Commander Raphael Lemmes, in command.

Lieutenants—	Engineer, J. M. Truman.
J. M. Kell.	Midshipmen—
Robert Chapman.	W. A. Hicks.
J. M. Stribling.	F. A. Armstrong.
W. E. Evans.	J. Hudgins.
Paymaster, Henry Myers.	J. D. Wilson.
Surgeon, Frank Galt.	J. Holden.
Marine Officer, B. K. Howell.

At this time a melancholy accident occurred to mar our hopes. One of our midshipmen, J. Holden, and a boat's crew went out to place an anchor in the river to prevent the swinging of the receiving ship, the Star of the West, and while in the act of dropping the anchor the boat capsized in the rapid current, by which the midshipman and three of the crew were drowned.

A short trial trip up the river to test her speed, and try the guns, and we were ready for sea. On the 18th of June, having everything on board, we left New Orleans, and dropped down to Fort Jackson, where we anchored in order to give the men some exercise at the guns before venturing out to meet the foe, who were in sight, and no doubt anxious to take the first vessel of the Confederate navy. The Sumter remained at Fort Jackson, exercising at targets with both heavy guns, muskets, and revolvers. After some time had been passed in this constant exercise by day, and doubly more constant exercise by the mosquitos at night, a telegram came, saying the bar was clear. In a moment the clink of the chain could be heard coming in through the pipes, and every heart on board was full with hope. Two hours after we were quietly anchored near the bar of the great Father of Waters—having found that the blockading squadron was still at anchor on the bar.

The next and every day while we remained in the river, the dull, heavy reports of our large guns, and the rattle of musketry, startled the denizens of the marshes bordering the mighty muddy Mississippi. Just outside the bar could be seen the Brooklyn and Powhattan, steam frigates of the enemy, with a number of smaller steamers. The Brooklyn, we knew, was the fastest as well as the largest of the squadron, her armament being 21 guns, 9 and 10 inch. We kept a close watch on her movements.

Look at the position of the vessels! At anchor outside the bar were several ships eager to pounce upon their prey; inside the bar was one little steamer that, two months ago, was following the uninterrupted course of peaceful commerce, and now the navy of a vast empire was arrayed against her.

About the 24th of June, it was reported that the Brooklyn had left the bar. The Sumter immediately got under way and stood down the river; but the "big enemy," as we called the Brooklyn, had returned; so we went quietly back to our anchorage up the river. On the 29th, we got our last letters from those dear to us at our homes. Sweethearts and wives were drunk to on that Saturday night; for we all thought that when the next Saturday came around, some of us would not be there to toast the dear ones left behind.

Early on Sunday morning, the 30th, it was reported from the mast-head that the Brooklyn had left the bar, in chase of a vessel. Now was our time; in the twinkling of an eye our anchor was up, and the dense volume of impenetrably black smoke that issued from our chimney told that the engineers intended to do their part. Down the muddy stream we went. When within six miles of the bar the Brooklyn saw us, and changed her course. On we dashed, both ships about six miles from the passing point, and both doing their best to get there first.

The Sumter has the current in her favour, but the Brooklyn has the long-reaching guns, and, from the smoothness of the water, they can be played with terrible effect. We beat to quarters, intending to sell the little ship dearly if we found the enemy faster than ourselves. The Sumter crossed the bar and rounded the mud banks to the eastward; as she did so the Brooklyn gave her a shot from her pivot guns, which fell short. Then the race commenced in earnest; the Sumter leading, the Brooklyn in pursuit. A heavy squall of wind and rain came up;

neither vessel could see the other; when the clouds passed away there was our enemy under all sail and steam, and evidently gaining on us. We hauled up two points, which brought the wind so far forward that the Brooklyn could not carry sail; we left her astern once more. But now we were out of fresh water and into the salt, our boilers commenced to foam, and again this monster was rapidly approaching. We slackened our speed for a few moments, and then commenced the sixty-five turns of our wheel; we gradually left her, and at four o'clock (we crossed the bar at twelve) we had the satisfaction of seeing her give up the chase, put her helm up, and return to the mouth of the river. Then three hearty cheers went up from our little vessel, and the race was won. The Confederate flag was on the seas.

THE FIRST PRIZE.

THE two vessels from this time steered in opposite directions, and the Brooklyn was soon lost sight of. At sunset, the whole Confederate navy was alone on the broad ocean, consisting of one little steamer mounting five guns, and carrying as a crew, 100 men. What a force, to attempt to dispute the sea with the vaunted 20,000 men of our Northern enemies! Yet the die was cast, and I believe that no breast on board our little ship would have wished for shore again, even if such a wish had been practicable.

We steered for Cape San Antonio, on the west end of Cuba; the water so smooth and the vessel so steady, that, if it had not been for the constant exercise at the baterns, one could almost have imagined the Sumter a "painted ship upon a painted ocean."

After passing San Antonio, we got into the trade winds with a heavy head-sea; boarded and ascertained the nationality of a Spanish bark, and stood on our course to the West. On the 3rd of July, about three o'clock, p.m., made a sail in shore of us, beating to windward. From the courses the two vessels were steering, they would come in contact, and, to avoid suspicion, we kept steadily on our course. When within two miles of the stranger we hoisted English colours. Up went the Stars and Stripes of the United States from the stranger. The English colours were at once hauled down, the Stars and Bars replaced the crown of St. George; a shot was fired across the bow of the Yankee ship, and our first prize was secure. The ship proved to be the Golden Rocket, from Maine, bound to Cienfuegos. She had no cargo; and, not wishing to send a prize crew off at such an early period of the cruise—after having taken her crew to our own vessel—we set fire to the prize. It was about ten o'clock at night when the first glare of light burst from her cabin-hatch. Few, few on board, can ever forget the spectacle. A ship set fire to at sea! it would seem that man was almost warring with his Maker. Her helpless condition, the red flames licking the rigging as they climbed aloft; the sparks, and pieces of burning rope taken off by the wind, and flying miles to leeward; the ghastly glare thrown upon the dark sea, as far as the eye could reach; and then the death-like stillness of the scene; all these combined to place the Golden Rocket on the tablets of our memories for ever. But, notwithstanding the reluctance with which we did it, we would not have missed the opportunity for anything on earth. We wanted no war; we wanted peace; we had dear friends among those who were making war upon us; and for their sakes, if not for the sake of humanity, we hoped to be allowed to separate in peace; but it could not be; they forced the war upon us—they endeavoured to destroy us. For this, and this alone, we burn their ships and destroy their commerce; we have no feeling of enmity against them, and all we ask is to be let alone, to be allowed to tread the path we have chosen for ourselves.

We steamed away as rapidly as possible from this sight, fraught with so many sad reflections, and by one o'clock in the morning the last glimmer of the burning ship sunk beneath the horizon, and the Golden Rocket was no more.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.

OFF TO THE WARS.

THE twenty-third of April, 1861, is a day long to be remembered in the local traditions of the city of Mobile. About noon the rumour had flashed through the town that the Governor of Alabama had accepted the services of the Mobile Cadets, and of another volunteer company, and had summoned both to repair instantly to the capital of the state, then also the provisional capital of the new-born Confederacy. Four hours are a brief space of time for preparation and leave-taking to men who are suddenly summoned from home and family and business to battle-fields a thousand miles away. Yet at four in the afternoon a vast multitude had already collected before the city arsenal, where the public arms were deposited, and in the capacious hall of which the two companies were then forming. An hour later the doors were thrown open, and forth stepped, with measured tread, Mobile's first contingent to the War of Independence. It was not now a holiday parade, such as had often enlivened the streets of the peaceful city. The showy uniforms in which, in happier times, harmless citizens delighted to play at soldiering, had been left behind, and officers and men were clad in a stout, serviceable gray, specially selected for a rough campaign. There was something, too, in the countenances of the men, their carriage and bearing, that would have indicated to a mere stranger more impressively than the swelling knapsack and the heavy blanket strapped to it, that the youths before him were animated by a stern resolve in the discharge of a patriotic duty.

At the wharf a halt and a "rest" were ordered, and then came the last leave-taking of mothers, sisters, sweethearts, wives; the hand-shakings of friends and companions, the blessings of old men, the final exhortation of father to son, the sobs and tears of agonized women. There was a feeling of relief when the command "Attention" cut short the painful scene. A few minutes later, the two companies had formed again on the upper deck of the steamer, overlooking the agitated sea of human beings that overflowed the wharves and all approaches to them; for the whole population of Mobile had assembled to bid "God speed" to the brave young hearts that day departing, many of them never to return. And now the shrill whistle of the steamer, the splash of revolving wheels, the solemn toll of church bells, the booming of salute guns, cheers after cheers from thousands of lungs, waving of hats and handkerchiefs—and the city of Mobile had lost the élite of her youth.

Two hundred young men occupy a small space, numerically, in the population of a large commercial city; but among these young men almost every family of wealth and social standing had its near and dear representative. Most of them had been raised in affluence; a very large proportion were college bred; many had already given promise of distinction at the bar, in literature, or in the higher spheres of commerce. Now they had become common soldiers—mere unthinking machines; whose places, some said, might as well and better have been taken by men less valuable to the community. But the young men thought otherwise. They felt that in the struggle in which their country was engaged, every odd was arrayed against it. They felt that in a war for a nation's existence it was a privilege to be allowed to bear the first brunt; and that it became them, sons of wealth and luxury, to set an example of self-sacrifice, of cheerful devotion, of patient endurance, of orderly demeanour, and true soldierly discipline, to those less favoured by fortune. They did not wait for commissions, so tempting to youthful vanity and even maturer ambitions; but, with a full sense of the consequences, they stepped into the ranks as "enlisted men" for a term of twelve months.

The Mobile Cadets, being the oldest organized volunteer company in the state, claimed the honour of being the first in having their services accepted for actual duty in the field. When the proclamation of President Lincoln destroyed the faint hopes of peace which had sprung up during the month of his hesitation, the company decided, by a vast majority, to place itself upon a war footing, and tender its services in the proper quarter. The small minority, whom circumstances prevented from joining their comrades were honourably excused, their places supplied by a most fastidious system of balloting among a large number of applicants, a simple and serviceable campaign uniform procured, all deficiencies in equipment and accoutrement supplied, daily morning and evening drill instituted; and in less than ten days a troop of young men, originally united for purpose of military amusement, had been transformed into a well-officered, well disciplined company of soldiers. Nor were the Cadets the only company which pursued this course. In Mobile, and in other cities of the Cotton States, as also in the rural districts, companies similarly situated acted in a similar manner, without awaiting each other's example. There was at first some doubt whether the authorities would receive this class of volunteers, and many weighty objections were raised against it, chiefly on the ground that these young men could be more useful to the state in less humble capacities. But the necessity of promptly pouring upon the exposed frontier of Virginia, then but a few days previously acquired to the Confederacy, troops having already at least the elements of effective organization, and a certain proficiency of drill, prevailed over all other reasons; and thus, on the 23rd of April, five days after the secession of Virginia, the Mobile Cadets received their marching orders to the "Old Dominion." The first levies of the South were exclusively among the gentlemen of the South.

A set of hurried notes, written at irregular intervals, mostly with no better desk than a camp-stool, or a knapsack laid on the grass, can scarcely deserve the name of journal. They were intended to reproduce more vividly at some future day the impressions of the hour to the writer's mind, rather than to serve as a record of adventures, of which, indeed, his connection with the company was singularly barren. Battles and sieges and hair-breadth escapes, therefore, the reader will not find in them, nor even the stories of painful marches or harassing retreats, or much if any of the soldier's stern work. Hardships and fatigues there undoubtedly were, but so light compared to those so bravely borne by others more fortunate in the field of action assigned to them, that memory refuses to chronicle them. The most these unpretending notes can promise is a glimpse into the interior of the armies of the young Republic while it was collecting its resources and gathering strength to resist the blow aimed at its vitals. The creation of an army of 400,000 men scattered over a territory of near a million square miles, within a space of less than twelve months, in the face of an enemy overwhelming in numbers, as in the appliances of war, by a Government scarcely formed, and dating but of yesterday, is a spectacle so novel and so replete with interest, that even the feeblest effort to throw light upon it may not go altogether unrewarded.

The writer's sole object, he frankly admits in advance, is to assist in bringing his countrymen, and their just cause, more favourably before a foreign public than they and their cause have been brought through the representations of their enemies. But he will not seek to further this object by falsifying facts or investing them with a fanciful colouring. To impartiality he does not pretend. No man thoroughly and earnestly enlisted in any cause, right or wrong, can honestly do so. Writing in a distant place of safety about companions in arms, who are still undergoing every hardship and privation for their country's sake, it would be difficult not to treat them with that loving-kindness and forbearance which, when he was among them, all imposed upon themselves the duty of practising toward each other. But if this bias may sometimes bear him to a more favourable judgment than a stranger would have pronounced, at least he can venture to promise that he will say naught he himself does not believe true, nor suppress anything that is necessary to form a correct opinion. For this reason he has thought it better to leave his notes, rough as they are, without material alterations or emendations, and to be sparing of post-dated comments, except where such are absolutely needed for the intelligence of the reader.

EN ROUTE FOR VIRGINIA.

On board steamer St. Nicholas, Alabama River, 25th April, 1861.

THE scene before me deserves a record, though my shoulder is strained, and my fore and middle fingers ache with "Carry Arms." Here, on the floor of the vast saloon lie some 300 men, so closely packed that it is actually impossible to tread through or between them. The folding doors of the ladies' saloon (for we have ladies on board, and not a little proud of them we are—the young wives of our second Lieutenant and of our Orderly Sergeant, accompanied by two unmarried sisters of the latter) have been closed, and though it is not nine o'clock yet, every one that does not wish to stand up during the night, has been compelled to occupy his considerably less than "three by six" on the saloon floor. I have been one of three lucky ones to whom the Captain has given a birth in his "state room," and I further enjoy a little corner at the first clerk's desk, whereon to write.

Fun and merriment run riot in the saloon, for "taps" has not beat yet. It is amusing to watch the good temper and real wit with which men defend their heads against some other men's legs, and the sham battles which are waged between inconveniently shortened antipodes. But even more pleasing is the cheerful readiness with which a place is sought and given to some luckless struggler who has neither cabin berth nor floor room. The more the merrier is the motto, and the saloon floor, omnibus-like, is never full, though I expect very shortly they will lie in strata like salt herrings.

Not a quarrel has yet occurred nor even a high word spoken, though there has been so much drinking that the officers threatened to shut up the steamboat bar. Strange enough, there has, however, been no drunkenness, the mental excitement apparently preponderating over the physical.

At various landings we have taken in other companies from the rural districts; stalwart, good-looking fellows, a little rougher in their manners and appearance than our city-bred gentlemen, but lacking in no essential of courtesy and good-breeding. In their green hunting shirts, for the country companies have not yet had time to uniform themselves, they have much the appearance of good-humoured savages. But they represent the best families in the land, and are most of them young planters, with a sprinkling of lawyers and doctors, and one or two editors among them. Our fraternization with them would not have been out of place among the scenes of the French Revolution, so exuberantly enthusiastic have been the demonstrations on both sides, though I doubt whether as much of the blood of the grape was shed on those bygone occasions as there was whiskey in these. Well, why not? In a day more we shall be under the rigid discipline of common soldiers. Everybody believes that our destination is Western Virginia, and perhaps a bit of Pennsylvania, and that in ten days we shall "have a chance at the Yankees."

We drill six hours a day on the upper deck, and the sun is exasperating. Many of us are "green" in the manual, and each of the older members acts as instructor to an "awkward squad." One or two of the more awkward ones were discovered late last night, long after "taps," rehearsing, in solitary despair, the hard-learned lessons of the day. The thing was too ludicrous and, besides, too well-intentioned to provoke more than a formal reprimand from the officer of the guard.

Yesterday the two Mobile Companies held a meeting, with one of the Captains in the chair, and one of the privates as Secretary, to pass complimentary resolutions to the owners and officers of the steamer St. Nicholas. The reason was, that while the Governor paid only for deck passage and soldiers' rations, we, as well as the other companies, had all received first-class passage and saloon fare. Though 500 men, in rotation of companies, sat down to each meal, the tables from morning to night groaned under the weight of good cheer, and even the stock of fresh milk and butter and of ice, so scanty on crowded river steamers, had never given out. The resolutions were passed, and a collection made, amounting to 263 dollars, for the purpose of purchasing a suitable testimonial to the Captain and first clerk of the liberal steamer.

To-morrow, our third day from Mobile, we shall be at the capital, there to be formed into a regiment, and then "on to Washington!"

Reviews.

A Comprehensive History of India, Civil, Military, and Social, from the First Landing of the English to the Suppression of the Sepoy Revolt; including an Outline of the Early History of Hindoostan. 3 vols. By HENRY BEVERIDGE, Esq., Advocate. London: Blackie, and Son.

INDIA may be fitly described as the unknown country; not that, like China, it has been rarely and only partially explored; for the history of India is a record of foreign invasion and subjugation. India, too, has been held in great repute in ancient, in mediæval, as well as in modern times; yet the popular ideas about it have in all ages been dreamy, exaggerated, and in many respects essentially false. The India of imagination was merely a land of exhaustless riches. It had mines of diamonds, and mountains of gold. It was a place where wealth might be obtained without labour. It was the treasure trove of the earth. People were amused with, and believed, the extravagant stories told of the habits of the Indians, and they did not seek for any exact information. It is equally true and surprising, that educated Englishmen cared little for the history of India, or its social and political condition, until very recently. The brilliant harangues of Sheridan and Burke, upon the impeachment of Warren Hastings, display a wonderful ignorance of facts, as well as great imaginative powers. Macaulay's essays on Warren Hastings and Clive, not less imaginative but more truthful, created an interest in India beyond the acquisition of gold, gems, and precious stuffs; and the mutiny in 1857, and the consequent transference of the government, in name as well as in fact, to the Home Government, have aroused us from lethargic indifference, so that even members of Parliament are now obliged to study Indian affairs; and indeed it is most desirable that the dominant classes should acquaint themselves with the history and state of India. Such knowledge is necessary for the good government, progressive development, and preservation of the immense empire acquired by a fearful sacrifice of human life, and by an unprecedented combination of fortuitous circumstances. Impressed with these views, we feel deeply obliged to Mr. Beveridge for the production of a work which contains many opinions from which we dissent, which may not be sufficiently elaborate to satisfy the student or the politician, but which cannot fail to popularize Indian history, and to enlighten the darkness, not of the lower ten millions, but of the upper millions, who, by their votes and influence, sway the destinies of the British Empire. Its appearance is very opportune, at a moment when shallow demagogues are proposing schemes of government so inimical to the genius and wants of India, that their adoption could only result in England losing her Eastern dominions, and being thereby shorn of a considerable part of her national and commercial importance.

We regret that Mr. Beveridge has devoted so small a space, to the ancient and mediæval periods. But our author's very brief and necessarily imperfect summary of events, from about 1500 B.C. to 1600 A.D., is instructive. In the earliest times the people of India were far in advance of their contemporaries in science, arts, and systems of government. How they acquired this knowledge is not related; but we know that during the intervening ages there has not been the slightest progress. Now, progressiveness, not only distinguishes man from the lower animals, but degrees of progressiveness distinguish race from race. With Oriental peoples, it may be remarked, there is always rapid, though limited development; with peoples who are not Oriental, there is generally a slow but certain progress. Perhaps the climate may bring about the difference; but whatever the cause, the fact is palpable and indisputable. Yet, ignoring this, and disregarding the teaching of twenty centuries, there are persons who prate glibly about the political progress of the people of India. We do not despair of moral and social advancement, because Western energy may give mobility to Eastern inertness; but it is chimerical to suppose that the natural Oriental inertness can be so subdued and eradicated, that hereafter the people of India may become self-progressive. It is not more absurd to imagine, that since the locomotive is propelled by the power of steam, it may, in due course, become self-propelling. India, left to herself, would recede to the position from whence she has been dragged by foreign aid, and then would stand still. The English rule may be bad, or it may be good and beneficial; but, with respect to India, there is no choice between some foreign domination and complete stagnation.

In ancient times, at all events, India was, in learning, in internal resources, in population, and in commerce, equal to, and in some of these things superior to, the nations that successively conquered her. It is altogether unjust to accuse the natives of a lack of animal courage, and we know that in physique they are not inferior to the more favoured nations of the West; and moreover, in India, because of their physical adaptation to the climate, their physical endurance is greater than that of other people. Surely under these circumstances, conquest, one might suppose, would be nearly impossible; yet, from the pre-historic period, until this present year of grace, the history of India is a record of successful invasion. The half-mythic Sesostrius, and the more than half-mythic Semiramis, are supposed to have made incursions into India, and that the former was successful, and that the latter—who, according to Diodorus, who takes Ctesias as his authority, had an army of 3,000,000 infantry, 50,000 cavalry, and 100,000 mercenaries—was defeated. But as soon as we get fairly out of the pre-historic period we find victory inclining to the invaders of India, whether their resources were large or insignificant. When the invader could not conquer by reason of the greatness of his army, he found the crudest cunning more than a match for the far-famed Oriental duplicity. By whatever arrangements India passed under the yoke of Egypt and Assyria, there can be no doubt its connection with Persia was that of a conquered country. The Indian expedition of Alexander the Great was triumphant, though, if we may credit the accounts thereof, it was not unopposed. In the mediæval times India was subjugated by the followers of Mahomet. In the beginning of the 17th century the English commenced to trade directly with India, under a Royal Charter; and a company of English merchants, aided by the moral support of the English Government, became masters of an empire extending over 842,232 square miles, with a population estimated at 180,897,000; and let it be remembered that British India has been won and held by what has been tersely called, a handful of Europeans—by a band of adventurers, not only aliens in race, religion, and manners, who were not only widely severed from their home resources, but who have done little to win the love, and much to incur the hatred, of the vast population over whom they rule absolutely.

Now, though we may offend the prejudices of Mr. Goldwin Smith, and political economists of his school, who think their misty speculations are more reliable than the lessons of experience and the evidence of facts, we confess that we conclude, from the frequent and easy conquest of India, that the peoples of India are not fitted or destined to govern, but to be governed. England might follow the advice of Mr. Goldwin Smith, and leave India to her own resources; but England could not make India independent. Sooner or later the abandoned empire would fall under a foreign dominion; and for India the sooner the better. The true policy, nay, the sacred obligation, of the governing race, is not to idly or wantonly resign its functions, and leave the naturally subject race to its own stagnating, ruinous inertness; but rather, to maintain its supremacy intact, and to exercise its power for the furtherance of the happiness and well-being of the governed. We know our opinions are opposed to the views of those philanthropists who think they are quite capable of improving the moral government of the world, and who clamour for Indian representation, and for the induction of Indians into important offices. As we have seen, England cannot make India independent; but by sharing her authority with the native population she would imperil her own dominion. The Rebellion of 1857 was mainly due to the way in which the Sepoys had been petted and trusted. We were at no pains to conceal from them that we reposed on their loyalty and power. Fortunately, the East India Company had steadily refused to allow the native troops to be officered by natives, or the Rebellion of 1857 would have been still more menacing.

The East India Company has been treated with singular neglect; not that we think its dissolution was premature, but that its dissolution caused very little more excitement than the winding up of a large commercial speculation. Posterity will do John Company justice. The marvellous success of its administration will be made the subject of impassioned eulogy by future Macaulays. Its little beginning, its long-continued struggle against foreign and home aggression, its acquisition of a mighty empire, cannot fail to captivate the imagination. Succeeding generations will, perhaps, make a pilgrimage to Leadenhall-street, to gaze upon the site where once stood the India House—the palace of the merchant princes who ruled over the most extensive of earthly empires. We have erected no memorial to commemorate the existence of the greatest corporation that the world has known, and, indeed, a memorial would be superfluous, even ridiculous. John Company needs not a monolith. England's Indian Empire is the mighty monument of its mighty achievements; for the East India Company was an enormous success despite the Rebellion of 1857. The marvel is that the Rebellion was not more general, and that it had not broken out before. We look in vain for another instance of such a large conquered empire being held for so long by an alien race, without an effort to get rid of the conquerors. May the Imperial rule be as successful; and this happy result can only be brought about by closely following the main policy of the defunct East India Company. We may be told that the Crown has always had a veto upon the proceedings of the Company, and that the administrative powers of the Company were derived from an Act of Parliament. We do not dissent from these propositions; but we also maintain that, practically, the Court of Directors of the East India Company was the House of Commons for India—a House of Commons that morally and truly represented the interests of India, because its members were elected by the property classes only.

Not that we attempt to defend all the acts of the Company. It was wrong to make the native princes pay such enormous fines because they were rich and the Company was poor. We do not defend the crooked ways in which native princes were deprived of their dominions. We do not blame the Company for growing, but its borders might have been enlarged without duplicity. Verily, with nations "honesty is the best policy." We have no doubt that the Company acted unwisely in doing what it could to prevent the settlement of Englishmen in India, seeing that European emigration might have been encouraged without any danger of an influx of the unstable penniless classes. Some persons have found fault with the financial management of the Company; but considering the work done, it appears to us that its indebtedness was unprecedently insignificant. We repeat that we do not desire to extenuate the errors of the Company;

but that while the Imperial Government eschews all that was evil in the administration of its predecessor, it should cleave to all that was therein good.

If the native princes were treated unfairly, strict justice was accorded to the people; that is, the judges were independent and incorruptible; and we hold that the independence of the judicial bench and of the magistracy is the corner stone of Imperial stability, since it is the source of general contentment and loyalty. Any attempt to make the judicial or magisterial office elective ought to be strenuously opposed.

In respect to religious toleration, the Company has bequeathed a noble example. Fanaticism has anathematized the East India Company for its determined stand against the Government or official propagation of Christianity. We confess that it seems to us the bounden duty of a Christian Government not to use its power to evangelize its subjects. We have no conception of Christianity as a religion that is to be enforced at the point of the sword. To preserve peace and public order, to administer justice, to guarantee the rights of property, to reward or punish men for their acts, not their opinions; these we conceive to be the special functions of Government, and not to usurp or attempt to usurp the Divine office of Christianizing the heart and controlling and ruling the conscience. The subject has a right to expect from his Government that he shall be allowed to enjoy and confess his religious opinions, and to act, unless such action is opposed to the public weal, according to the principles of his religion. The strongest argument that could be adduced against Christianity would be that it permitted and needed the aid of the civil power. We trust that the clamour of fanatics will not induce the Imperial Government to become the arbiter of opinion and not the judge of actions. It is the duty of the individual Christian, or of the Christian Church, to propagandize; but it is not less the solemn Christian duty of a Christian Government to forget and completely ignore religious differences. Those who ascribe the Revolt of 1857 to the non-missionary spirit of the country should remember that revolts have occurred in Christian countries. Complete religious toleration is not only the best but the most Christian policy.

We shall say nothing against the competitive examination system, because we are convinced it does not exclude any candidates on the score of inferior intellectual capacity. The Company was worked remarkably well by favour and the rule of seniority. It had its brilliant servants, and it had its equally necessary servants of moderate capacity. Official mediocrity is as indispensable for the safety of the State, as freight or ballast is for the safety of the ship. It is the fashion to laugh at official etiquette, or red-tapeism, as it is called; but there is no good government without it. We trust the Imperial Government will imitate the Company in preferring certain experience to uncertain genius; that long service will be esteemed a certificate of merit, and that in the majority of instances seniority will regulate promotion.

In short, considering the brilliant success of the East India Company, we hold that the history of its administration and policy ought to be the text book of the Imperial Government. Indian self-government is impossible, and any effort to make India politically independent will only render the dominion of England insecure without benefiting the natives of India.

We do not endorse Mr. Beveridge's opinions, but nevertheless we commend his able work as the best popular History of India that has yet been written.

The Three Panics: an Historical Episode. By RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., M.P. London: Ward and Co.

WHEN Mr. Cobden speaks, the civilized world gives him an attentive audience. His eminence, as the great Apostle of Free Trade, merits such consideration. His views may be Utopian, but their enunciation displays so much common sense—that most uncommon and most useful of all mental endowments—that when we entirely dissent from his conclusions, we are amused and instructed by his arguments; and his eloquence is in itself peculiarly fascinating. His single-mindedness is always apparent; his earnestness is akin to fanaticism without being fanatical; his dashing dogmatism is untinged with pedantry or egotism; he is not a mere intellectual gladiator, and, though logical, he speaks from out of the fullness of his heart; his thoughts are not cold abstractions, but living creatures.

Still, despite his genius, it must be confessed by his most ardent admirers, that he has achieved nothing worthy of his fame out of the domain of Free Trade. Garibaldi is a giant in warfare, a child in politics. Mr. Cobden is the Garibaldi of Free Trade. In his own special vocation he is without a rival; when he directs his attention to other objects he sows abundantly, but he sows to the whirlwind. We deeply regret that his fine talents are partially wasted, and his public usefulness curtailed, by his connection with what is curiously called the Manchester Party, for it never represented, and has been formally and repeatedly repudiated by, Manchester. He professes the same creed as Mr. Bright, but his profession of political faith is modified in action by a sentiment of chivalry. Mr. Cobden abhors warfare, yet he would rather accept that dread issue than tamely submit to the chance of national disgrace. In addressing the House of Commons he made this memorable declaration:—

“I say that France ought not to have as large a navy as England. Nay, I go further, and say, that if I saw a disposition on the part of France to have as large a navy as England, and especially if I saw a disposition not to yield to the offer of an explanation, I should suspect France of having a sinister purpose in those armaments, and, if it came to a question of rivalry after that offer of explanation had been made, I would as cheerfully vote £100,000,000 sterling as I would £5,000,000 under the present system.”

Whilst Mr. Cobden's catholicity is unquestionable, it is evident he loves his native land better than any country under heaven. He is a distinguished agitator, yet never appealed to the ignoble passions of a mob, or endeavoured to create political capital by engendering social discord. The Puseyite clergyman and the Evangelical clergyman subscribe to the same articles; but the advancement of the former to the episcopal bench would be regarded as dangerous to the Protestantism of the Church of England; whilst the advancement of the latter would excite no alarm. In like manner, Messrs. Bright and Cobden profess the same principles; yet the accession to office of the Member for Birmingham would be looked upon as a political scandal, whilst the Member for Rochdale becoming a minister of the Crown, would not give rise to any uneasiness. Not that the sincerity of the one or the other is doubtful or doubted; but Mr. Bright is Radical and un-English; Mr. Cobden is Radical and English.

The three last panics of French invasion to which Mr. Cobden refers were, as events have proved, groundless. Neither was there the lame excuse for them, as there was for the panic when Napoleon I. made a powerful demonstration at Boulogne. We further admit that periodical panics are injurious, undignified; and induce imposition, if not attack, and lead foreigners to suppose that we have grown timid and pusillanimous. So far we entirely accord with our author; but in other respects we entirely differ from him. It seems to us that he has fallen into two capital errors,—1st, he has mistaken the agents for the cause of the invasion panics; 2nd, he has confounded the remedy with the disease, and assumed that since the panics were groundless our defensive preparations were needless. Because it is foolish to dread improbable calamities, Mr. Cobden contends that it is absurd to provide against the advent of possible and ruinous disasters.

John Bull is not less plucky and pugnacious than formerly. We are afraid he has great weakness for the game of war. He sermonises upon the horrors of the battle-field with an unction that belies his philanthropic hemoanings. During the Russian War there was no lack of volunteers for the ranks, and hosts of gentlemen, who might have lived at home at ease and in honour, hastened to brave mutilation and death in the trenches. But we need not press a point that is frankly conceded. Mr. Cobden and his friends have on many occasions deplored the warring propensities of their fellow-countrymen.

A French invasion is not dreaded from an idea that it would lead to the subjugation of the country. If the foe landed we are confident that for the defence of the sanctity of home every Englishman would become a soldier, and, being a soldier, a hero. What we dread is the effect of an invasion on our commerce and property. When Lord Overstone was examined before a Select Committee, he was particularly asked what would, in his opinion, be the influence of an invasion upon the price of public securities? His lordship's answer was necessarily vague; but undoubtedly an invasion would inflict upon us a fearful, immediate, and lasting injury. It would take years to recover from the effects of a day's invasion. The monied classes are the panic-mongers. Mr. Cobden observes, “there can be no doubt that the proposal to add 5d. in the pound to the Income Tax, mainly contributed to put an end to the first invasion panic.” And we presume that Mr. Cobden will admit that, but for our increased armaments, we might get rid of a considerable portion of the Income Tax.

Are we to conclude that the monied classes, the most intelligent men of the country, are the dupes of political intrigues and of the military and naval professions, seeming that from year to year they have to pay an enormous fine for their gullibility? We think not. Nor do we agree with M. Ducois, whose opinion is endorsed by Mr. Cobden, that the members of an English cabinet have within the last thirty years increased their budget “to strengthen a somewhat uncertain majority in Parliament.” We are under the impression that the remission of taxes does more to strengthen a government than the imposition of taxes.

The panic-mongers did not take the trouble to inquire into the then probabilities of an immediate invasion. Ministers, military and naval authorities, intimated that the thing was possible. That was sufficient. It was in vain to contend that the French had no intention, or could not immediately invade Great Britain. There could be no rest or confidence until everything had been done that could be done to insure against the possibility of such a ruinous calamity. We refused to rely on the weakness of our neighbour, and preferred the security of the utmost development of our strength. The cause, then, of the panics was, that there were known means of insuring the safety of our property of which we had not availed ourselves. The panics were groundless, because there was no immediate need for the extra defences. We had time enough to perfect them before the foe could attack us. It may seem paradoxical to assert that the panics were groundless, and yet that the cause of them was substantial; but these propositions are reconcilable. True, we had not done what we could for the protection of our coasts, and it was equally true that our possible invaders could not immediately invade us.

Although we denounce the panics, we do not complain of the increased armaments. An independent nation cannot exist on sufferance; and if armaments can be limited by diplomacy, why not do away with all armaments? Iron-plated ships are better than wooden ships, but the change from wood to iron will involve a considerable outlay. Shall we agree with France to eschew iron ships? The old Brown Bess is less effective and less costly than the rifle. Shall we agree with France to abolish the use of the rifle? In a word, shall we base the security of the two countries upon mutual weakness or upon mutual strength? The effect of such a proceeding must be to reduce England and France to second or third-rate Powers. Other countries of inferior size and of less population might virtually rule us with their armaments; and if England and France were disarmed they could not compel a general disarmament. Or, if a general disarmament were effected, it could not be maintained inviolate except by armed force. The systems of arbitration and disarmament are illusive, because they suppose a contract without guarantees, and which it would be the interest of some of the contracting parties to violate. An independent nation must stand by its independent strength, aided, of course, by its natural and political allies. So long as there is any means of defence neglected against possible invasion, we are running a foolish risk. If our coast defences cost us £20,000,000 sterling per annum, provided the money was wisely applied, we should not think the price too much for the insurance against invasion.

At one time Mr. Cobden was anxious to return to the expenditure of 1835. We will assume that he thinks the proportion then existing between the naval expenditure of the two countries ought to be maintained. Well, taking Mr. Cobden's figures, we find the naval expenditure of the the two countries was,—

In 1835—England, £4,245,723. France, £2,227,709.
In 1859— „ £11,072,243. „ £8,333,933.

That is to say, in 1835 our own naval expenditure was within a fraction of 50 per cent. more than the French expenditure; and in 1859 it was not 40 per cent. more. From this we learn that the French had been gaining on us. We are reminded by Mr. Cobden that 1859 was, owing to the war in Italy, an exceptional year, and that in 1858 our naval expenditure was 50 per cent. in excess of the French expenditure. What does that prove? That we must not trust to the apparent strength of our neighbours; that their naval power may be increased with wonderful rapidity; that though there was no ground for the three panics, there were excellent reasons for not delaying the improvements of our defences. Very candidly, perhaps, unconsciously, Mr. Cobden has adduced a strong argument in favour of increased armaments; and, to some extent, has even excused the panic-mongers.

Like Mr. Cobden, we have full confidence in the good faith and friendliness of Napoleon III., and we are no less strongly impressed with the immense advantages of a sincere alliance between England and France. But that alliance must be cemented by mutual independence, for it will only be jeopardized by diplomatic arrangement of mutual dependence. The agreement to limit armaments must result in ceaseless, jealous watching. Every ship commissioned, every gunboat ordered, every dockyard movement, would excite inquiry and irritating suspicion.

And there is another objection to the scheme of arrangement. Mr. Cobden proposes that the French Government shall give an undertaking to keep the French navy inferior to the English navy. The high-spirited French people would clamorously repudiate such an engagement.

Our naval expenditure since 1853 has nearly doubled, and it is possible that we may be able to reduce it; but from 1835 to 1853 the increase had only been equal to 33 per cent. Now, our armaments have increased with the increase of our wealth, and, we may add, with the growth of our population. Nor is it very strange that the more we have to insure the more we have to pay for insurance. We deplore our large expenditure, and should be glad to see it reduced. It is sad, very sad, that men should be so misled, so blind to their welfare, as not to do unto others as they would others should do unto them. But we must deal with humanity as it is, and not as it ought to be; and the wisest and kindest policy for men and nations is to protect their several rights as strongly as possible, and not, by unnecessary weakness, offer a temptation to wrong doing and aggression.

The Rose, The Shamrock, and The Thistle. A Monthly Magazine: No. I. Edinburgh: Printed and published by the Caledonian Press.

We wish this Magazine every success. It is carefully edited and well written, and whatever profits are realized by it will be for the advantage of the Caledonian Press, an institution for the employment of women in the art of printing.

Shifting Scenes, and other Poems. By J. STANYAN BIGG. London: W. Freeman.

THIS volume contains some poems above the average. Many of the thoughts are original, and the versification is generally smooth and melodious. We quote some stanzas from a short poem entitled "Far Away:—

"Ah! the heavens are too high,
And the sunshine and the light,
And the purple mountains far,
And the moonbeam, and the star,
And the round and rolling white
Of the sun-cloud, sailing bright
Through a sea of molten light,
And the shows of day and night Seem not what they are!

"Evermore a glory breaks
Over peak and over plain
In the distance, far away;
And the gorgeous skirts of day
Hide the hollows full of pain;
Hide the rents, and hide the rain;
Hide the dark funeral train;
Hide the clouds that come again;
But no living thing can say
It hath touched the gorgeous day,
Which for ever, and for ever,
Glideth on, a golden river,
Far away! Far away!"

NASHVILLE.—The Federals have not altogether suppressed communications from Nashville—at least, we see that letters dated at that city still get through to New Orleans. We have had sight of one dated on the 9th, addressed by a lady in that city to a portion of her family here, which enables us to correct most favourably, and with entire authority, the newspaper reports by the Federalists, of the Unionist feeling which they found in that city. Written in the freedom of a correspondence entirely domestic, it relates incidents, of which we have obtained the liberty to mention several, as exhibiting the true disposition of the people of Nashville, and the noble spirit of patriotism which animates her women. The writer herself is one of those true-hearted Southern mothers, who have given their own time and cares to the comforts of the soldier, and inspired a whole family with the devotion of patriots.

She contradicts with indignation the Cincinnati story that the city of Nashville was white with flags the day the gun-boats arrived. There was not a single white flag, and only three Union ones. The following incident is well worth repeating:—

While a long string of Federals was marching along one of our streets a few days ago, a bright little fellow looked on very dolefully, and at last screamed out, "Hurrah for Jeff. Davis!" A Yankee said, loudly, "Pshaw, hurrah for the devil!" "All right," said the boy, "you hurrah for your captain and I'll hurrah for mine." A lady told me she heard him.

The ladies of Nashville keep entirely aloof from the enemy. The letter says:—

The young ladies never go in the street. Not one has received a Federal visitor. All have declined, with a single exception, in a single case, for a peculiar reason. The officers got a specimen of the manner in which they are regarded, at a place where they visited, in form, where a young girl of fourteen was present. She had a Southern flag on the piano. The officers asked her to play for them. She said she could "play nothing but Southern songs." They jestingly told her that she would yet marry a Federal officer; she spoke out: "Not to save her own life." One of them said he was a candidate for matrimony, and would like to marry a Southern woman. She said quickly: "There is not a lady in the Southern Confederacy would have you."

They got many hard lessons of the spirit of the Southern people, from the mouths of girls and boys, who speak for their fathers and brothers, who are absent in the wars, and for the race which is to succeed them.

The following passage has some significance:—

Col. Bryan's and several other houses were searched yesterday for the sick Texans. None were found, for on the day of the panic the healthy ones went all over town and took their sick comrades away; but some folks are mightily afraid of Texas Rangers and Morgan's men!

These things corroborate, from the very scene of action, the reports which are now going North, that General Buell is deeply disappointed at the reception of the Union forces at Nashville. He has been unable to discover any material out of which a Northern Government can be reconstructed, other than the military material which he carries with him; and it will take an indefinite amount of that to colonize and govern even a portion of the great region he has commenced traversing.

The Yazoo Banner states that Mr. John McFarland, of the firm of McFarland and Barkedale, New Orleans, has presented a splendid brass battery, consisting of six pieces, costing 40,000 dolrs., to encourage the raising of an artillery company in that county.

Among the members of the Orleans Guards Battery, who left on Saturday for the seat of war, we remarked Mr. Placide Canonge, the Louisiana poet, the versatile writer attached to so many papers of this city, and very well known as the manager of the Orleans Opera in 1860. Mr. Canonge left as a private in the same corps with his own son. In the same ranks is Mr. Amédée J. Vignaud, brother of the editor of the Renaissance Louisianaise, of which he too is a contributor. Mr. Rene L'Ordereau, a French literary gentleman, author of several successful plays, and who has been but a few months in this country, enlisted yesterday in the Orleans Guards, Company C, in spite of his fifty years.

PERMANENT GOVERNMENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES. FIRST CONGRESS.

CABINET.

Jefferson Davis—PRESIDENT.

Alexander H. Stephens—VICE-PRESIDENT.

J. P. Benjamin, Louisiana—SECRETARY OF STATE.

C. G. Memminger, South Carolina—SECRETARY OF TREASURY.

Geo. W. Randolph, Virginia—SECRETARY OF WAR.

S. R. Mallory, Florida—SECRETARY OF NAVY.

John H. H. Reagan, Texas—POST MASTER GENERAL.

Thos. H. Watts, Alabama—ATTORNEY GENERAL.

SENATE.

ALABAMA—Clement C. Clay, William L. Yancey.

ARKANSAS—Robt. W. Johnson, Charles B. Mitchell.

FLORIDA—James M. Baker, Augustus E. Maxwell.

GEORGIA—Benjamin H. Hill, Robert Toombs.

KENTUCKY—Henry C. Burnett, William E. Simms.

LOUISIANA—Thomas J. Semmes, Edward Sparrow.

MISSISSIPPI—Albert G. Brown, James Phelan.

MISSOURI—John B. Clark, R. S. T. Peyton.

NORTH CAROLINA—George Davis, Wm. T. Dortch.

SOUTH CAROLINA—Robert W. Barnwell, Jas. L. Orr.

TENNESSEE—Langdon C. Haynes, Gustavus A. Henry.

TEXAS—William S. Oldham, Louis T. Wigfall.

VIRGINIA—Robt. M. T. Hunter, William Ballard Preston.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Dist.	ALABAMA.	Dist.	MISSOURI. (continued)
1.	Thomas J. Foster	3.	Casper W. Bell
2.	William R. Smith	4.	A. H. Condon
3.	John P. Ralls	5.	George G. Vest
4.	J. L. M. Curry	6.	Thomas W. Freeman
5.	Francis S. Lyon	7.	John Ryer
6.	Wm. P. Chilton	NORTH CAROLINA.
7.	David Clepton	1.	W. N. H. Smith
8.	James L. Pugh	2.	Robert R. Bridges
9.	Edw. L. Dargan	3.	Owen R. Keenan
ARKANSAS.		4.	T. D. McDowell
1.	Felix I. Batson	5.	Thomas S. Ashe
2.	Grandison D. Royston	6.	Arch. H. Arrington
3.	J. P. Johnson	7.	Robert McLean
4.	Thomas B. Hanly	8.	William Lander
FLORIDA.		9.	B. S. Gaither
1.	James B. Dawkins	10.	A. T. Davidson
2.	Robert B. Hilton	SOUTH CAROLINA.
GEORGIA.		1.	John McQueen
1.	Julian Hartridge	2.	W. Porcher Miles
2.	C. J. Munnerlyn	3.	L. M. Ayer
3.	Hines Holt	4.	Milledge L. Bonham
4.	Augustus H. Kenan	5.	James Farrow
5.	David W. Lewis	6.	Wm. W. Boyce
6.	William W. Clark	TENNESSEE.
7.	Robert P. Frippie	1.	Joseph T. Heiskell
8.	Lucius J. Gartrell	2.	William G. Swan
9.	Hardy Strickland	3.	W. H. Tehbs
10.	Augustus R. Wright	4.	E. L. Gardenhire
KENTUCKY.		5.	Henry S. Foote
1.	Alfred Boyd	6.	Meredith P. Gentry
2.	John W. Crockett	7.	George W. Jones
3.	H. E. Read	8.	Thomas Menecese
4.	George W. Ewing	9.	J. D. C. Atkins
5.	James S. Chrisman	10.	John V. Wright
6.	T. L. Burnett	11.	David M. Currin
7.	H. W. Bruce	TEXAS.
8.	S. S. Scott	1.	John A. Wilcox
9.	E. M. Bruce	2.	C. C. Herbert
10.	J. W. Moore	3.	Peter W. Gray
11.	Robt. J. Breckinridge	4.	B. E. Sexton
12.	John M. Elliott	5.	D. M. Graham
LOUISIANA.		6.	Wm. B. Wright
1.	Chas. J. Villere	VIRGINIA.
2.	Chas. M. Conrad	1.	M. R. H. Garnett
3.	Duncan F. Kenner	2.	John R. Chambliss
4.	Lucien J. Doyre	3.	Vacant
5.	Henry Marshall	4.	Roger A. Pryor
6.	John Perkins, J.	5.	Thos. S. Bocock
MISSISSIPPI.		6.	John Goode, Jr.
1.	J. W. Clapp	7.	J. P. Holcombe
2.	Reubin Davis	8.	C. D. de Jarnett
3.	Israel Welch	9.	Wm. Smith
4.	H. C. Chambers	10.	A. R. Boteler
5.	O. R. Singleton	11.	John R. Baldwin
6.	E. Barksdale	12.	Walter R. Staples
7.	John J. McRae	13.	Walter Preston
MISSOURI.		14.	Albert G. Jenkins
1.	W. M. Cook	15.	Robt. Johnston
2.	Thos. A. Harris	16.	Chas. W. Russell

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I.—No. 3.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 15, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	33
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET	34
Liverpool Letter	34
Manchester Letter	34
Cotton Prospects	34
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
A Short War	35
Prices Current	35
Marriages and Deaths	36
Private Letters and Extracts	36
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Our Washington Correspondent	37
Our Paris Correspondent	38
Our New York Correspondent	38
Our Nassau Correspondent	39
A Southern Planter's View of the Coming Crop
The Battle of Shiloh	39
LEADERS—
The Federal Occupation of New Orleans	40
Southern Feeling towards England	40
Signs of Peace	41
The Mexican Intervention	41
The Poor Law	42
Editorials	42
CRUISE OF THE SUMMER—
No Sport	27
A Sail: Friend or Foe?	27
REVIEWS OF BOOKS—
Southern Wealth and Northern Profits	43
The American Disruption	44
History of Frederick the Second	44
PERSPECTS OF THE SOUTH	45
THE PRESENT AND THE FUTURE	45
SECESSION FROM A NORTHERN POINT OF VIEW	46
GLANINGS FROM THE NORTHERN PRESS	47
ADVERTISEMENTS	48

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

New Orleans is occupied by the invaders. On the 24th April, Federal gunboats passed Fort Jackson. Rather than have the city, so thickly peopled, bombarded by the enemy, General Lovell retired on the 25th, but not until he had removed all the ammunition and treasure, and destroyed the cotton and steamboats not needed for transport. On the 26th, the Federal commander formally demanded the unqualified surrender of the city. The city was defenceless, and therefore insult was added to injury. He ordered the Federal flag to be hoisted on all public buildings, and all the Confederate flags to be removed. The Mayor replied in words which will thrill the heart of Europe, and which make the temporary loss of New Orleans glorious. After remarking that General Lovell evacuated the city for the sake of the women and children, the Mayor spoke as follows:—"To surrender an undefended city," he continued, "would be an unmeaning ceremony. The city is yours by power of brutal force, not by the choice or consent of the inhabitants. It is for you to determine the fate that awaits us here. There is no man in our midst whose hand or head would not be paralyzed at hoisting a flag not of our own adoption. You may trust in the honour of the inhabitants, though you might not count on their submission to unmerited wrong. Your occupancy of the city does not transfer the allegiance of the inhabitants from the Government of their choice to one which they have deliberately repudiated. They yield the obedience which the conqueror is entitled to extract from the conquered." It is needless to comment on such an address. The heroic mayor of New Orleans faithfully represented the spirit of his country. The tone of the Southern press was never more bold, unflinching, and defiant, than at present. All our private Southern letters, and those that are being sent us from friends in Europe for perusal, are sternly resolute, and implicitly confident. The Southerners are satisfied that nothing was left for the invaders but the opportunity of plundering the peaceable inhabitants, and the reversion of yellow fever. If any proof were wanted to convince the world that the people of the Confederate States cannot be subjugated, it is afforded by the manner in which the evacuation of New Orleans has been received in the South.

The City of New York brings us some significant hints about Corinth. Under date "May 2, evening," were told, "rumours are current that General Beauregard has fallen back from Corinth to Memphis." By the telegraphic summary forwarded twelve hours later, we are informed that "A Cairo despatch says, that the news from Pittsburg Landing is of the highest importance, but its telegraphic transmission is forbidden. Nothing is known here of the nature of the news." We may observe that the Federal Government does not usually keep back favourable news, and that a private letter from New York alludes to a Federal defeat at Corinth.

The purport of M. Mercier's mission is becoming known at Washington. The words of the telegram are:—"The Washington correspondent of the New York Herald affirms that a consultation has taken place at Washington, between the Federal Cabinet and the foreign diplomatic corps. The consultation referred to the French Minister's visit to Richmond, and the question of an armistice was discussed. It was believed that the French Minister, since the occupation of New Orleans, had concluded that the time had arrived when, under the instructions of the Emperor, he might step forward as mediator. Also that, in consideration of the monopoly of commercial advantages, and aid of some kind from the Southern States in regard to Mexico, the Emperor Napoleon had agreed to use his influence with the Federal Government to end the war upon terms securing to the Southern States an independent nationality, and that if the Federal Government did not accept his mediation, the Emperor would himself acknowledge the Southern Confederacy." If our readers will be good enough to refer to our Paris correspondence, which appeared in our issues of the 1st and 8th instant, they will find that the above is a confirmation of what we indicated as to the policy of the French Emperor, and the object of the French Minister's visit to Richmond.

It is reported that all the members of Congress from the Border Slave States, and other conservative members, "were considering the propriety of withdrawing in a body from Congress, thus precipitating a decision by the people of the whole country on the radical measures of confiscation and emancipation." It is evident that the Federal Congress is not a very good type of an united, happy family.

The Federals, not content with the paper blockade of the South, are about to partially blockade their own ports. "The House of Representatives had passed stringent regulations, empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to prevent the shipment of goods to foreign ports, whence they are unshipped to Southern ports." We ask, is not this a confession that the Southern blockade is ineffectual? If the blockade were effective, there would be no necessity for stringent regulations to prevent the shipment of goods to Southern ports. It is very considerate of the House of Representatives to make such a candid confession.

The Committee of Ways and Means has reported an appropriation amounting to 226,000,000 dollars for the support of the army during the year ending in June, 1863. We expect that before June, 1863, it will be found much easier to appropriate money than to raise it.

We have the usual news from Yorktown. The siege is "progressing," but no progress is made.

Generals Jackson and Gustavus Smith have been strongly reinforced to oppose the Federal forces under Generals McDowell and Banks.

From all quarters we hear of the determination of the planters to abandon the cultivation of cotton in order to produce an abundant supply of food.

We elsewhere reprint an interesting letter on the harvest prospects in the South.

The Virginia is still the terror of the Federal navy. The Confederates are building a number of gunboats, and have nearly completed an iron-clad vessel as large and formidable as the Virginia.

Fort Mason was surrendered, conditionally, to General Burnside, on the 25th April.

Last night arrived, by the Seine, Mr. Johnstone and M. La Varenue, attachés to the French and English Envoys, with dispatches announcing the final withdrawal of Sir Charles Wyke from Mexico. A Spanish attaché accompanied them. Mexican Securities have fallen in consequence.

On Friday night, the subject of the distress in Lancashire was discussed in the House of Commons. No one denied the existence of the evil, but it was urged that the distress is not so great as it was in 1840 and 1841; that local resources were not exhausted; and that the Government had sent persons to the locality to act with the guardians. It was frankly admitted that the Poor Law might, under the special circumstances, require some modifications. Mr. Bright strongly deprecated any Government interference. Perish Lancashire rather than infringe on Mr. Bright's political creed! Mr. Gilpin reminded the House that the evil was not yet at its height. We may add, that no material improvement can be effected until the blockade is raised, and the Confederate States are acknowledged. We admire the exemplary patience of the operatives. It is certainly heroic. Meantime, whilst Commissioners are making inquiries and aiding the guardians, thousands are starving. Naturally, the innocent sufferers will not, until the grip of death is upon them, seek parochial relief, and so subject themselves to the disgrace of recognized pauperism. Our position is very serious. Are we right in observing a paper blockade, and in refusing to recognize the independence of the Confederate States? If not, we are assuredly responsible for the hopeless misery that prevails, and must increasingly prevail, in Lancashire.

On Monday, the House of Lords discussed the distress in Lancashire. Earl Granville, on behalf of the Government, admitted the extent of the suffering, but did not anticipate that the local resources would fail. A Government inspector has been sent to assist the guardians and local committees.

Victor Emmanuel has been well received in Naples, and in Sicily. The reported visit of Prince Napoleon is regarded as an evidence of the Emperor's intention to withdraw his troops from Rome.

There has been a little excitement in the Frankfurt Diet, in reference to the affairs of Electoral Hesse. In Prussia the elections have terminated in the return of a liberal majority.

Some disturbances in Portugal have been suppressed. The King of Portugal is about to marry the daughter of Victor Emmanuel.

We learn, by telegram from Scutari, "that a force of 8000 regular and irregular troops have attacked 3000 Montenegrins. The latter were repulsed, after a two hours' combat, with considerable loss."

The King of the Belgians is better, the dangerous symptoms having subsided.

From India, we have the summary of Mr. Laing's financial statement. The financial year commences with a deficit of £6,000,000. The present estimates show a surplus of £900,000, although nearly £1,500,000 is to be spent on public works in excess of the estimate for the current year. The revenue of the coming year would amount to £885,000 over the preceding year, if calculated on the same basis of taxation. The military expenditure is reduced to £12,200,000. The surplus is disposed of by increasing the Education grant to £500,000, and by bringing the public assignment up to £4,250,000. The import duties on piece goods and yarns are to be reduced to 5 and 3½ per cent. respectively, with immediate operation. The Paper Duty is abolished. The rates on beer and claret are reduced ½, and on tobacco to 20 per cent. ad valorem. The income-tax is reduced to 2 per cent., and, as regards small incomes, is abolished altogether. The total repeal of the tax is promised at the close of five years from its enactment. The cash balances for the year closed at £17,690,000.

Furrah has been taken by the Persians.

From Shanghai, we learn that the rebels have been again defeated.

The only item of general interest from Australia, is the rumour of fresh disturbances in New Zealand.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, 14th May, 1862.

The sales of cotton for the week ending 8th inst., amounted to 27,650 bales, of which 19,500 were taken by the trade, comprising 3,500 American, and about 14,000 Surats. The market was dull and depressed, under rumours of French intervention in American affairs, and closed at a decline of fully ¼ on American descriptions, and ½ in Surats, leaving Middling Orleans at 13d.

On Saturday, however, the tone of the market improved, in consequence of Mr. Layard's statement in the House, that Mr. Mercier's visit to Richmond had no diplomatic bearing, the sales reached 8000 bales at full prices, and the market wore every appearance of a brisk reaction. On Monday, however, the "Canada's" advices were received, reporting the surrender of New Orleans to the Federals, and the reviving demand was again checked, indeed some sales were pressed in the morning at ½ decline, but holders recovered their confidence as the day wore on, and the market closed dull with sales of 5000 bales at Friday's prices. On Tuesday the demand was languid, with sales of 3000 bales, and prices were scarcely maintained; but the report from Manchester was rather favourable, and a better business was expected to-day. The market, however, has again been damped by the news, per "City of New York," to hand this morning. By it the capture of New Orleans is confirmed, and the old rumour of French mediation is revived, and, though very little weight is attached to this report, it has had a most depressing effect on the market. Buyers have retired, and the few holders that are determined to force sales, must submit to a decline varying from ½ to ¾ in American cotton since Friday. For Surat cotton the demand is more active, and not more than ¼ decline can be quoted.

The sales to-day (Wednesday) reach 3000 bales, including only 700 American; and the nominal quotations may be given as 12½ for Middling Orleans, 12½ for Mobiles, and 12½ for Uplands.

A very lively interest has been excited here by the American news this week, and their effects on the prospects of our Cotton market have been eagerly canvassed. The capture of New Orleans was unlooked for, and people are not yet fully satisfied about its bearing on the question of future supply. The general impression seems to be, that no supplies worthy of notice will reach that port while it is held by Federal troops; and the alleged intention of the North to open it to trade, is expected to be as barren of result as their first experiment at Port Royal.

There are, however, some few who contend that cotton will reach New Orleans in moderate quantities as soon as the Federal gunboats obtain complete command of the Western waters, which, apparently, cannot be long deferred. They argue that if the Confederates continue to lose ground, some of the planters will prefer interest to patriotism; and, looking upon the Southern cause as hopeless, make the best they can out of the wreck of their private fortunes. To this it may be replied, that few will have the option of selling their crops to the enemy, for the Government orders to burn all produce exposed to seizure, are too stringent to permit of much evasion. Besides, there is every evidence that the great majority of the planters are warmly attached to the Southern cause, while the few who may be lukewarm at heart, will not venture to outrage popular feeling so long as the South has a fair chance of achieving its independence. It seems, therefore, very unlikely that supplies of cotton will reach New Orleans or any other port that may fall into Northern hands, so long as the Confederate armies hold their ground; and the Southern people, generally, are sanguine of success.

With regard to the revived rumour of French mediation at Washington, there appears as little ground for credence as formerly; certainly, the capture of New Orleans will not make the North more willing to entertain the thought of Southern independence, and it is well known that no settlement can be effected at present without that condition for its basis. The time may, and probably will, come, when both parties will listen willingly to foreign mediation; but the American people, are evidently not ripe for it at present.

Some rumours are circulated in town, to-day, that New Orleans has been recaptured by the Confederates, and that some disaster has befallen the Northern forces in Tennessee; but they are not authenticated, and are generally disbelieved.

MANCHESTER, May 13th, 1862.

SINCE my last report, the visit of M. Mercier to Richmond, and the probable consequence of French intervention, caused a very uneasy feeling here and few operations were entered into until the end of the past week, when the very able and terse reply in the House of Commons, by Lord Palmerston, in reference to our relations with France, stating:—"There has been no (what the French call) 'afterthought' on either part; there has been the most perfect frankness, and openness of communication between the two Governments"—coupled with what Mr. Layard stated on the subject on Friday evening:—"As far as Her Majesty's Government were informed, M. Mercier went to Richmond without any instructions from his own Government, and he might add that his visit had not been attended with any political results whatever"—gave more confidence to buyers, as these statements were looked upon as a proof of further assurances that our Government would adhere to their former policy of non-intervention. Consequently a more cheerful feeling prevailed on Saturday, to be dispelled, however, on receipt of news per Canada, reporting the capture of New Orleans by the Federals (yet to be confirmed).

To-day's market has been quiet; but, with some exceptions, prices are maintained with much firmness, and producers exhibit no great desire to press sales.

Buyers are acting very cautiously, and the amount of business transacted has been small, and, for the most part, at last week's prices.

In the event of a sudden termination to the war, and consequent influx of cotton, it may not be out of order, at this time, to anticipate the probable effect on the prices of manufactured goods. Taking the price of "Middling" Orleans cotton as a standard of value, the quotation this time last year was 7½d. to 8d. per lb., the price of 7 lbs. shirtings 7s. 7½d. per piece, and 8½ lbs. 9s. per piece.

To-day's price for cotton is 13d. per lb., and of shirtings 8s. 7½d. for 7 lb., and 10s. 9d. for 8½ lbs., thus showing that the advance in the raw material is 76 per cent., and in manufactured goods 14 and 19½ per cent. respectively. The advance compared with same time 1860 is 6½ per cent. on 7 lb., and 10 per cent. on 8½ lb. shirtings, whereas the advance on cotton is 80 per cent. Fine goods, such as jaconets, have advanced from 20 to 24 per cent. over the prices of May 1861.

As the consumption of the world increases, and is only lessened from temporary causes, and generally locally, is it probable that we shall decline in price here, even supposing cotton may fall 50 per cent.? The answer to this question remains for the future to solve; but from present prospects, I should infer that in the event of any decline on manufactured goods, this decline will be followed by as rapid an advance.

The consumption of Surat cotton being now largely on the increase, renders the supply of this article a matter of serious consideration. Taking the last clearances of shipments from Bombay, May 6th—expected to arrive in Liverpool by the middle of August—we have a supply of 327,889 bales. The quantity taken out of Liverpool for consumption and export to the 9th May, was at the rate of 18,630 bales per week. Should the same average continue, we shall only have 67,069 bales (five weeks' consumption, irrespective of the requirements for export) on the 15th August next.

COTTON PROSPECTS.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The reported occupation of New Orleans is doubtful, from all I have seen and read. If true, cotton is farther off than ever, for the Southerners will now find it more difficult to run any by the blockade, and they will not allow a bale to reach the city, to be sent away by the Federals. The wholesale burning is yet to come. Again, when the Southerners are ready to send cotton to market, means of transportation will be wanting, for you will observe that steamers are daily being destroyed, both by Confederates and Federals; and low rivers must be considered certain until November and December, perhaps later. I do not pretend to predict how high prices will go in this country, but I say, what cannot be disputed, that no cotton will be received here in any quantity till the end of the year. A few hundred bales may reach New York by way of the West, but every bale they can get will be wanted by the Northern manufacturers for their own use.

As to intervention, Count Mercier is reported to leave New York on the 11th of May; arrives in Paris, say on the 20th; has a conference with the Emperor, and if France concludes to intervene, months will elapse before anything definite could be done. In the meanwhile, unless the Lancashire mills stay entirely, American cotton must run out.

These are the condition and prospects of the cotton market fairly stated. If these views can be of any use to you, they are at your service, from one who owns no cotton, but has dealt in it all his life, and whose opinions are those of

A SOUTHERNER.

London, May 13th.

THE COTTON BURNING.—The Mobile Tribune has the following extract of a late letter from Athens, North Alabama:—"The cotton in Giles and Murray counties, Tennessee, has been and is being burnt, as the Federals approach. This is done with our soldiers—Scott's Louisiana Cavalry—but, in most cases, by the hearty consent of the owners. The people here are steady in their nerves, and nobody is running away. The cars only run to the State line, eighteen miles above this place. They go and return once a-day to Decatur. The bridges are all burnt beyond that point by our soldiers." The Rev. P. P. Smith, of Florida, in a letter to the Southern Christian Advocate, of Charleston, says that the planters in Florida are hauling their cotton into the open fields, away from their houses, to burn it if the Yankees should approach. The Milledgeville (Georgia) Recorder lauds the planters for their sacrifice of cotton:—"We are rejoiced to see evidence from all quarters of the South, that the planters are resolved to give all their lands and force to provisions, except a bare sufficiency to preserve cotton seed, and enough lint for domestic use. Hitherto the great pride of cotton planters has been in the quantity of production—the more bales the greater the triumph. Now the rule is just the contrary—the smaller the production the higher the reward, the brighter the patriotism, and the greater the reputation of the planter. We have the names of planters owning field-hands by the hundred, who will not plant a seed of cotton, but cover their broad acres in grain and other provision crops for 1862. Were this general the war would speedily terminate."

The correspondent of the Liverpool Mercury writes under date 29th April.—P.S. Since writing my letter I have received much private information as readers it almost beyond dispute that New Orleans has certainly fallen. It is true that no official advices have been received confirming the capture of the city; but from facts I have just obtained from a French source at New Orleans (though a friend here) with regard to the defences of the city, I can readily see that the Union gunboats once past the forts, resistance on the part of the city would be hopeless. It seems that the inhabitants counted mainly on a rear attack from the Federals, and here they were fully prepared for them; the front of the city, however, was entrusted chiefly to the care of Forts Jackson and St. Philip, and once out of reach of the guns of these, the enemy had an easy victory. The commanding general at New Orleans, on the approach of the Federals, withdrew his troops, burnt all the cotton and other valuables, and then quietly surrendered the city. Government stocks are up 1½ per cent. this p.m., but the railways and Border State securities show only a slight improvement.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

The following communication was received in a letter dated 26th March, 1862, from the South:—

A SHORT WAR.

This was the fond dream of many of us. It is well that we should banish every such thought now. Let us settle it in our minds that we are to wage a seven years' contest, at the very least. European interference we never desired, except to the extent of the breaking of the blockade, so that we might get arms and other necessities from abroad. But it now appears to us that even that much help from other nations would not have been to our advantage in the end. It is every way best for us that we should owe our independence absolutely to no human being outside of ourselves. It is for the security of future peace between the South and the North, that the latter should learn now, to the fullest extent, our ability to defend ourselves. The North believes that she can subjugate us. Well, let the experiment be now fairly made by her; and, when exhausted and worn out by the effort, she gives it up, there may be some hope of permanent peace betwixt us. And just so it is as regards the nations of Europe. They need to learn now what the Southern people are, and what resources they possess, and what exertions and what sacrifices they are willing to make in defence of their rights. And further yet, it is just so as respects ourselves.

All these Confederate States need to know, by the actual experiment of one another's conduct and bearing now, what is the true character of our new-born nation, of what stuff it is made, and what spirit it breathes. We may, therefore, be well content to bear our present troubles so long as shall be necessary. It is undoubtedly for the best that we should pass through the discipline of a long war. But present evils are always tolerable when they are the necessary prelude of future and greater good. A long and bloody war is not to be desired by us in itself. And we have the consolation of knowing that the South did not desire this war, nay, used every possible effort to avoid it. But it has been forced upon us, and neither our duty to God nor our duty to man will suffer us to withdraw our hand from the vigorous prosecution of it until those who have forced and are forcing it upon us shall be satisfied with the results of their experiment.

We have no doubt that we utter the sentiments of our whole people. It is one of the benefits of our late reverses, that the nerves of each patriot are strung high for every needful sacrifice, and every required effort. The spirit of the South is roused to a far higher pitch than at any previous period. Our Confederacy is just beginning to put forth her strength. She just begins to perceive that her adversary is in dead earnest. If the tremendous efforts of that adversary should not speedily end in exhaustion and collapse, the mighty resources and energies of this Southern people will ere long begin to tell in the struggle, and, God helping her, she will gloriously triumph.—Charleston, March 26th 1862.

PRICES CURRENT.

(From the latest received Confederate Papers.)

ALCOHOL.—The market is still dull, the only sale reported 50 bbls of 95 per cent. Western at 48 cents per gallon.

BARK.—We note sales during the week in small lots at 26 to 27 dols. per ton for No. 1, and 20 to 22 dols. for No. 2.

COFFEE.—There has been very little doing this week, the demand being confined to the wants of the retail trade—holders, however, have shown no disposition to sell except at full rates, consequently prices are unchanged. We quote prime Rio at 19 to 21 cents, as to quality; Laguayra 22 to 23 cents; Java 25½ to 26 cents, and Ceylon 24 cents per lb.

FISH.—Under a limited demand. The market has ruled dull, and in some kinds we note a decline. We quote—Codfish, 3 dols. to 3 dols. 50 cents per 100 lbs.; Hake, 1 dol. 75 cents to 2 dols. ditto; Alewives, 3 dols. to 3 dols. 50 cents per barrel; Herrings, scaled, 20 to 35 cents; ditto Labrador 3 dols. 75 cents to 4 dols.; ditto Eastern, 1 dol. 50 cents to 3 dols.; No. 1 Mackerel, 9 dols. 50 cents to 10 dols. 25 cents; ditto No. 2, 7 dols. to 8 dols.; ditto No. 3, large, 6 dols. to 6 dols. 75 cents; ditto medium ditto, 6 dols. to 6 dols. 50 cents; ditto small ditto, 3 dols. to 3 dols. 75 cents per barrel.

FRUIT.—There has only been a limited retail demand at previous quotations, viz., Raisins, MR., new, 3 dols. 45 cents to 3 dols. 50 cents; ditto, layers, ditto, 3 dols. 75 cents; Almonds, soft shelled, 12 cents to 15 cents per lb.; paper shell, ditto, 30 cents per lb.; Filberts 6½ cents to 7 cents; Palm Nuts 8½ cents; Pea Nuts 2 dols. to 2 dols. 50 cents per bushel; Cocoa Nuts, 35 to 40 dols. per M.; Zante Currants, 10 cents to 12 cents; Dates, 5 cents to 6 cents; Turkey Figs, 12 cents to 16 cents; Prunes, 18 cents per lb.; Sicily Lemons, 2 dols. to 2 dols. 50 cents per box, and ditto Oranges, 2 dols. 25 cents to 3 dols. 50 cents per box.

FLOUR.—The only demand prevailing this week has been for choice brands of Ohio and Howard-street superfine, which at the close is a shade better, and generally held more firmly; other descriptions have ruled exceedingly dull. We quote Howard-street and Ohio Super at 5 dols. 25 cents, and City Mills, ditto, at 5 dols. to 5 dols. 25 cents per bbl. Extra at 5 dols. 50 cents for Ohio and Howard-street, and 5 dols. 50 cents to 6 dols. 25 cents per bbl. for ordinary to choice shipping brands City Mills. We still quote Corn Meal at 2 dols. 87 cents per bbl. for Brandywine and City Mills, and Rye Flour at 3 dols 38 cents to 3 dols. 50 cents per bbl., with limited transactions.

GRAIN.—The market has only been moderately supplied this week, and under a good demand for both corn and wheat prices have ruled in favour of sellers. Of corn the supply has been readily disposed of at 50 cents to 61 cents per bushel at the opening, and 61 cents to 62 cents, with an additional cent for very prime parcels of white, at the close, and 50 cents to 57 cents per bushel for yellow, closing very firm at the last-named figures with a good shipping demand. Wheat has ruled very steady and firm, the figures at the close showing an advance on prime qualities. We quote fair to prime white at 1 dol. 33 cents to 1 dol. 60 cents; prime Southern red at 1 dol. 30 cents to 1 dol. 31 cents, and Pennsylvania ditto at 1 dol. 27 cents to 1 dol. 30 cents per bushel. Oats have been dull, and at the close we quote prime Pennsylvania at 37 to 38 cents, and Maryland at 35 to 36 cents per bushel. Prime Pennsylvania Rye is worth 72 to 73 cents, and Maryland 67 to 68 cents per bushel.

GUNNY BAGS.—We quote large size 4's at 25 cents, and 2's at 14 to 15 cents each.

GUNPOWDER.—Dapont's and Beatty's Blasting is worth 3 dols. 75 cents, and Sporting ditto, 6 dols. per keg.

HEMP.—The market is dull—we quote American dressed at 120 to 125 dols. per ton; Russia 155 to 160 dols. ditto; Rough American 6 cents; Manila 8½ to 8¾ cents; Sunn 6½ cents, and Jute 6½ to 7 cents per lb.

IRON.—There is no change to notice this week in prices. We quote—Baltimore Forge Pig 30 dols.; Charcoal, ditto, No. 1, 30 to 32 dols.; Anthracite, ditto, No. 1, 23 to 24 dols.; Scotch Pig, from yard, 25 dols.; American Bars 55 to 60 dols.; English, ditto, refined, 62 dols. 50 cents to 67 dols.; ditto, common, 57 dols. 50 cents to 62 dols. 50 cents; American Sheets 5½ cents; English, ditto, 3½ to 4½ cents, and Russia, ditto, 17½ to 18 cents per lb.

LEATHER.—The demand has been about equal to the supply, consequently the market has ruled firm. We quote City Slaughtered Sole, 28 to 30 cents; country, ditto, 26 to 28 cents; Rough Skirting, 25 to 28 cents; Spanish Sole, 26 to 29 cents; City Harness, black, 30 to 35 cents; country ditto, 20 to 30 cents; Upper, in rough, 3 to 4 dols. per hide; Calf Skins, 60 to 75 cents, and finished, ditto, 80 cents to 1 dol. 10 cents per lb.

MOLASSES.—The transactions have been very limited, the sales being confined to supplying the wants of the retail trade. We quote Muscovado at 22 to 26 cents; sour, ditto, 20 cents; Porto Rico, 28 to 35 cents, as to quality, and New Orleans 50 to 52 cents per gallon.

NAVAL STORES.—We quote Spirits Turpentine at 1 dol. 20 cents to 1 dol. 25 cents per gallon; other articles we quote nominally as before, viz.—Common and No. 2 Rosin at 7 dols. 50 cents to 8 dols. 50 cents per barrel; Tar 9 to 10 dols., and Pitch 7 dols. 50 cents to 8 dols. per bbl.

POTATOES.—The stock continues large. We quote them at 60 to 80 cents per bushel, as to quality.

PROVISIONS.—There has been a fair demand for dry salted meats for export, but other kinds have not been active, the demand being for the city trade and ship stores. We quote Mess Pork at 13 dols. per bbl., prime Mess at 12 dols. 50 cents, and Prime at 10 to 11 dols. per bbl. Bacon—Shoulders and Sides at 4½ to 5 and 6 to 6½ cents, and Hams at 7 to 9 cents per lb., as to quality. Bulk Meat at 4 cents for Shoulders, and 5 to 5½ cents for Sides, and 5½ to 7 cents per lb. for Hams. Lard is quiet at 8½ to 8¾ cents per lb. for prime Western Leaf. We quote Mess Beef, in limited request, at 15 to 16 dols., and No. 1 ditto at 12 dols. 50 cents.

BUTTER.—We have no change to notice; prime qualities are still in demand for trade purposes. We quote New York State at 23 to 24 cents, and Roll at 15 to 18 cents, as to quality. We note sales of fresh selected Eggs at 12½ to 13 cents.

CHEESE.—Is rather firm; we quote Eastern cutting at 8 to 8½ cents; English dairy at 8½ to 9 cents, and New England dairy at 6½ to 7½ cents per lb. as to quality.

RICE.—Small lots are selling at 7 to 7½ cents per lb. for Carolina.

SUGAR.—We still note a very limited demand, although the market is steady. The sales comprise about 200 bbls., mostly grocery descriptions, within the range of quotations, viz.: common to good refining grades, Cuba at 6½ to 7 cents; good grocery ditto at 7½ to 7¾ cents; prime Porto Rico at 8 cents, and choice ditto at 8½ to 8¾ cents per lb.

SEEDS.—There is nothing doing, we quote clover nominally at 5 to 5 dols. 25 cents per bushel, as to quality; Timothy at 2 dols. to 2 dols. 25 cents, and flaxseed at 1 dol. 90 cents to 2 dols. per bushel, with limited sales.

SALT.—We have a still further decline to notice this week. We now quote ground alum at 1 dol. 10 cents; Marshall's and Jeffery's and D'Arcy's fine at 1 dol. 75 cents, and Ashton's ditto at 1 dol. 90 cents per sack, with only a limited business.

TALLOW.—We quote city-rendered at 9 cents. country at 8½ cents to 8¾ cents, and rough fat at 6 cents per lb.

TONACCO.—The inquiries have been principally for the medium grades of Maryland crop, all of which have moved off as fast as offered, while both the low and finer grades have been neglected. We continue to quote: Maryland—Inferior to common 4 dols. 50 cents to 5 dols.; good to common 5 dols. to 5 dols. 50 cents; medium 5 dols. 50 cents to 7 dols. 50 cents; good to fine brown 7 dols. 50 cents to 8 dols. 50 cents; fine brown and colony 10 to 11 dols.; upper country common to fine yellow 3 to 15 dols.; ground leaves 4 to 12 dols. Ohio—Inferior to good common 4 to 5 dols.; red and spangled 5 dols. 50 cents to 7 dols. 50 cents; good and fine red and spangled 8 to 10 dols.; good and fine yellow 10 to 13 dols. Kentucky—3 dols. to 8 dols. 50 cents. for lugs, and 9 dols. 50 cents to 18 dols. for leaf.

WOOL.—No change to notice this week.—The market is still dull. We quote—Unwashed at 25 to 28 cents; tow-washed at 39 to 43 cents; pulled 30 to 31 cents for No. 1, and 34 to 38 cents per lb. for merino. Fleeces are quoted at 35 to 45 cents. per pound.

WHISKEY.—The sales for the week comprise some 500 bbls. of Country and Western at 24 to 25 cents. per gallon, including 100 bbls. to-day at 24 cents, at which the market closes.

NEW ORLEANS, April 14th.

The past week has been marked by some depression in general business, and by an almost total suspension of financial operations. The market was amply supplied with capital throughout, and rates of discount uniformly ruled in favour of borrowers and holders of paper; but the war movements engrossed the whole public mind, from the opening to the close of the week, and the demand for accommodation could not have been considered better than nominal at any time on the part of any class of borrowers or dealers in paper. At bank, there was a trifling daily movement noticeable in the way of renewals, but applications for new discounts were of a more restricted character than at any previous date from the commencement of the present year.

STOCKS AND BONDS.—The inquiry for this description of securities has almost entirely subsided within the past few days, and operations of any kind have been of too restricted a character to receive special notice. The success of our army in Tennessee caused holders of some favourite classes to considerably advance their asking rates, but buyers were too much absorbed otherwise to devote the required attention to investments of any kind, and operations for the time were but little better than nominal. Offerings of the better description continued exceedingly light, and there is no demand noticeable for the lower grade securities. Of course, prices are well unsettled, and we can only refer to the following as approximating figures, viz.:—

NEW ORLEANS STOCK MARKETS.

Canal Bank, 100 dols. paid	135 to —
Louisiana, 100 dols. paid	170 to —
Louisiana State, 100 dols. paid	170 to —
Mechanics and Traders, 100 dols. paid ..	99 to 100
Citizens' Bank, 100 dols. paid	225 to —
Bank of New Orleans, 100 dols. paid	99 to 100
Southern Bank, 100 dols. paid	118 to —
Union Bank, 100 dols. paid	98 to 100
Crescent City Bank, 100 dols. paid	87½ to —
Merchants' Bank, 100 dols. paid	90 to —
Bank of America, 100 dols. paid	125 to —
New Orleans Sixes, 1000 dols. Bonds	110 to —
New Orleans Railroad Bonds	110 to —
Jackson Railroad Bonds, 8 per cent.	100 to —
Jackson Railroad, 25 dols. paid	12 to —
Opelousas Railroad, 25 dols. paid	12 to —
Gas-Light Company, 100 dols. paid	212 to 212
Louisiana State Sixes	110 to 115
Southern Oil Company	50 to —
Confederate Treasury Notes	par
Confederate Bonds	92 to —
No. City Railroad Company, 100 dols. paid	200 to —
Opelousas Railroad Bonds	100 to —

SPECIE, &c.—Receipts of uncurrent Bank Notes have shown a further reduction for the week, and the brokers have cheerfully exchanged all that were offered to them of the issues of banks in other Confederate States at the revised figures in the subjoined table:—

GOLD AND SILVER.

American Gold Coin	— to — per cent. prem.
Do. Specie, old coinage ..	— to — " "
Do. Specie, new coinage ..	— to — " "
California Gold, per ounce	— to —
Mexican Dollars	— to —
Spanish Pillar Dollars	— to —
Five Franc Pieces	— to —
Sovereigns	4.80 to 4.85
Napoleons	3.80 to 3.85
Spanish Doubloons	16.25 to 16.50
Patriot	15.65 to 16.00

And 13 to 20 per cent. premium.

BANK NOTES.

City Banks	12 to 15 prem.
Mobile	5 to 8 "
Alabama State	3 to 5 "
North Carolina	3 to 5 "

South Carolina	3 to 5 prem.
Georgia	3 to 5 "
Northern Bank of Mississippi	par.
Virginia	3 to 5 prem.
Tennessee	3 to 5 "
Kentucky	— to —
Missouri	— to —
Com. and Ag. Texas	— to —

Operations in Exchange have been almost wholly suspended, and the market wears an unusually apathetic appearance. Offerings of foreign bills were exceedingly insignificant throughout, and the inquiry for this description, was at no time much better than nominal, while the supply of domestic ruled precisely as for several weeks past, and transactions in it comprised no round amounts at any time, so far as particulars have thus far transpired.

We now quote as follows:—Clear sterling bills, 70 to 75 per cent. premium; francs, 3 fr. to 2 fr. 75 per dollar; sight drafts on other Southern States, par at bank, and 1 to 1½ per cent. discount in the out-door market.

The last official returns to the Board of Currency were highly satisfactory.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

Saturday evening, April 12th, 1862.

COTTON.—Nothing reported. No receipts. Nominal stock, exclusive of amount in transitu, 11,214 bales.

TOBACCO.—We did not hear of a sale. No receipts. Nominal stock, 16,184 bbls. Actual stock, about 14,000.

SUGAR.—With no shipping facilities, there is no demand, and the sales are confined to retail transactions. Prices irregular and unsettled.

MOLASSES, 50 bbls. Slightly fermenting, sold at 16 cents. The market is extremely dull.

FLOUR.—The Committee of Safety are selling sacks at the tariff rates.

CORN.—We notice some sales from warehouse at the tariff rate of 1 dol. 20 cents per bushel. None appearing on the levee.

OATS, BRAN, and HAY.—Nothing reported.

BEEF.—Tires and bbls. of irregular weight are selling at 18 cents per pound.

PORK.—None on Sale.

BACON and LARD.—Small sales, at the tariff rates.

WHISKEY.—Rectified, made from Louisiana Rum, retails at 1 dol. 20 cents to 1 dol. 25 cents.

LOUISIANA RUM.—We hear of small sales, at 40 to 50 cents.

FREE MARKET.

Eighteen hundred and eighty families were supplied at this market during the past week, by the following distribution:—7 bullocks, 214 bushels of corn meal, 13 bbls. of rice, 142 sacks of potatoes, 13 bbls. of molasses, 4 bbls. mackerel, 2 boxes of codfish, 900 cabbages, 1000 bunches of leeks.

MARRIAGES AND DEATHS.

MARRIED.

At Cheraw, on Tuesday evening, 18th March, by the Rev. J. T. Brown, Lieutenant James H. Powe, C.S.P.A., to Josephine E., the daughter of the late William H. Robbins, Esq.; all of Cheraw.

On the 14th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Dr. Cummins, George N. Moale to Miss Nellie DeC. Wright, daughter of Robert Clinton Wright, Esq.

On the 14th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Dr. McJilton, A. S. Kirkpatrick, Esq., of Monmouth, Ill., to Miss Annie Stevens, of Baltimore county, Md.

On the 10th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Mr. Rolfe, William A. Wood to Miss Alphonza Elizabeth Merrikin; all of that city.

At Richmond, on Thursday, 3rd April, at St. Paul's Church, by Rev. R. Gatewood, Major A. Sinclair Cunningham, C.S.A., to Miss Ellen W., daughter of the late Captain William E. Stark, of the Marine corps.

On the 12th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Father Slattery, Louis Kalbus to Miss Mary Ann Mitchell.

On the 8th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Mr. Cooper, Mr. Isaac J. Williams to Miss Jane E. Adams; both of Somerset county.

On the 13th March, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Henry Elbert, Thomas H. Walker, of New York, to Miss Charlotte C. Brown, of Baltimore, Md.

At Christ Church, on the 15th April, at Baltimore by the Rev. N. H. Schenck, William H. Carter to Mary W., eldest daughter of Robert Cook; all of that city.

On the 13th April, at the residence of the bride, by the Rev. G. L. Staley, Israel Holtzman, of Allegany county, to Miss Rebecca E. Reed, of Mount Washington, Baltimore county, Md.

On the 24th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. A. G. Thomas, James B. Wright to Miss Charlotte E. Grace; both of East Baltimore.

On Tuesday, 22nd April, at Emanuel Church, Baltimore, by Rev. N. H. Schenck, John H. Bash to Lottie Hayes; both of that city.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, by Rev. Neville Rolfe, James Trutt, of Baltimore, to Miss Sallie E. Cowan, of Harford county.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, by Rev. M. Slattery, William J. A. Beatty to Miss Charlotte Jane Sangston; both of that city.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, by Rev. L. E. Morgan, J. Harry Forbes, of Xenia, Ohio, to Annie M., youngest daughter of the late Mark Grafton, of that city.

DIED.

On Tuesday evening, 16th April, at his residence, Rockland, Baltimore County, William Fell Johnson, in the 64th year of his age.

On Wednesday morning, 15th April, at Baltimore, Charles Bradenbaugh, in the 43rd year of his age.

On the 15th April, at Baltimore, Patrick Manning, in the 38th year of his age; a native of the town of Clifton, parish of Oma, county of Galway, Ireland; but for the last eleven years a resident of the above place.

On the 4th April, in Talbot county, Md., Christopher Harrison, in the 87th year of his age.

On Saturday, the 5th April, at Baltimore, John White, Esq., in the 81st year of his age. For many years he had withdrawn himself from business and general society, but by his own fire-side he enjoyed the affectionate intercourse of those dear to him, and a small circle of attached friends. To the last his vigorous and cultivated intellect retained its force; and the strongest tribute to his memory, from those with whom he has just parted, is their keen sense that their loss is irreparable.

On the 20th April, at the Sisters of Providence, in Baltimore, Britannia Ferguson, in the 17th year of her age. The deceased was a native of Richmond, Va. Her death was one of calmness and Christian hope.

On the morning of the 24th April, at Baltimore, Mrs. Hannah Dickehut, in the 77th year of her age.

On Wednesday evening, 23rd April, at Baltimore, Robert Starr, in the 51st year of his age.

On the 24th April, at Baltimore, Frances, wife of John Welch, aged 27 years. May she rest in peace.

On the 23rd April, at Baltimore, of consumption, patiently and hopefully borne, in the 60th year of her age, Alice, relict of the late James Reilly.

Of consumption, at the dwelling of his mother, 199, Biddle-street, near Ross, Dr. Charles Walter, aged 28 years, 9 months, and 2 days.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, George A. Holly, in the 29th year of his age.

On the morning of the 22nd April, after a protracted illness, which she bore with Christian fortitude and calm resignation, Emmeline Howard, wife of George D. M. Olure, and youngest daughter of Henry and Mary Most.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, Sophia Martin, in the 50th year of her age.

On Tuesday morning, 22nd April, at Baltimore, George Watchman, aged 58 years.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, after a severe illness of seven years, George Andrew Holly, in the 29th year of his age.

On the 21st April, at Baltimore, at her residence, 115, N. Caroline-street, Ann, wife of the late Captain James Simpson, aged 86 years.

On the 21st April, at Baltimore, of typhoid fever, Caroline C. Bayer, aged 28 years.

On the morning of the 21st April, at Baltimore, after a short illness of thirty hours, Mary Feodrich, aged 18 years and 5 months.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following is from a merchant's letter to his English correspondent:—

"NEW YORK, April 26.

"I have yours, with copy of letter from Nashville. If the feeling exists as represented by your correspondent, and of which I have no doubt, it will be a long time before we can get cotton or trade. Before we can accomplish anything in the right direction, the parties waging war must learn the spirit and temper of their foe, and address themselves to it, which, this far, they have entirely ignored. From what I learn from Baltimore, the entire South has never been the unit in purpose and action they now are. I am informed that all things, such as vessels, armaments, plate, &c., are freely tendered to the cause of resistance. The siege of Yorktown continues, and here great doubts and apprehensions are felt if the whole Virginia line can be defended. The siege will be a long, if not an unsuccessful, one."

The following is from the South, and was written to a member of a leading firm on this side:—

"COLUMBUS — , 1862.

"You are no doubt fully posted by advices which reach England of the movement of affairs on this continent. July last was the time the Lincoln Government fixed for suppression entire of the little rebellion, as they call it; and so far they have made little progress, with all their immense army and navy, and bawling, all how long, they will continue in their suicidal course God only knows. Every day, however, that they keep up the warfare, but helps the independence of the South; and if continued for two years would place us in a grand position, by bringing out our resources—developing mechanical and manufacturing elements—so as to make us the most independent people and nation in the world. I consider the feelings now prevailing in the North are for revenge; and with the party in power, to sustain themselves in that power, which is really no more than a military dictatorship. I thank God I am in a country where the civil law predominates, and freedom of speech and person reigns supreme. My interests have suffered by not going to New York; but if I had done so I should have been 'Bastiled.'

"I am quite inclined to believe that both England and France will adopt some course before long to cause a withdrawal of the blockade.

"You would be astonished to see the unlimited confidence which exists all through the country of the ultimate success of our arms. There is very little excitement, and no scarcity of the necessaries of life."

Extract from a letter from Savannah, March 28:—

"I am afraid you are doomed to disappointment about recognition, the Northern successes being apparently great, but will prove futile, and by the 1st of July they will be driven through Maryland into their Northern haunts, or I am much mistaken. We are only waking up to the enormous struggle before us, and men are flocking to the standard of the Confederacy from all quarters. By the 1st of June, if necessary, we will have a million of men in the field, and all armed in one way or another; besides a fleet of iron-clad gunboats. About here we are preparing for a stout defence; the scoundrels may shell Savannah, but they cannot hold it for two hours. All Georgia would flock here, on the telegraphic announcement that the first gun had been fired, and would fight them from house to house. The lead is being taken from pipes and window weights, not because we are short of it, but to make sure of having enough, and all points to a long and sanguinary contest. The enemy may annoy us here all summer, and, notwithstanding their dread of fevers, may attempt a bold stroke, and if so, a good, sound thrashing is in store for them. We are all getting used to war, and its rumours, and every one is employed in some way or other to alleviate its worst evils. Women are making clothes for the soldiers, and many of them nursing the sick; they are here and elsewhere ministering angels. How England, and English hearts, can stand by and see all the rules of modern warfare violated, as they are by the Northern vandals, I cannot understand; evidently the race is degenerating. Towns are fired into without a moment's warning, and women and children killed in the street. It is horrible, but they will have judgment visited upon them for it. If ever a people were in earnest, our people are now, and the veriest coward will fight to the bitter end against such a set of scoundrels. We don't care about their advancing into our country, feeling assured, that any who get back will have a sad tale to tell. Tennessee and Kentucky are heart and soul with us, and their passage through these portions of the country on a retreat will be peculiarly unenviable. I firmly believe, that by the 1st of July, there will be a dearth of Yankees this side the Ohio and Delaware. Your drivelling Whig Government are doubtless elated at the success of the North, and more particularly at Abe Lincoln's emancipation schemes, but there is a bitter pill for all of the Exeter Hall school to swallow before the close of 1862. The North have not common honesty in dealing with the negroes, and they won't stay with them. At Port Royal, they have a few hundred disaffected and inquisitive darkies, who, when opportunity serves, run off. Negroes now supply Fort Pulaski with fresh provisions, and carry the mails faithfully. Depend upon it, all their talk about contraband is bosh, emphatic bosh. The city is in a good state of defence, and what we are now doing is to perfect that state. Business men want the recognition of the Confederacy by Great Britain, in order to facilitate the opening of the ports, but the general public don't care two straws about it.

"The South will work out its own salvation, but it would have bound her to the old country by many ties, if it had been done, and when it is too late your Government will find out the terrible mistake they have made. We expect and hope our commissioners will be withdrawn. By 1st August you will have a letter from me dated Baltimore, if not Philadelphia; this is not a silly boast; for if you ever heard of men gathering to their country's standard faster than they are here, I never have."

"PHILADELPHIA, 25th April, 1862.

"I am sorry to see, from the tone of your last letter, the gloomy views to which the friends of the South are yielding under the influence of the exaggerated accounts transmitted to Europe through Northern sources, of Federal successes. The friends of the South here, I assure you, feel no despondency. The only point on which they entertained any anxiety was as to the temper and spirit with which the Southern people would meet their reverses, and in regard to that, ample and satisfactory evidence comes from nearly the entire South, of the determination to make every sacrifice, and encounter any extent of suffering which may be necessary to secure the success of the holy cause of resistance to Northern domination. All eyes are now turned upon the two points—Corinth and Yorktown—where, in a great measure, rests the solution of the question, how long this unnatural struggle is to continue. The battles of which they may be the fields even at this moment, but which cannot be deferred many days, must, if disastrous to the Northern arms in both, or either, of those places, cause a terrible panic in financial circles throughout the North. Nothing but the strong conviction entertained in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, of an early termination of the war by the submission of the rebels, sustains the value of Government securities. One serious reverse at either of those important points would open the eyes of capitalists to the folly of the views held by them. As soon as it shall appear that the task of subjugating the South is to be prolonged, not for a few more weeks or months, but for one or more years, an apprehension as to the security of the Government issues will begin to pervade the public mind, and a fear of repudiation will gradually grow up and extend. It is becoming very doubtful whether the present Congress will be able to agree upon and pass a tax-bill. A canvass of Republicans took place two or three nights since on the subject, which broke up without coming to any agreement. I conversed last night on this subject with an ex-Senator, who stated his conviction, that no taxes could be collected in the Western States, and that any attempt on the part of the Government to collect them would be met by open resistance. He looked upon repudiation as inevitable."

"NEW ORLEANS, 4th April, 1862.

"By letters lately received, I am called upon to make provision for the support of my family abroad. Exchange here has been selling at rates ruinous to the purchaser. The sugar crop of last year amounts to about a million lbs., more or less, of excellent quality, of which somewhat less than half has been sold at from 30 to 40 dollars per hhd. Provision crops, such as corn, potatoes, peas, &c., are abundant. Pork is selling at 45 to 50 dollars per bbl. The determination, so far as I can learn from all sources, to neglect cotton, and to raise enormous provision crops, is imminent among the planters of the South. I find money abundant here, and could readily sell the mortgage notes which I hold.

"The whole country has been thoroughly aroused by our late reverses. Indeed, our people appear but now to begin to have a due sense of the magnitude of the conflict in which we are engaged. We have abandoned all expectation, not only of aid, but even of justice and fair-play, on the part of England; and I must say to you, that our former friendly sentiments towards that Power are gradually becoming alienated, and will, unless checked, eventuate in positive hostility.

"The burning of cotton has thus far lighted the footsteps of the enemy across our border, and you may rely upon it, that henceforth they will get possession of none of the staple, whatever success may attend them. A fleet of thirty or forty enemy's vessels are collected in the river above the pipes, and an attempt upon the fort is momentarily expected. Every confidence appears to be felt here in the result."

Extracts from letters from New Orleans:—

"MARCH 23rd, 1862.

"If this letter reaches you, advise my family in Ireland that we are all perfectly well, and that there is, in my judgment, no chance of a termination of war for years to come. European intervention can only do so—of this you can best judge. I do not believe in any interference myself. I never doubted that we shall succeed unassisted and alone; in due time working out our own salvation."

"MARCH 21st, 1862.

"We expect an attack here soon, and every man from 18 to 45 is under arms, and in camp round the city. I see no hope of an early termination of this war; it has therefore only commenced. Our only currency is Government paper, and private "shin plasters." Gold is 65 per cent. premium to-day.

Extract from a letter from a merchant in New Orleans, dated March 16th:—

"My brother and myself have been for the last week with our regiment—the 2nd battalion of Crescent Rifles—encamped at the Metarie Ridge, on part of what used to be the old Hopkin's plantation, two miles down the Pontchartruni Railroad. Yesterday I received your letter of 23rd January, from Liverpool. Mr. Yancey brought it from Savannah. He came down to our camp, and we received him in hollow square; but he did not address our corps. We learned from the officers, however, that he says we have no friends in England; and that, under God, our own right arms must fight and win our cause. Since the publication of Lord Lyons' abolition despatch to Earl Russell, a very bitter feeling has sprung up here against England; and the old country will rue for many a long day the opportunity she has allowed to pass of free trade with the South, which now, I fear, may be considered lost for ever.

"Numbers of your friends have left to join the Bishop (General Polk) and General Bauregard in Tennessee. Janvier left yesterday, and so did De Buys and his brother of the Star Insurance Company. Our camp is called Camp Caroline, in honour of our colonel's (J. F. Girault) wife. As to the final result of the war, no one doubts the success of the Confederate cause, though the struggle may be protracted.

"In thirty days we shall be ready to send off a very powerful iron-clad steam ram and battery combined, fully equal to the Merrimac. I write from town, having a furlough for a day."

SAVANNAH, March 10th, 1862.

[Extract.]

COTTON is unchanged in Griffin, 7 cents for middling, 7½ cents good middling. Albany the same. Augusta strict middling, 7½ cents to 7½ cents good middling, 8 cents middling, fair 8½ cents to 8½ cents. Columbus 6½ cents to 7 cents for middling. It is difficult to get insurance in either of the above places. We are trying to buy some cotton in some plantations, but have not succeeded as yet. Some planters have too high notions.

We do not think that planters in general will plant much cotton, unless the blockade is raised shortly; at any rate, they will not make more than ½ to ½ crop, as they are all turning their hands to grain.

SAVANNAH, March 22nd, 1862.

[Extract.]

THE general aspect of affairs is so gloomy, and the prospect of raising the blockade so distant, that we have concluded for the present not to buy any more cotton; the place where it might be stored might be evacuated, which now seems the order of the day; and the whole of the investment lost.

SAVANNAH, March 28th, 1862.

[Extract.]

THINGS begin to look rather gloomy, and we do not think that there is the slightest prospect of peace, or even of the blockade being raised; and if it was raised, business could not begin for at least two months. A vessel is loading in Charleston at 6 cents, and freight payable in advance. We tried, but in vain, to get some room, as we think the vessel will succeed, and cotton will do better in Europe than here; it may have to remain stored a very long time.

Cotton is unchanged since our last. Sterling 70 per cent premium.

THE COTTON COMING FORWARD.—There is great activity in the cotton trade at points where our forces hold possession. The first shipment up the Mississippi since the commencement of the war is thus announced by the correspondent of the Chicago Times with Foot's fleet:—"The Government despatch steamer De Soto, which arrived this morning from Fort Pillow, brought 300 bales of cotton, taken at Osceola by a detachment of our land forces attached to Commodore Foot's flotilla. This is an interesting bit of intelligence, the more so from the fact that the above shipment of cotton is the first sent up the river since the commencement of hostilities. Other quantities will be sent to this place. The region about Fort Pillow is a very extensive cotton district, and Fulton, the small town just below the rebel fortifications, has long been known as a heavy cotton-shipping port." The Nashville Union reports that Tennessee cotton is also fast finding its way to market. The Union says:—"There is great briskness in the cotton market at present at this point. Loads are constantly passing through the city on their way to the river. One boat, the day before yesterday, left with some 200 bales. Buyers are scouring the country in all directions as far as the protection of the Federal lines extend, and sometimes even further. The planters are acting like men of practical sense, and are quick to trade. Good middling brings 16 and 17 cents in specie or United States Treasury notes, and 22 and 25 in current Tennessee paper. There is no holding back on the part of the planters. They all fully appreciate the immense benefits which reviving trade will scatter over an almost bankrupt country. One thing has forced itself upon the minds of those even who were unwilling at first to admit the fact—interference with private property which has not been included in the rebellion will not be made by Federal troops. All parties now feel secure in this respect."

Foreign Correspondence.

OUR WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT.

[The chief value of the subjoined correspondence is its genuine impartiality, and the remarkable accuracy with which it reflects the drawing-room and official war-gossip, and the alternating hopes and fears entertained at the enemy's capital. With the most scrupulous care to hold an even balance between the contending parties, it is morally impossible for our correspondent to wholly withdraw his views and opinions from the colouring of the medium through which he receives them. He cannot be blamed, therefore, if he sometimes states as facts what we know to be partly, if not wholly, erroneous, and expresses doubts and makes comments which we know to be unjust to the South, and to the loyalty and unalterable resolution of its people. But we have thought it our duty to lay this correspondence before our readers precisely as we ourselves receive it, without the slightest attempt to make it conform to our own views or even to our own knowledge of facts. Thus forewarned, the reader cannot fail to find in it much exclusive information, not allowed to ooze through the hermetically sealed press of the North, and also valuable materials for forming a correct opinion of the progress of the war.]

WASHINGTON, April 28.

THE city here is quite mad with joy at the fall of the "Crescent City," announced to-day from Fortress Monroe; but certain of the more cautious readers of events cannot disguise their apprehensions that the demonstrations may be premature, considering that we have twice before had the same news from the same source. And, although the great probability of the event renders its reception more than usually reliable, yet I cannot help remarking that the telegrams in both instances are based upon information only, and derived from very suspicious sources; for no one can have even a slight acquaintance with the negro, but must be fully aware of the almost insane desire to manufacture news, and the wonderfully able manner in which they adorn that and make up a lie so as to deceive even the most wary, pervades the whole race. And this may be a most clever contrivance, after all. The wish may have been father to the thought, and the name of the general who signed the despatch is strangely significative of the head that may have planned it. The fact, too, that some of the New York papers add to the previous notice, that "the operators, who had cut the communications on leaving New Orleans, returned—time not stated—and found the place in possession of the enemy," must be an invention, because, as the telegraph could not work, it was physically impossible this fact could have reached us.

Be this as it may, the public will not hear of any but implicit belief, and are extremely sore that the information of our previous victories—Fort Henry, Fort Donnellson, Pea Ridge, Island No. 10, Roanoke, Newbern, Nashville, and Huntsville, here appreciated to their full significance—have not attracted the notice, and received the due praise and treatment in Europe that they really deserved. There seems a well-grounded expectation in well-informed quarters, that with the possession of New Orleans, the Custom House reopened, and ample protection offered to the transactions of commerce, it cannot but happen that the monied and commercial classes will seize the opportunity of renewing the long-closed-up trade of the port. The merchants and bankers here, it is known, advanced largely on the crops; and we may fairly expect, if the Mississippi be kept open by the gunboats, they will procure the cotton so as to obtain the balances in their favour, and sell the stocks still uncovered by their advances. It is this consideration which, if the capture of New Orleans be really an accomplished fact, will open the eyes of Europe to the value of the acquisition by the Federal forces.

Florida seems destined to give annoyance to the blockading squadron. Jacksonville has been evacuated under "a necessity," which is reported as being "an unfortunate one." From one of the residents there, who passed up to Rhode Island, where he has relations, we learnt that this abandonment was against the feeling of the inhabitants. Florida is one of the chief sources of supplying fresh beef for the Confederate army, and its conquest would inflict great inconvenience now that the railway communications of the South-West have been seriously interfered with. I learn from a cotton buyer just returned from Tennessee, that there is no lack of sellers in that State; the small men preferring to get cash instead of the barren story of burning their stocks. In fact, though there must naturally arise some irritation and many complications in settling the country again under the Federal rule, yet, by firm and gentle treatment, passions may be allayed; and by a conscientious and patient devotion to the general interests of the nation, the Government may in time secure a firmer and better Union than ever before existed. At the same time, I am bound to say that the instalment of Andy Johnson in the government of the State he had so reviled was a most injudicious measure, which is bearing evil fruits to the Northern cause.

Cameron's release from arrest under President Lincoln's indemnity, does not by any means meet with universal approbation, but the plot is not yet played out. Nous verrons. From Harrisonburg we learn that General Banks is fully entrenched, Jackson having fallen back on Gordonsville, forty miles easterly, at the junction of the Alexandria and Orange and the Virginia Central Railway; McDowell still occupies the heights on the Rappahannock, over against the town of Fredericksburg. The steamer Yankee, on the 22nd, went up, through the obstructions, to seven miles below the town. We hear but little of the Merrimac, but it's confidently reported she has been fitted with a new and stronger prow, and has been iron-plated three feet below water-mark. The weather has been very unfavourable for the last week, but with fine days we may look for her daily. The Galena and Vanderbilt, however, which arrived in Hampton Roads on the 23rd, are burning to encounter her. There are also rumours of four other iron-plated steamers being ready to issue with her from Norfolk, under Tattall's orders; so we shall have some new naval experiments for the French and English officers to criticise.

At all events, there seems no lack of energy on the side of the Confederates to meet their enemies; not only are the lines in front of McClellan well manned and armed, but forces are moving from Richmond, as well as from the Shenandoah Valley, to concentrate against an attack on the capital, whether from McDowell, or McClellan—General Ewell is said to have 8000 men at the crossing of the river, and General Smith to be strongly entrenched with 30,000. There seems, also, to have been every kind of zeal shown in the service of enlistment all through the Southern States. At Fort Pulaski, there is a story that one of the engineer officers had misdirected the fire of the batteries, in order to conceal defects which he had himself committed at in building the fort, so as to cheat Government. A shell burst in unloading, which killed three men and wounded one.

Beauregard is strongly reinforced, and has informed his Government he is prepared to hold his own, if not repeat his last blow. Now that the rivers are falling, there is less chance of his victory being snatched from him by gunboats, as was undoubtedly the case on his former essay; but General Mitchell's possession of the Memphis and Charleston Railway must, inevitably, hamper his communications.

All things considered—as I wrote to you last week—the heat of May, which we are just beginning to feel, is the best friend the Southern cause has; and there are awkward accounts afloat of diarrhoea both in the armies of Grant and McClellan.

The report from the Philadelphia Inquirer is making a good deal of talk here to-day.

IMPORTANT FROM WASHINGTON.

From the Washington correspondence of the Philadelphia Inquirer, under date of the 28th, we select the following:—

"A CESSATION OF HOSTILITIES.

"The current report to-day on the street is that the Government is in possession of information which may possibly lead to a cessation of hostilities for the present. A mediation and compromise forms the basis of this report. A special message from the President to Congress, on this subject, is even hinted at. A few hours may bring about a wondrous change in our warlike movements."

Don't believe in it. Mr. W— says, "if New Orleans is taken, the backbone of the rebellion is broken, and he does not see how the Southern people can collect their forces and strength together again, so as to make a successful resistance." He says General Winfield Scott told him when New Orleans was taken, then the backbone of the rebellion was broken, and President Lincoln would probably declare an amnesty. Mr. W— thinks this may be so; if some such course is not pursued, he thinks no settlement will be arrived at, as the Southern people will not be in a humour to make any under unconditional surrender. E. don't believe in any proclamation of amnesty. The most of the people say neither the North or the South are in a temper to make any compromise.

I give you all I hear except one thing I forgot. It is rumoured that the Norfolk Day Book states that Beauregard has had another victory at Corinth, taken 9000 prisoners, and that Foote has had to retire to Island No. 10. The street is full of wild reports. Government stocks have been run up very high, and the above may be for stock purposes.

ENGLAND, FRANCE, AND THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

(FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.)

PARIS, May 13.

M. MERCIER'S visit to Richmond has been for the past week, and still continues to attract the undivided attention of the Parisian press; and while the newspapers devoted to the Northern cause seem to take delight in circulating the wildest speculations with regard to that demonstration, those whose relations with the different Ministers entitle them to a sort of quasi-official standing, are evidently engaged in preparing public opinion for an earnest move of the French Government in the American question.

This is by no means a groundless supposition, for the Constitutionnel of the 8th instant, which, as you are already aware, draws its inspiration from M. de Persigny, contains a most significant editorial; indeed, it sets the whole question upon such unequivocal ground that it leaves no room for the slightest doubt. The Constitutionnel concludes its editorial thus:—"Our policy is far from supporting the institution of slavery, but at the same time that it endeavours to find the means to eradicate this institution without provoking revolutions and heaping ruins upon ruins, it is deeply interested in the fate of the French industry, and the Carolina negroes cannot throw the operatives of Lyons and Roubaix into oblivion."

"The policy of the Constitutionnel resolves itself in two words: conciliation, mediation."

When, in connection with this conclusion, it is known upon most undoubted authority that M. Mercier is expected in Paris on or about the 26th instant, none but those whose intelligence is plunged into complete darkness by a species of Yankee monomania can mistake the fact that France has decided to take some decisive steps to relieve the daily increasing distress and sufferings of its working classes, which have been brought up to consider the Government the great and only curer of all evils, whatever be their source or nature, and which are far from being as enduring as the English operatives.

True it is, there exists some diversity of opinion with regard to the best policy to be adopted in the premises; but, with the exception of M. Thouvenel, who is said to be opposed to the South on account of his Orleanist tendencies, all the other members of the Cabinet fully agree upon this all-important point, i.e., that something must be done immediately to avoid the closing of the cotton mills, upon which millions of lives are entirely dependent. It is even positively asserted that M. Rouher, the Minister of Commerce, has fully impressed the Emperor's mind with the fact, that unless some assurance be given to the cotton spinners of a forthcoming supply of that staple before the end of next month, the worst is to be apprehended.

Whether M. Thouvenel will finally yield his Orleanist sympathies to the more practical views of his associates is still doubted. But in the high diplomatic circles—even in the Senate Chamber—it is currently reported that should M. Thouvenel persist much longer in his unfriendliness towards the South, a change of Ministry is to be looked for; and that M. de Persigny, who is known to be a strong friend of the Southern Confederacy, and a stern advocate for its unconditional recognition, is already designated as the person to take charge of the Foreign Office. However, things will remain in their statu quo until M. Mercier's arrival in Paris, when the Government is determined to move, with or without the concurrence of England.

Old England is losing the ancient prestige which encircled her Royal crown. Once the proud ruler of the destinies of the European continent, she seems now to be contented humbly to resign her former supremacy.

In the present crisis, the conduct of England is astounding. The English Ministry is fully aware of the impending catastrophes which threaten to tear asunder the very basis of her industrial prosperity; her gigantic India cotton scheme has proved to be an utter failure, for the present at least. Indeed, the London Times, satisfied with the imperious necessity of some decisive action upon the matter, came out a few days ago with an editorial, headed, "What is England to do?" France has for some time past been making the strongest appeals to the British Cabinet to combine their mutual efforts to put a stop to the existing state of things in America. Each forward move of the Federal army towards the more Southern regions of the Confederate States is welcomed with the sombre flare of the blazes destroying and reducing to ashes millions of dollars' worth of property, as also of the cotton upon which rests the principal basis of England's commercial wealth. Each advanced step of the Northern army into the South but unravels the sad story of more sad forthcoming disasters. And yet there is an hesitation to pursue the only course which might, in saving the English people from fearful privations, secure the existence of the present Cabinet, and avert the threatened blow.

It must be now, for all sober-minded men, a self-evident proposition, that the American Union is among the things that were, and that all further attempts to reconstruct the former state of friendly feelings between the North and South, will prove as vain and fruitless as would be the undertaking to infuse a new principle of life into a corpse. It must be plain to every close observer of the last year's American events, that the only object to be certainly attained by the continuance of this iniquitous war, is the destruction of Southern property, and the laying waste of the Southern fertile soil. Indeed, a portion of this year's cotton crop has already been burnt; much more of that staple is likely to meet with the same ominous fate. Very little of it, if any, has been sown; the next crop is, therefore, more than uncertain at this present moment, and will, no doubt, be entirely annihilated if this war continues much longer.

In presence of all these incontrovertible facts staring at England in the face, can we not ask with propriety, "What will she do then?" I leave this question to her due consideration.

NEW YORK, April 29.

The whole of the talk here is, of course, the fall of New Orleans; but there is enough on our hands on the money question to make most of us nervous. The Chamber of Commerce's Special Committee on the Tax Bill have made their report, which has occasioned most serious apprehensions. I send you the seven items under which they have classed the tariff proposed, and adopted entire by the Chamber, to be recommended to Congress.

1. A tax of 1 per cent. on all sales of goods, merchandise, and other property, whether wholesale or by retail	Dollars.
2. The tariff of Customs' duties	115,000,000
3. An excise, or tax, on cotton of 2c. per lb.	50,000,000
4. An excise, or tax, on tobacco of 20c. per lb.	24,000,000
5. An excise, or tax, on whiskey and other liquors at 25c. per gallon	30,000,000
6. An excise, or tax, on malt liquors of 5c. per gallon	25,000,000
7. A direct tax on real and personal property	8,000,000
	12,000,000
	264,000,000

You have plenty of financiers in England who will detect at a glance the fallacy of these figures. I can assure you, that here the feeling is one of grave alarm, the tax of 1d. per lb. on cotton being a direct premium on foreign competition in that staple in the markets of England and France. And "Who is to pay these 264 millions?" is becoming more and more widely asked, and the answer is never satisfactorily given. People are beginning to see the real strain all this conquest and subjugation must inevitably lead to. There are, it is true, a great many who ought to know better, who talk of the large resources the Government will draw from confiscated lands in the South; but who will guarantee the title? It will cost more to maintain the possession than the land can possibly be worth. So that though the city is flaunting with banners, and cannon are booming in honour of victory, there is a gloomy feeling of apprehension pretty widely spread.

The capture of New Orleans has made our market quiet; holders generally not disposed to give way. Spinners don't come in yet. The stock has been reduced by the sales of the past ten days, and spinners, if they continue to run, will have to buy again soon, and considerable. There is a great deal of talk about large supplies coming from the West, but I think the quantity is very much exaggerated.

OUR COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE CONFEDERATE STATES OF AMERICA.

(From our Nassau Correspondent.)

NASSAU, April 12.

There is a strong feeling at this place that the European powers must shortly recognize the Confederate States. Our merchants are particularly struck with the thorough inefficiency of the blockade. It does not close the Southern ports, and running the blockade has long ceased to be an adventure. The only effect of the pretended blockade is to increase the rates of insurance for vessels bound for Southern ports, and it allows Federal ships to annoy neutrals and make a few captures. The European powers, by respecting our ineffective blockade, are giving the Federals an unfair advantage, for it enables them to inflict a serious injury on the Confederate States at a trifling, on at all events, an inadequate expenditure of strength and money. Is there any doubt still existing in England that the blockade is a sham? If so, I think the perusal of the accompanying extract from the Nassau Guardian will remove it, and convince the most sceptical:—

A GREAT deal of curiosity has been expressed of late as to the extent of the commercial relations of Nassau with the Confederate States of America. To gratify this very general desire, we have carefully examined the official records of the Customs, and are enabled to present subjoined a complete list of all the arrivals from Confederate ports since the commencement of the Federal blockade.

It is not with the view of expatiating on the effectiveness of the latter measure that we have compiled this table, but to show to our merchants the importance of the trade that has recently grown up, and which, if properly fostered, may attain much wider proportions. The majority of the vessels mentioned below have again run the blockade into Confederate ports; but of these we need not present a record.

It is a notable circumstance that the arrivals from the Southern States are far more numerous than those from the North, with which our intercourse is free and unrestrained:—

1861.

June 17. Sch. Parker, Smith, Fernandina, naval stores.
 „ 18. Sch. W. H. Northrop, Silliman, Wilmington, lumber.
 Aug. 7. Sch. W. H. Northrop, Silliman, do. do.
 „ 13. Sch. Victoria, Certain, do., rice.
 Sept. 4. Sch. Mary Adeline, Carlin, Charleston, do.
 „ 9. Sch. Hampton, Gladding, Savannah, do.
 „ 19. Sch. Atkinson, Fitzinger, Georgetown, do.
 „ 20. Sch. Victoria, Vincent, Beaufort, S. C., do.
 Oct. 2. Sch. Carrie Sanford, Haggett, Wilmington, lumber.
 „ 8. Sch. Mary Louisa, Bettilini, Jacksonville, naval stores.
 „ 12. Sch. British Empire, Parsons, do., lumber.
 „ 15. Sch. J. W. Anderson, Black, Savannah, naval stores.
 „ 15. Sch. Adeline, Smith, Savannah, naval stores.
 Nov. 4. Sch. Lucy R. Waring, Smith, do. do.
 „ 6. Sch. John R. Wilder, Gardner, do., rice.
 „ 7. Sch. H. F. Willing, Gill, do. do.
 „ „ Sch. Gen. Ripley, Phillips, Charleston, do.
 „ 8. Sloop Mary, Baker, Savannah do.
 „ 15. Sch. Garibaldi, Bettilini, Jacksonville, naval stores.
 Dec. 5. Sch. Prince of Wales, Adair, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 6. Sloop Belle, Moore, Charleston, rice.
 „ 7. Steamship Ella Warley, Swasey, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 10. Steamship Theodora, Lockwood, do. do.
 1862.

Jan. 10. Sch. Garibaldi, Bettilini, Jacksonville, naval stores.
 „ 18. Steamship Kate, Lockwood, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 29. Sch. Col. McRea, Perry, Georgetown, S. C., naval stores.
 „ „ Sch. Arrow, Dennis, St. John's, Fla., do.
 Feb. 6. Sch. Alert, Howe, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 8. Sch. Louise, Byers, do., rice and cotton „ 10. Sch. Courier, Davis, do., cotton.
 „ 12. Steamship Nelly, Moore, do., do.
 „ 13. Sch. Sue, Smith, do., naval stores.
 „ 16. Steamship Kate, Lockwood, do., cotton.
 „ 24. Steamship Cecile, Peck, do., do.
 Mar. 3. Sch. Chase, Allen, do., lumber.
 „ Steamship Ella Warley, Swasey, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 4. Sch. Sir Robert Peel, Guage, Charleston, cotton and naval stores.
 „ 8. Steamship Cecile, Peck, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 10. Sch. Zaidee, Adair, do., cotton, and tobacco.
 „ 11. Sch. British Empire, Parsons, Jacksonville, naval stores.
 „ „ Steamship Kate, Carlin, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 12. Sch. Kate, Sabistan, do., cotton and lumber.
 „ 17. Sch. Laura, Ferklenberg, do., do.
 „ „ Sch. Carrie Sanford, Haggett, St. John's, Fla., naval stores.
 „ „ Sloop Coquette, Moore, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 22. Sch. Argyle, Davis, Charleston, cotton and naval stores.
 „ 27. Sch. Victoria, Fowler, St. Johns, Fla., naval stores.
 „ „ Sch. Annie Deans, Morse, Fernandina, do.
 „ „ Steamship Nashville, Gooding, Georgetown, S. C., ballast.
 April 2. Sch. Pride, Davis, Georgetown, S. C., cotton.
 „ 3. Steamship Economist, Burdge, Charleston, cotton.
 „ „ Sch. Rutherford, Green, Charleston, cotton.
 „ 7. Sch. Sarah, Russell, do. do.
 „ „ Sch. Acorn, Habenicht, do. do.
 „ 8. Sch. Louisa, Tolle, do. do.
 „ „ Sch. Chase, Habenicht, do. do.
 „ 9. Sch. Elizabeth, Rumley, do. do.
 „ 10. Steamship Cecile, Carling, do. do.
 Total 68, of which 35 since 1st January.

A SOUTHERN PLANTER'S VIEW OF THE COMING CROP.

From the Augusta Chronicle and Sentinel.

IN the estimate I now make of our necessities and our resources, I regret that I have not access to that exact information which I should desire, but still I hope this article may serve a good purpose in availing the people and their representatives to the truth of our situation. The estimate presents nothing to make us doubt, still less despair; its aspect is all hopeful, if we will but do our whole duty. I assume that we are virtually cut off from Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, that Virginia and North Carolina can hold their own, and that the remaining eight States—Cotton States—must feed and clothe themselves. I shall confine myself entirely to Georgia; and now, can we in this State feed ourselves? I answer yes, if we cultivate no cotton, or at most, not more than one-fifth of an acre to the hand.

Georgia has a population in round numbers of 1,100,000—650,000 whites, 450,000 blacks. To give bread to the blacks will require at least 5,000,000 bushels of corn. For seed and bread for the whites 2,000,000 bushels of corn. To make meat for the whole population will require 1,000,000 hogs and 200,000 cattle, and these will consume 23,000,000 bushels of corn and peas—counting what is necessary to fatten them and to keep up the stock for the future. I assume that we have a million of hogs and three or four hundred thousand cattle, and do not count the sheep as meat producers, for they ought all to be saved for their wool, to clothe the soldiers.

We certainly have as many as 125,000 mules and horses, which will consume 5,000,000 bushels of corn, in addition to 7,500,000 bushels of oats, shelled or in the sheaf. I estimate only 1,000,000 of bushels of corn and peas for the sheep; and we thus see that we must produce 37,000,000 bushels of corn and peas in Georgia, allowing that we feed only our proportional part of the army, and that the army consumes as economically as other people. We must add on another million of bushels of peas for seed, and we have thus 38,000,000 of bushels to be produced this year. Can we do it? We can, if we will cultivate 4,000,000 of acres in corn, with a hill of peas to every hill of corn. At an average of eight bushels per acre—certainly a fair one—we shall get 32,000,000 bushels of corn, and an average of three bushels additional for peas will give us 12,000,000 bushels of that fine food—total 44,000,000, or 6,000,000 bushels to spare, under favourable circumstances of cultivation, and with genial seasons.

Have we 4000 acres of open land in Georgia, not now sown in wheat and oats? I hope so, but it is certainly doubtful. Mr. Bigham tells us that twelve years ago the nine States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas, had of improved land less than 25,000,000 of acres—less than 3,000,000 to a State. Georgia, of course, had largely more than an average then—perhaps four or five millions—but she has not greatly extended her arable land since, for though much land has been cleared, much also has been abandoned or “turned out.” I estimate that we will regain five and a half millions of acres of land in Georgia, cultivated in wheat, oats, corn, and peas in order to feed ourselves—distributed as follows: 500,000 acres in wheat, 1,000,000 acres in oats, 400,000 acres in corn and peas, to say nothing of barley, rye, potatoes, and sugar cane. I make no account of rice, which is never intrinsically worth a dollar per hundred weight, though it usually sells for three or four times that sum; and can never enter largely into the food of a great or a free people.

I believe we can make enough on 5,000,000—half a million in wheat, 1,000,000 in oats, and three and a-half million in corn and peas. The production would then stand probably: 28,000,000 bushels of corn, 10,500,000 bushels of peas (excess of half a million); 10,000,000 bushels of oats (no excess, for the horses and mules would consume 7,500,000; 1,500,000 would be required for seed, and the balance for calves and sheep); wheat 4,000,000 (a deficiency of 550,000 bushels, allowing seven bushels per head for all the whites, including seed.)

We have, then, certainly not more than enough improved or open land in Georgia to produce our food and necessary clothing, even if we had a superabundance of labour. But, in reality, we have no more labour than is necessary to produce our food and clothing, had we ever so much land. I do not believe we can put into the fields this year much land, if any more, than 200,000 farm labourers. Nearly all the whites who have heretofore laboured in the fields will be soldiers; and deducting the young negroes and those who wait upon the household, those who live in the towns and those who have gone with their masters to the war, we shall only have about 200,000 blacks to cultivate the fields. My estimate of half a million acres in wheat is 2½ acres to the hand—a liberal, perhaps an over estimate. 1,000,000 of acres in oats is five acres to the hand—and certainly we have not more than that amount sown. 4,000,000 in corn and peas will be twenty acres to the hand—as much as can be cultivated.

In view of these estimates, which are believed to be substantially correct enough for all practical purposes, is there an owner of land or labour in Georgia who would not fail in his duty, who would not be criminally remiss, did he plant one foot of land in cotton, other than enough to produce fifteen pounds to each member of his family, for clothing, and who did not plant the very last acre of land he had, and could cultivate, in corn, peas, potatoes, cabbages, and other vegetables, for food? And after the wheat and oat harvest, should he not plant every acre of wheat and oat land in peas, or at least, every one which would produce more in peas than in crab grass?

If all will do their whole duty, I feel no apprehension except on one point—clothing for the feet, shoes. Our sheep, I believe, will abundantly clothe 100,000 soldiers, and perhaps 100,000 or 200,000 others, and the remainder of the population, including the negroes, must be clothed in cotton. We can make some shift for hats. But it will require the leather from 200,000 Georgia cattle to give one pair of shoes to all, white and black. We are, unfortunately, not great consumers of beef, cattle being mainly slaughtered for the towns, and it is doubted whether we kill 50,000 a year, certainly not 100,000. We prefer bacon, rearing mainly the hog, which consumes more and pays worse in this country than any of our domestic animals; while we greatly neglect cattle, and especially sheep, the latter of which consumes less and pays better than any other animal. But, in the worse case, we can make shoes with wood bottoms and cotton uppers. As to tea and coffee, and perhaps in a measure, sugar and molasses, we must make up our minds to dispense with them. Surely we can, if we are undegenerate descendants of the men and women of '76, and if our political life for the last twenty or thirty years has not wholly corrupted and debased us, and emancipated us as well of hardness, endurance, and patience of privation, as of public virtue. Considering all these facts, the State Legislatures not being in session, ought not the Confederate Government, charged as it is with the public safety, at once enact a law, with the severest penalties, prohibiting the planting of cotton beyond one fifth of an acre to the hand, and granting a bounty of ten dollars per hand to all those who, having heretofore cultivated cotton, and having already sold last year's crop, would plant none at all this year? Such a bounty would not amount to a million of dollars, and would enable those who received it to buy enough of last crop to clothe their people.

I should be glad to see this communication copied throughout the State, and to have every one into whose hands it may fall read it to his neighbours. I have written it only to do good—not for notoriety. Respectfully,

V. M. B.

THE BATTLE OF SHILOH.

SUNDAY morning, everything having been in readiness, General Hardee moved up his division to within a mile of the enemy's encampments, which extended between Lick and Owl Creeks, a distance of six miles, and from Pittsburg Landing, on the river, four miles into the interior. At early dawn the column commenced steadily advancing, and before it was yet light, were upon the enemy, who were taken completely by surprise; and, being panic-stricken, fled towards the river, deserting their camps, and leaving behind them all their camp equipage and one battery of light artillery.

This was on the enemy's right, at a place known as Shiloh Church. In half an hour after the attack, the entire Federal camp was aroused, and their forces, which Federal officers who were taken prisoners estimated at 70,000 men, put under arms. Following Hardee's advance a general movement was made by our line, and by nine o'clock the battle raged at its height. Steadily our troops commenced advancing, the enemy slowly falling back, desperately disputing every foot of ground. At ten a.m. we had captured three batteries and rifled guns, the gunners and horses being killed, and the supporting force of infantry driven back into the woods, hotly pursued by our conquering troops.

At eleven o'clock our generals became satisfied that thus early in the day we had gained a victory, as at all points the enemy, unable to withstand the terrible charges of our infantry and the murderous fire of artillery, which mowed them down by scores, were giving way. At twelve o'clock we had charged five batteries, four of them successfully.

Up to one o'clock, p.m., our advance was a series of continued successes; and at a time when the enemy were giving way along their line, a temporary panic seized one of our regiments, the result of which was the death of our commanding general, A. S. Johnston. Seeing that the regiment was wavering, and our line at that point beginning to bend, the old hero, with hat in hand, rode in front of them, urging them to come on, saying, “this will never do, we must drive them away.”

The regiment was rallied, and again advanced, while General Johnston rode to another position on the field, apparently unhurt. He dismounted from his horse and told a friend that he was fatally wounded, he feared. In a few minutes after getting off his horse, he lay down and died, having bled to death from a wound in the leg.

At no time, from noon until six o'clock p.m., did the enemy, who, at dark, were driven to the river, fully five, and at some points six miles, through their encampments, retake a position or any of the batteries, six in number, from which they were driven, or the guns captured. The main body of our forces approached to within a mile of the river, and would have captured the entire army, had it not been for the decimating fire kept up by the gunboats, and the guns of which the enemy sought protection.

Horses and mules that had been shot were running furiously over the field, trampling to death the wounded soldiers, who were unable to move to places of security, if such there were to be found. The landscape of the field, where lay friends in death who had but a moment before been enemies in life; the wounded as they begged for assistance; the uncontrolled rush of animals over dead and dying, the confusion incident to the occasion, was a picture, the sight of which appressed an appetite of desire to witness the horrors of the battle-ground, and filled one with a disgust and holy awe of war and its sufferings.

Night settled over the combatants, we occupying the Federal encampments, they huddled together along and under the banks of the river. At intervals of every few minutes during the night, a fire was kept up on us from the gunboats and batteries on the west side of the river, while our forces were busily engaged in removing the captured cannon, small arms, and stores, a large portion of which were taken off during the night, and are now in a place of safety.

Early on Monday morning, the enemy having received large reinforcements, advanced from the river in the direction of their former encampments, and before seven o'clock, the battle was renewed with all the fierceness of the day previous. Firmly and without flinching, for five long hours, our weary, fatigued, and exhausted troops held the enemy at bay; but about ten o'clock we withdrew to a position two miles distant from the scene of the first day's engagement, where we remained the evening, taking possession of their former encampments, which were not destroyed, although a large portion of everything valuable had been removed the night previous. Our artillery kept up a heavy fire until five o'clock, checking the advance of the enemy, and enabling us to remove our entire army and its equipments to Monterey, some eight miles distant, where the main portion of our army now is.

General Tom Crittenden is reported by the prisoners to have been killed early on Monday morning; he was undoubtedly on the field. General Beauregard was among our troops in the hottest of the fight on Monday, cheering them on and inspiring them by his presence. I saw him standing on a stump, with uncovered head, and as column after column would pass, he remarked, “fire low, boys, fire low.”

Taken together, the effect of the two days' engagements cannot be but of the most beneficial character upon the future of our arms.

We have met and conquered a superior force of the best troops in the Federal service, not Yankees, but stout, stalwart Western men, accustomed and inured to all the hardships of a frontier life, thoroughly drilled in the manual of arms and well disciplined.

There are reports that an armistice of three days, for the purpose of burying the dead, has been asked for and granted, but I can obtain no authentic confirmation of it.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade. Subscription, 28s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 15, 1862.

The Federal Occupation of New Orleans.

SUFFICIENT light is now thrown upon the vague and cloudy accounts of the Federal occupation of New Orleans, to make it certain that the city has been abandoned without an attempt at defence, after the bulk of the valuable property stored there had been destroyed or removed and that the Confederate troops in that locality have gone to reinforce Beauregard on the frontiers of Tennessee. The heroic reply of its chief magistrate to the summons of the Federal commander, removes any fears which the friends of the South might have entertained, that the surrender of the city implied a surrender of either the purpose or the ability to persevere to the last in the vital struggle for nationality and independence. The North will, doubtless, make the most of so favourable an opportunity for boastful triumph, and some time must necessarily elapse before the public mind of Europe can learn to correctly distinguish between the great commercial importance of New Orleans, and its comparative insignificance in a strategic point of view under the circumstances attending the present war. In its moral effects, therefore, the loss of New Orleans must be considered as a severe blow to the Confederate cause; in its bearing upon the issue of the war, we agree with those who believe that the South materially the gainer by it.

Twenty or thirty thousand men are added, instead of lost, to the available strength of the Southern armies, and added precisely at those points where the great battles must be fought and the contest decided, and where twenty or thirty thousand men, more or less, may decide the contest. The independence of the South does not depend on its seaports. They are not the centres of its vitality and intellectual activity; a blow at which would paralyze the whole. That vitality and that activity are distributed throughout the body politic, or, rather, the system of distinct bodies politic, which together form the new Confederacy. The value of those seaports depends on their relations to the country of which they are the natural outlets, and on the use that can be made of them for intercourse with the outside world.

Their possession by the Federals is simply a more effective blockade at the points possessed, than had previously been maintained, and it has this effect; no more. To the Federals, each point so occupied is new diversion of men and means, a new cause for useless expenditure, and a new source of danger. The fate of the country must at last decide the fate of the seaports but the fate of the seaports cannot materially affect the fate of the country; or the country can very well be held without those towns; but no power which does not hold the country is strong enough to retain forcible possession of them.

In the war of the colonies against the mother country, every considerable city on the continent was occupied by the English armies. It could scarcely be asserted that New Orleans bore the same relation to the Confederate States, or held the same preponderating position, that New York did to the Colonists; yet the occupation of New York weakened, instead of strengthening the military operations of the British generals. Philadelphia was then the intellectual and financial centre, as well as the political capital of the insurgent Power, which no town can claim to be for the South. Yet American independence was won while the CONFIDENTIAL CONGRESS was a body of fugitives, and British officers were enjoying the hospitalities and festivities of the late seat of the Revolutionary Government. Charleston and Savannah shared the fate of New York and Philadelphia, and yet the conquest of America was as far off as ever. There is a perfect parallel between the incidents of the first War of American Independence and those of the second, and the parallel will certainly continue to the end. This difference, however, we find throughout, that while the British armies, wherever they planted their flag, met a hearty welcome from a respectable portion of the population, the Federal invaders have met but Southern hate or dauntless defiance.

As we read the events on the Lower Mississippi, they mean this. The South, conscious of its error in attempting to defend too many points at once, and those almost always at a disadvantage, has at last decided to concentrate its strength where alone it can be made available for decisive results. There must be a great battle, perhaps a series of great battles, somewhere in the heart of the country, and there the South must triumph or succumb. Where the enemy musters in greatest strength, there he must be met with the largest force; where he is most vulnerable, there the Confederates must be prepared to strike the sudden blow. Instead, therefore, of scattering their armies, and giving the enemy the choice of time and place of attack, they will tempt him to commit the error which they have learned to avoid, and will enable themselves to use their whole strength whenever and wherever it is needed most.

Already we have dark rumours of a second battle at Pittsburg Landing, and it is possible that Beauregard, reinforced by the troops of New Orleans, has, ere this, avenged the fall of that city. Private letters from New York speak of reports in extensive circulation, and very generally believed, of a second defeat sustained by the Federals on the scene of their former disaster. It is a significant item, also, in the latest telegraphic intelligence, that no accounts whatever are allowed by the Federal War Department to be transmitted from the West. Away from their gunboat flotillas, with several hundred miles of hostile territory in their rear, the Northern armies cannot afford defeat, for defeat to them would be annihilation. A hundred small victories at the mouth of the Mississippi, or on the Atlantic seaboard, are not equal to the one blow which must be struck, and will be struck, which shall send the great army of the West, as a swarm of helpless fugitives, to find their way to the Ohio through the guerillas of Tennessee and Kentucky. Had the army before Bulls Run been situated as those of Buell and Mitchell, instead of having their entrenchments and their capital within six miles of the battle-field, the North could never have recovered from the disaster of that day. New Orleans might safely and wisely be left to no other defence than the climate and the yellow fever—deadlier and surer weapons than cannon-ball or bayonet—if the 20,000 men who could never so effectually and permanently have defended it, enable Beauregard to repeat Bulls Run at Corinth.

Southern Feeling towards England.

ONE fact impresses us painfully, in the many private letters from the South, from which we publish extracts elsewhere. Written, as they are, by persons living remote from each other, and widely differing in temperament and mental habits, not a few of them by natives of this country, who cannot be willing witnesses against the land of their birth, they all reveal traces of a growing estrangement between the people of the Confederate States and those who should be, and in truth are, their natural allies and best friends. We sincerely deplore even the faintest symptoms of a feeling, which, if allowed to take root, and fix itself permanently upon the Southern character, must be fatal to the true mutual interests of both countries; but it would be uncandid, as well as unwise, to conceal its existence.

Making due allowance for the excited passions of men who write amid the tumult of a war which has seldom, if ever, been paralleled in magnitude or in ferocity, let us calmly consider whether, indeed, the South has just causes of complaint and ill-will against the country which it has heretofore delighted to honour and love. To judge equitably in this matter, we must place ourselves in the position from which they view the attitude of Great Britain towards them. The South, for generations back, has been proud of its closer affinity of blood to the British parent stock, than the North, with its mongrel compound of the surplus population of all the world, could boast of. The South has always claimed, though, perhaps, not always logically, a more aristocratic, or at least, a more honourable descent, looking upon itself as the lawful offspring of the common mother; while it was disposed to treat the North, if not as a bastard, at least as a relative of doubtful legitimacy. Long before the political rivalries converted the Federal legislative halls into a vulgar prize-ring, a social feud, scarcely less bitter and unrelenting, was raging between the ill-cemented fractions of the great Republic. In this feud the South always sought the alliance of England; and if she sometimes caricatured, she always honestly strove to copy even the affectations of English manners. In the very forms of speech, or the enunciation of a vowel, the Southerner sought to establish a distinction between himself and the man of the North or West, and claimed a nearer approximation to the English standard. What of English books the wholesale piracy of Northern publishers permitted to find their way across the Atlantic, took their places, without scarcely any noticeable exception, on the shelves of Southern libraries; and the Southern gentleman prided himself upon paying five times the price for an English edition, than the same book would have cost in a "Yankee" dress. These are but trifles, it is true, but they show the current of a nation's affections, and whence it most expects, or would most gratefully receive, praise or favours.

The political institutions of Great Britain always had their warmest and most sincere admirers among the people of the South. The North, more arrogant and self-conceited, fond of change, with a population largely composed of the proletarian elements of Europe, could see in the governmental fabrics of the Old World only "rotten monarchies," and "petrified corpses," and fancied itself the chosen reformer and apostle of a new social and political system. The South, conservative by instinct, and from necessity, feeling humbled instead of elated, by the "glories" and "grandeur" of the vaunted Union, clung to the past and its traditions, rather than to the future and its promises. Of this Janus-faced Republic, which never was, and never could have been, a unit, one face looked forward, and the other back, each, perhaps, too steadily and exclusively in its chosen direction, but each reading in that direction its destinies and its hopes. Where the North despised, the South revered; while the North had only lessons to give for the formation of a world-wide Utopia, the South, less sanguinely, sought them in the dear-bought experience of mankind. If a comparison could fairly be instituted between countries placed under conditions so dissimilar, it might be said that Southern America, in manners, forms of speech, and habits of thought and business, resembled more Old England, while Young England resembled more Northern America.

Can it be wondered at, then, that a people like those of the Confederate States, should, in their great hour of trial, look to the country which they had chosen for their model, for a degree of sympathy and aid which no other country would afford them, and that the reaction of feeling, when that sympathy and aid were refused, should be correspondingly greater than against any other country. We do not mean to say that either sympathy or aid has been absolutely refused, at least, so far as individuals are concerned, for we believe that the intellect and intelligence of the British nation does most cordially and actively sympathize with the South in its fearful struggle, and that British commerce has dared more, and done more, in its aid than the commerce of all the rest of the world put together. But the South can only weigh the value of this aid and sympathy by the public acts of the Government. At the hands of that Government it had a right to expect, if not favours, at least justice. Has it received it? Have not solemn international treaties received new constructions, that they might not apply to the necessities of a suffering people? Have not palpable facts been stifled by misty equivocations, lest the logic of those facts might lead to conclusions more favourable than those in power desired? When a foreign Government stands ready to do what England refuses to do, is not the whole machinery of state-craft set in motion to interpose obstacles and delays? Has not every effort been made from above to repress the ebullition of sympathy which swells from the heart of this nation, and to stave off the discussions by which alone the voice of the nation can be heard, and its will consulted?

The people of the South are conscious that they have not an interest in conflict with any interest of England. They produce all that England consumes, they consume all that England produces. They are conscious that they have fulfilled every condition which can justly be required of a new nation claiming admission into the family of nations.—extent of territory, sufficiency of population and resources, unanimity of thought and action, resoluteness of purpose, unflinching determination of will. They have not wearied the ears of the world with appeals and solicitations; they have trusted to God and their own strong arms to work out their independence; they have achieved and maintained it for over a year; amid alternate triumphs and humiliation they have remained sober-minded, neither unduly elated by victory nor discouraged by defeat; God-loving, God-fearing, resolute, steadfast, self-reliant, and self-sacrificing. Yet, so far as they can see from their point of view, the world stands coldly looking on, refusing to them what no other nation has ever yet been refused; exacting from them tests that have never been exacted before; applying to them—free citizens of a Government of their own choice—rules that were never dreamed of in the case of subjects to a ruler by Divine Right.

Can they be blamed for already smarting, bitterly and keenly, under a sense of gross wrong and wanton injustice; that this feeling should find vent in their daily talk, and in their letters to distant friends; that it eventually may colour their character and governmental policy; and that when the war is ended, as alone it can end, in their complete independence, and the recognition by the world of the righteousness of their cause, they should spurn friendships which are tendered in the hour of prosperity, and which were wanting in the hour of need.

England is great and powerful, but none can be so great and powerful as not to need friends. If friends she wants on the Western Hemisphere, she will surely not find them among the States of the North. Is it her interest, or her policy, that North and South should have but one feeling in common, but one motive-spring common to both, and that, resentment and hatred to Great Britain?

Signs of Peace.

COUPLED with the intelligence which confirms the Federal occupation of New Orleans, comes the report that the French Ambassador at Washington has tendered the mediation of his Sovereign to the Federal Government. Distrustful as we have learnt to be of all accounts from Northern sources, we have ample testimony under our eyes that in this instance, at least, the news-makers of the North have kept within the bonds of truth. The readers of the Paris Correspondence in our first and second numbers cannot fail to remark the almost verbal accuracy with which that correspondence anticipated the intelligence brought us by the last American steamer. We informed our readers, two weeks ago, that the French Emperor had determined to adopt such measures as would most speedily lead to the termination of the war in America; that even then he was repeating his urgent invitation to the British Government to co-operate with him in those measures, and that he was fully prepared to act alone if that invitation was declined, and to resort to an armed demonstration should friendly remonstrance fail at Washington. We more than intimated what M. Mercier's mission was in visiting Richmond. Only a few days since, Her Majesty's Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs stated in Parliament, in reply to an inquiry, that the object of Count Mercier was not to carry out official instructions, and that it had been attended with no political consequences whatever. We have no comments to make on Mr. Layard's statements, except, in the words of a semi-official French organ, that "the Honourable Under-Secretary took good care not to state that he had obtained his information from the French Government." But we fear that he was not more fortunate or accurate in his assertions than when, from the same place, he announced the release of the two Confederate citizens, illegally arrested at the instigation of the United States' Consul at Tangiers, at the very time when they were being transferred on board the Federal man-of-war, to be transported to New York, in irons.

Our explanation of Count Mercier's visit was different from the first, and we have as good reason for believing in the correctness of our information as Mr. Layard could possibly have had for his. We believe, indeed, that M. Mercier did not receive his instructions through the regular official channels, but that they were conveyed to him directly from the Emperor. We also believe that he had full discretion, according to the results of his visit to Richmond, to lay before the Washington Government the views and intentions of the Emperor, or to delay action until he had time to report personally in Paris. That the Federal occupation of New Orleans had any influence whatever upon his determination, we do not believe. The first act of the French Government, if driven to hostile measures, will no doubt be to declare the blockade illegal and void, and to give armed convoys to French vessels engaged in lawful commerce with Confederate ports. We hail these indications as signs of peace. First, because we do not foresee any event within the range of probabilities that can alter the determination deliberately taken by the Emperor of the French. Secondly, because we cannot think that England will continue so blind to her own interests, both present and future, as to allow France to win the prestige and the substantial advantages of the pacification of America. Thirdly, because we consider decisive action on part of these two Powers, followed as their example necessarily must be by all the other Powers of Europe, as tantamount to peace. Intoxicated as the North is by real successes, and still more by delusions, it will not continue a contest in which all the world is arrayed against it. There are still sober-minded men left, and there are many high in power who only wait a safe occasion to lift up their voices in favour of peace. And the tide of this unholy and purposeless war will ebb as rapidly as it has flowed.

We are not sanguine of a sudden peace, however. Much time must elapse, and difficult negotiations must terminate, before the fruits of peace can be reaped by the impatient sufferers of the war. When the angry waters have subsided, the surface will still be strewn with the wreck of the tempest.

The Mexican Intervention.

WE last week called attention to the present aspect of affairs in that unhappy country, and the extreme improbability of her condition being amended by the treatment she is receiving, or is likely to receive, at the hands of her present interveners. We have now seen the treaties which have been signed in Washington, and are at this moment on their way to Mexico by the hands of the United States' Charge d'Affaires, to be ratified by the Juarez Government. Thus the first step has been taken for a powerful and constant supervision of the administration of Mexico by the statesmen at the White House. What that influence is likely to be may be fairly conjectured by two circumstances which have already marked, by unmistakable signs, the policy of Northern Intervention. The first is, as we have already pointed out, the intention to interfere by force of arms, coupled with a refusal, at all events for the present, to assist Mexico with money; and the second, against the earnest protest of the whole diplomatic corps, the full concurrence of Mr. Corwen, the United States' Minister, in the violent confiscation of property resorted to by the Mexican ministers; a policy which is too strictly in accordance with the principles of the Oath of Allegiance Act, proposed to Congress, for anyone to be surprised at the approbation of it expressed by Mr. Lincoln's ambassador. In the meantime, let us look at the later information which has reached us from Vera Cruz. It is worth our attentive consideration. H. M. S. Ulloa arrived at Havannah with despatches bearing date the 12th of April. They run thus:—

The private information which we have received through trustworthy channels is of high importance. It seems that after a preliminary conference which was held by the allied plenipotentiaries at Orizaba, the French resolved that their expeditionary division should advance against the capital, taking on themselves all the responsibility of that determination. It was added that they will guarantee to their allies—England and Spain—the advantages to arise from the claims to be made by them against the Government of Mexico.

In consequence of this determination, we learn that the English and Spanish resolved, on their part, to withdraw the troops of their respective nations, and it even seems that they had begun their preparations to take up their march to Vera Cruz as soon as possible.

We also learn that the conservative or reactionary party was on the point of undertaking another formal campaign against the Government of President Juarez.

Lastly, we are informed that the French division had begun to move towards Mexico, induced, perhaps, to accelerate their march in consequence of the fact that three of their Zouaves had been captured, and hanged near their encampment, by a Mexican guerilla. The French General Lorencez and Admiral Jurién de la Gravière, with the French division from Tehuacan, arrived at Vera Cruz on the 5th April.

General Miranda and ex-President Almonte are with the French general, and have published proclamations to the people adverse to the Juarez Administration. Doblado had issued a counter proclamation, branding Almonte and his adherents as traitors.

It is said that the plan of Almonte is to overthrow the present Government, to have himself recognized as dictator, and then call a national assembly to take into consideration the deplorable condition of the country, and decide which will be the best form of government for it. A number of Almonte's adherents have signed a document supporting this measure.

A journal, entitled La Raccion, had been established at Cordova, advocating the appointment of Almonte to the supreme command of the country.

The Government of Juarez was said to be still ready to give every satisfaction required by the interests of the subjects of the three Powers who had claims against Mexico. They would not, however, listen to the idea of a monarchy, and in case the allied troops advanced to the capital would retire from it.

So that France, in open defiance of the solemn convention she entered into with her allies last July, has determined to act without them, and, under the advice of Miranda and Almonte—men branded as traitors by the legitimate Government of their native land—to plant the standard of revolt in the capital itself. Under these circumstances, General Prim amuses himself by publishing, in his organ of Mexican intelligence, the following account of his actions and person:—

There are persons whose very names are a programme; there are individuals who are the symbol of a great enterprise; and the person and the name of General Prim are the symbol and the programme of this expedition. Mexico and the whole world know him and admire him, and more than one Mexican heart beats this day with enthusiastic violence at the bare recollection of his marvellous deeds. Well, then, here we have this noble chieftain, whom Greece and Rome would have enrolled among their gods, who in the middle ages would have been the founder of a dynasty of kings, and who has in one day revived the terrible poetry of the Homeric combats—we have this glorious Paladin, who, as a soldier, is the thunderbolt of war and the thunderbolt of glory, and as a statesman, the most upright friend of all the political reforms which make up the happiness of nations. On whatever side his sword flashes victory is certain. Wheresoever his voice is raised the triumph of the liberty and the progress of the age is assured. Were it possible to add anything to the confidence inspired by the greatness of the allied Powers, Mexico would find a fresh guarantee in the Count de Reus. To condense our remarks so as to be well understood, we personify the thought of the expedition in one only of its representatives, the Count de Reus. And well may we do so without the appearance of national vanity, for the Spanish plenipotentiary, though always acting in accord with the plenipotentiaries of the other two nations, has been the originator and the adviser of all the measures which have been adopted. In a word, he has been the soul of the enterprise. It was natural he should be so, as he springs from the same race as the people by whom the action of Europe was to be felt, as well as for other reasons, which are exclusively personal. Those who know the history of Spain know the Count de Reus, and those who know the Count de Reus will understand the magnitude of the sacrifices which the fulfilment of his glorious mission must have cost him. Let us picture to ourselves the conqueror of Africa, amid his shining pleiad of warriors eager for danger and for glory, and at the head of a phalanx of veterans who look upon him almost as a god. Let us contemplate him before a people who invite him to war and provoke him to measure swords, and we can form a notion of what it must cost him to remain quiet and pacific with fields of battle before him, and to sacrifice his instincts and his habits on the altars of peace, justice, humanity, and the generous anxiety to save Mexico from bloodshed. This conduct is not only worthy of admiration, but it will cause astonishment throughout Europe, where the Count de Reus is better known than here for his romantic prowess and his chivalrous valour. Europe will with difficulty recognize the hero of Reus, now of Tetuan in the calm and prudent plenipotentiary of Vera Cruz, &c. If General Prim had allowed himself to be carried away by his warlike instincts, the world would have seen nothing strange in it, for he would have done no more than furnish a fresh subject for the gallery of heroic pictures, and to this the world is accustomed. What does seem a novelty in his life is the heroism of his patience; and this is fortunate. The conduct of the Count de Reus has not only dissipated the doubts of the Mexican Government, but it exercises everywhere a magic influence over the minds of the people, &c. In Mexico his friends say he is the "exterminating angel—the angel of consolation—the lion of battle—the demi-god of war—and in describing him Homer would have compared him to Mars."

Not to be behind hand in this new method of bulletin, the Paris journals, who are not usually deficient in that style of self-glorification, contend, in glowing language, that the admiration of the Mexicans is entirely concentrated on the French army; that they regard them as their only deliverers from the calamities accumulated upon them, while the Spaniards are utterly disregarded; that the unfortunate Mexicans, did they dare to speak, would at once declare for the gallant Frenchmen, who are come to rescue them from the miserable tyranny of their own rulers; but they are under a reign of terror. We had thought there was a country called England, who had some slight interest in the causes which moved this intervention, and had at some time back a voice in its councils; but it seems she has been dropped on the road somewhere. Perhaps the best thing the terrified Mexicans can do would be to advertise for her in the Times.

The Poor Law.

THE too frequent verdict, "died from starvation," is opposed to the noble principle of the English law, that every individual, in case of need, can demand the necessities of life from the parochial revenue. All property is mortgaged to its utmost value for the support of the poor. Every tenement is a material guarantee to the pauper that he shall not die from hunger. Now and then we hear of cases of such cruel maladministration of the law, when persons, like Russell, the equestrian performer at Astley's, are so inadequately relieved, that they die from want. It seems to us, in such instances, the guardians, or their representatives, are to blame, and not the law. We are aware of the extreme difficulty of administration, so as to act fairly to the rate-payers, as well as to the poor; and we believe that generally there is no lack of kindly benevolence. Many cases of starvation are attributable to a stubborn reluctance and dread of seeking parish aid. The poor regard avowed pauperism as degrading, as almost criminal. They do not understand that parish aid is a right, and not a favour.

This reluctance and dread are due, to some extent, to pride, but mainly to the labour test. The labour test is sound in principle, and thoroughly expedient.

It is not imposed to save the pockets of the rate-payers, but to prevent idle vagabonds leading an easy life at the expense of the community. Besides, idleness, whether voluntary or enforced, is demoralizing. We agree with the labour test, but we object to the manner of its application. Sickness and infirmity should be treated with the utmost consideration, and in no instance ought labour to be demanded to the detriment of health, or when its performance causes physical suffering. The medical officer should prescribe the kind and duration of labour for his patients. We may remark, that union doctors ought to be more highly remunerated, and give more time and attention to their parochial duties.

We quite understand how healthy paupers, as well as the infirm and sick, shrink from the probability of being put to oakum-picking, stone-breaking, or road-scraping; but we cannot comprehend why these convict occupations are pertinaciously adhered to, unless to confirm the poor in their belief, that there is little or no difference between pauperism and crime. To some able-bodied men, accustomed to rough tasks, stone-breaking is not repulsive or injurious; but to the majority of paupers it is killing work. We must remember that paupers are not condemned to hard labour as a punishment, for then we might as well erect a treadmill in every union yard. Could not a variety of employments be introduced, so that the prospect of union labour might become tolerable? Of course, pauperism ought to be discouraged. To make the union a mere workshop, instead of a refuge for the destitute, would be to partially sanction one of the most untenable of socialist doctrines. Neither the Imperial Government, nor local corporations, ought to attempt to control or supply the demand for labour. But union work may be unattractive without being painfully arduous. The reward of such toil should not be proportioned to the work done, but to the need of the worker. The pauper should be forced, according to his health and strength, to do a fair day's toil for the bare necessities of existence. No one would then seek parish aid if he could find a market for his labour. The reform we suggest could be effected without an appeal to Parliament, and would be a boon to the pauper without encouraging pauperism.

At present, however, we have to deal with an exceptional state of affairs. It would not only be cruel to compel the Lancashire operatives to pick oakum, or break stones, but it is impossible to find any employment for the suffering thousands. They must starve, or be kept in idleness. How long the inactivity may continue is uncertain, but we know it must be of long continuance, and that Lord Overstone is right in assuming that the fearful trial is only commencing. The noble lord was also fully justified in saying, that "a case of greater difficulty, or one involving more responsibility than that which now presented itself to the Government, could scarcely exist." If the Poor Law can, by some partial modifications, remedy the crying distress, so much the better; if not, the Government must further intervene. We grant that Lancashire is rich, and that its inhabitants have, with hearty and generous alacrity, come forward to assist the needy. But manufacturers are suffering from the dearth of cotton, as well as their operatives, and even under the most favourable circumstances, Lancashire could not maintain an army of paupers. And are we justified in imposing the whole burden on Lancashire? The distress is not owing to a fluctuation of trade. The existing cotton famine has not come upon us because it has pleased an all-wise Providence to blight the cotton-harvest. The Lancashire manufacturers are ready to buy, and the Southern planters are ready to sell; but the attempt of the Federal States to trample on the independence of the Confederate States hinders the barter. The Government thinks it our policy and duty not to interfere, and to refuse to recognize the sovereignty of sovereign and independent States. If the Government is correct in its views, it is unfair to make Lancashire bear the brunt of our judicious policy; if the Government is pursuing a wrong course, it is manifestly still more unfair to impose on one county the penalty of the Government mistake. Still, it is superfluous to argue whether or not Lancashire ought to maintain its starving thousands, because Lancashire has not the means of so doing. This is admitted by all parties advocating a general subscription. There can be no valid objection to this proposal as an auxiliary, but the largest voluntary subscription on record will not suffice to maintain the unemployed Lancashire operatives. We have a general and very strong dislike to Government aid, but it is in this case justifiable, and will, ere long, be inevitable. England expects that the Ministry and Parliament will take care that famine does not desolate Lancashire, and the expectation will not be disappointed. This is not a party question; for all men agree that "death from starvation" would not be a meet reward of Lancashire patience.

No wonder Lords, Commons, and the whole country is struck with intense admiration at such a spectacle of heroic patience under dire sufferings. The Earl of Shaftesbury remarked that the operatives know the immediate cause of their misery. They know it, and do not murmur. Happy the country where passion is so curbed by reverence for order, law, and government. May we not trifle with this noble forbearance and change it to angry discontent.

JAUNDICED men think all things yellow, and Northern journalists conceive that other journalists follow their plan of drawing on their imagination for facts, and relying on a bungling memory for wit. Grant that the kettle is black; still, it is stupid of the black pot to deride it for its blackness. We take the following from a Federal newspaper:—

THE FRENCH MINISTER'S VISIT TO RICHMOND—A REBEL SENSATION STORY SPOILED.

Washington, April 24.

The French Minister, M. Mercier, who reached Washington to-day from his visit to Richmond, states that he never heard, until his arrival here, of Dr. Lemoine, who is said by the Richmond papers to have had an interview with the minister, and to have represented 30,000 Frenchmen.

Whether M. Mercier or Dr. Lemoine met, is unimportant; we merely draw attention to the screaming farce of a Northern journal charging a Foreign journal with untruthfulness. It reminds us of the stage drunkards, who make the audience laugh at their mania for reproaching sober people with intoxication.

THE Royal Commissioners of the International Exhibition until lately insisted upon the correspondents of foreign papers paying for their season tickets. We cannot suppose this proceeded from niggardness, but more likely it originated from a noble desire not to bias the minds of continental critics by favours, and so induce them to praise the building. The Royal Commissioners need not have been so cautious. No one could, for the sake of a three-guinea bribe, so far stultify himself as to call Captain Fowke's "dish-cover palace" beautiful.

WE print some of the sections of the Maryland Treason Bill as evidence of the anxiety to repress the manifestation of Secession feeling in Maryland; and which, of course, would not be so greatly feared if it were not of considerable extent.

Sub-Section 4. That if any person or persons within this State, shall hold any secret or public meeting, or unite with or belong to any secret club or association known by him or them to be intended to effect, promote, or encourage the separation or secession of this State from the Government or Union of the United States, or to effect, promote, or encourage the incorporation or union of this State, with the so-called Southern Confederacy, every such person, upon conviction thereof, shall be sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for a term not less than two, nor more than six years, or to a fine of not less than 500 nor more than 1000 dollars, at the discretion of the court.

Sub-Section 8. Be it enacted, If any person or persons in this State shall knowingly display to public view what is commonly designated the Secession Flag, with a view and intent to excite seditious feelings, or shall, during the present rebellion against the Government of the United States, and without the consent of the Government of the United States, offer inducements to any minor, or other person, to abandon his home or place of temporary residence, for the purpose of going into any of the States in rebellion, or shall furnish to any minor, or other person, money, clothing, or conveyances of any kind, for the accomplishment of any such intended object, although the same may not have been effected, each one of said offences shall be deemed evidence of disloyalty, and shall be in law a misdemeanor, and punishable by a fine of not less than fifty dollars nor more than 100 dollars, in the discretion of the court; and in case of non-payment of the fine and costs of suit, the person or persons convicted of a violation of this sub-section shall be imprisoned in the city or county jail, where the offence is committed, for not less than thirty nor more than sixty days, in the discretion of the court before whom the case is tried.

Sub-Section 9. If any person within this State shall seduce, entice, or persuade any other person to commit any one of the offences which are by the several sub-sections of this section prohibited, and such offence be committed, the said person who so seduced, enticed, or persuaded, shall on conviction be sentenced to suffer such punishment as the person committing said offence would be liable to suffer as a punishment for the crime so committed by him.

Sub-Section 10. If any person within this State shall attempt to seduce, entice, or persuade any other person to commit any of the offences which by the several sub-sections of this section are prohibited, though such offence has not been committed, and shall be convicted thereof, he shall be sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary for not less than two years, nor more than four years, or to a fine of not less than 500, nor more than 2000 dollars, in the discretion of the court.

The Cruise of the Sumter.

FROM NOTES TAKEN ON BOARD BY ONE OF HER OFFICERS.

NO SPORT.

We remained in Trinidad until the 5th of August, riding and driving over that beautiful island, and enjoying the society and hospitality of the garrison and the inhabitants. While here, Her Britannic Majesty's steam sloop Cadmus came in, and, I think, relieved the more ignorant of the people from any apprehensions they may have retained with regard to us. Here our first official visits with officers of the navy took place. The commander of the Cadmus visited our captain, and, of course, was visited in return.

On the 5th of August we went to sea, regretting that our duties called us away from such a pleasant place as Trinidad. While in Trinidad we got the positions of the Confederate and Federal armies at Manassas; we told the officers there, that, when the armies met, the Northern forces would be routed. Our predictions proved true. Since leaving the Confederate States, we had had short runs from port to port, and had been, too, all the while under excitement of capturing and chasing vessels of the enemy. Now we were without that excitement, and had to find resources in ourselves. Backgammon and chess-boards were brought out. All the stories we could recollect from our different cruises were exchanged. Our uncomfortable situations were discussed; the lengths of our berths (five feet six, for men six feet), had their share of harsh words; our servants, new and untaught, came in for many invectives, adjectives, &c., during their absence from our mess-room; and ten thousand other things were spoken of and argued upon with a solemnity that often amused those who were listeners to the arguments. President Davis, President Lincoln, and their Cabinets, came in for a large share of words from us. One or two in Lincoln's Cabinet were said to be very good men, but misled by party alliances. One or two in Davis's Cabinet were thought to be perfectly worthless, and some in the mess could see no reason why the President should keep them a moment about him. I expect Mr. Davis knew more about them than we, and was the better judge.

The character of our crew; the people of Trinidad; the people of Cuba, Mr. Faanga (a Cuban gentleman, who had been very kind to us whilst in Cienfuegos); the surprise and consternation of the Yankees we had captured; the chase from the mouth of the Mississippi; what would be done with the commander of the Brooklyn; and, indeed, every subject from the "Frankfort Diet" to the "Egyptian Ministry," were brought under the criticism of the mess after dinner. Nothing too high, or nothing so insignificant, that did not receive its share of abuse or praise.

A SAIL: FRIEND OR FOE?

During this time we had been steaming to the south and east, bound to Brazil. After three or four days from Trinidad, we got into that strong current always to be found near the equator, and particularly about the mouth of the Amazon. The fresh trade winds, too, sprung up, and decreased our progress so much, that we were compelled to give up Brazil for the present, let steam go down, make sail, and steer to the westward for Cayenne.

We arrived at Cayenne, and anchored at quarantine. The next morning, at daylight, sent a boat on shore to get pratique and inquire about coal. On the boat reaching the wharf, the officers were met by the health officer, and informed that they could not come on shore until the ship had remained five days in quarantine. They were very sorry for it, but it was one of the port regulations to prevent sickness. The officers told them we had no sickness on board, and had never had any. It was no use, however; the port regulations must be complied with. The idea of quarantine regulations at Cayenne, a place where turtles and alligators cannot live long, on account of the fearful miasmas arising from the dense forests and impenetrable marshes that surround it!

But it was no use to argue with a French official. They then asked whether we could get coal, and were informed that there was no coal there, that even the Government was sending them to Paramaribo for coal. As we could not see anything to be gained by remaining there, made sail, and went further west in our search for coal.

We got under way at two o'clock, stood down the coast under easy sail, feeling our way along with the lead, sometimes getting into very shoal water, not more than three fathoms, and then again deepening into ten or fifteen. At three o'clock the next day, came in sight of some buoys on the Guinea (Dutch) coast, and after awhile made a light ship, but could get no pilot; came to anchor in sight of the shore in four fathoms water. At sunset discovered the smoke of a steamer to the westward; got up our chimney (which had been on deck since making sail off the mouth of the Amazon), unbent mainsail, hove short, got the chain ready for slipping boat to quarters, and had everything ready for receiving our Yankee friend, as we supposed the steamer to be. At eight o'clock, she was near us—the moon was shining brightly—but we could not distinguish her form well enough either to leave our quarters, or open our batteries upon her. At ten, she anchored about two miles from us, after passing entirely around our anchorage, and seeming to be endeavouring to find out who we were. After she anchored, and we were satisfied that she did not intend moving again during the night, beat the retreat, but ordered the men to keep their arms on till further orders. At early daylight got under way, under steam, hoisted French colours, and stood down on the stranger, who was still at anchor. Our men were at quarters, and the ship cleared for action. When approaching our supposed foe, she also hoisted French colours. We immediately hauled down the French, and hoisted our own. On getting within hail, the Frenchman asked, if "that was the Sumter?" We said it was. He seemed much pleased at meeting us; and, as he was bound into Paramaribo, and being of lighter draught than ourselves, and neither vessel having pilots, he invited us to follow him into the river, where we could get a pilot.

Reviews.

Southern Wealth and Northern Profits. By THOMAS PRENTICE KETTEL. New York: G. W. and J. A. Wood.

The object of this treatise, published in the spring of 1860, was to show "the necessity of union to the future prosperity and welfare of the Republic." Mr. Kettell's intentions were unquestionably loyal. He stood up to bless the Union, and if the voice of reason, which is, unhappily, but rarely accordant with the vox populi, had been heeded, the arguments he adduced would have been all sufficient to convince the Northerners that their unsurpassed prosperity was the result of, and inseparable from, their governmental alliance with the South. On the other hand, a Southerner could not read this book without being forcibly reminded what an enormous price the South was paying for its connection with the North. The indefinite perpetuation of the Union was, indeed, impossible, on account of the incongruity of the peoples of the two sections of the Republic; but its dissolution might have been postponed, for it was precipitated by the unscrupulous intrigues of blatant demagogues, and is not due to the unscrupulous monetary exactions of the North. We do not hesitate to charge the Southerners with an almost culpable negligence as to the Yankee raid upon their immense wealth. We must needs admire such generous indifference, but it is too near akin to prodigality to be altogether excusable. Self interest alone would have been a very proper and cogent ground for Secession. True selfishness is the most refined and beneficent generosity. The greater the accumulation of wealth in the Confederate States, the greater will be the development of their illimitable resources; and every development of Southern resources conduces to the prosperity of this country, and of Europe. But pecuniary considerations would never have caused the Southerners to break up the Union. They are essentially, and, if we may use the term, radically conservative, and rather than inaugurate change, will bear with any ills that do not touch their honour. Secession was not a rebellion or a revolution; was not an infringement of the letter, or, in the remotest degree, a violation of the spirit, of the Federal compact. It was as thoroughly a constitutional act, as it would be for fifty members of the British House of Commons to secede from the ministerial benches, join the opposition, and so involve a change of ministry. The utmost that can be said of Secession, is, that it was a dissolution of Federal partnership. Still, the Southerners were urged, driven, forced into Secession. So long as the North was contented with fiscal spoliation, the South was content that alien hordes should batten on her wealth. When, however, an attempt was made to trample on the independence of the South, to abuse as well as use it, to kick as well as bleed it, the men—aye, and the women of the South—cried out for death rather than dishonour; suddenly broke the connection that threatened them with political, if not social servitude, and proclaimed themselves a separate and free people. Edmund Burke, in his day, deplored that the age of chivalry was gone. The orator was mistaken. He sacrificed truth to epigram. At all events, if any living are similarly impressed, they behold in the disruption of the United States a startling refutation of their erroneous theory. The South allowing Northern vulturism to prey upon its riches, and simultaneously, with a lofty, and we will add, most unwise disregard, not caring to deny the foul slanders that its spoilers propagated with that untiring industry, bitter malignity, and deadly virulence, which exemplifies how terribly envy, hatred and malice are intensified by a consciousness of wrong doing. Was apathy the cause of this marvellous forbearance? No. The South, so careless about its wealth, would not, could not, endure the bare possibility of the invasion of its sacred and inherent rights. If, then, Secession was not chivalric, chivalry is a dream, a myth, a poetical illusion.

We marvel at Southern submission to Northern fleecing, but Yankee blindness in driving the South to Secession is far more marvellous. It is a surprising instance of the madness that precedes destruction. Not that the madness is inexplicable. Northern greed was insatiable. It might have been supposed that Southern profusion would have satisfied, if not have gorged and surfeited the North. But the voracious covetousness of the Yankees was increased by every morsel they swallowed, until it grew into an irresistible, blinding, ruinous mania. They became possessed of the foolish idea of making their patrons their dependents. The task seemed possible. They had lied so pertinaciously about their superiority, that at length they believed their own lying. The fall of Fort Sumter dissipated the cherished chimera. The North was scared and horrified. Was it possible that Southern wealth would be diffused over the world instead of being monopolized by the North? They determined not to lose the prize without a struggle. They had tried to crush the South by intrigue, and failed; they determined, if possible, to crush the South by force. Hence the bloody war they have waged with such grotesque and relentless fury. For the sake of the almighty dollar, the Yankees have submitted to the yoke of a military despotism; they have resigned freedom of the press, freedom of speech, and freedom of thought, without regret. They care not for enormous indebtedness so long as they can foster the wild hope of again fastening upon the South. But neither hope nor despair can redeem the past. Their ruthless devastation, their savage barbarity, their outpourings of treasure, are in vain. Their prey has escaped from them for ever.

Mr. Kettell directs attention to the singular prolificness of the Southern States. In the article of cotton they are the only nation exporting more than they require to be returned to them in a manufactured state for their own consumption. In 1857, Great Britain received from the United States 654,758,048 pounds of cotton, and shipped to the United States 154,818,134 yards of plain and dyed goods. In the same year Great Britain received 250,338,144 pounds of cotton from the East Indies, and shipped to the East Indies 791,537,041 yards of plain and dyed goods. That is, Great Britain received 150 per cent. more cotton from America than from India, and yet exported five times as much cotton fabric to India as to America.

The year 1857 was an exceptional year for imports of cotton from India. In the year 1858, it appears 91,000,000 pounds more cotton have been sent to India than was received thence. If we were to include China in the calculation the result would be still more remarkable, since China took in 1857, 121,000,000 yards of cloth. And as China derives a great deal of raw cotton from India, if that article is sent to England for manufacture, and then sent to China in the shape of goods, instead of as raw material, the result may be beneficial to English workshops, but it does not increase the European supply of cotton.

If we turn to Egypt and Turkey, we find that in 1858 there were derived thence 38,248,112 pounds of raw cotton, and there were sent thither 10,389,353 pounds yarn, and 257,567,351 yards cloth, together equal to 62,000,000 pounds of raw cotton, 23,700,000 pounds more than was received. The fact is the same in relation to South America. The United States alone afford a net surplus of cotton above the weight of goods they buy back. This process seems to be on the increase, since all those distant nations, as they progress in wealth, demand machine goods. These are supplanting, apparently, the rude hand-loom goods of China and India; and where the clothing of 200,000,000 is liable to undergo this change, the prospect is that, how great soever may be the increased production of cotton, it cannot keep pace with the demand for goods.

This is conclusive as to the impossibility of supplying the place of American cotton, quite irrespective of the peculiar nature of that cotton. Wealth or capital, as Mr. Kettell very properly states, is the surplus of production over consumption, and, therefore, the large surplus production of American cotton cannot be resigned without a proportionate and absolute loss of wealth.

But unless we had other facts to adduce, it might be surmised by those who are unacquainted with the productiveness of the Confederate States, that the cotton surplus was compensated by deficiency in other essential products. That there was some truth in the observation—"Such is the mutual dependence of the South and the North, that, were it not that the latter supplies to the former its provisions, clothing, and agricultural implements, the South would not be able to grow any cotton for export, but could scarcely supply the home demand." If this were so it would not detract from the value of the South as a cotton supplying country, though it would detract from its productiveness. But the statement is utterly false. Without dealing with exports of tobacco, rice, &c., we will present our readers with Mr. Kettell's summary of the returns of "Agricultural Productions of the United States, per official Census of 1850, distinguishing the South, North, and West." It is necessary, we should premise, that in the "South" our author includes Maryland, Delaware, District of Columbia, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, Missouri, Mississippi, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Arkansas.

From this table we learn that of those grains which constitute food, and are common to all sections, the South raised in value equal to about thirty dollars per head of its whole population, including the slaves. The value raised in the northern section was equal only to fifteen dollars per head, a quantity unequal to the support of life, but the large manufacturing interests of that section enable it to command food from the West and South in exchange for merchandise. The product of food at the West is equal to thirty-five and a half dollars per head. If we were to include the whites only, the quantity per head at the South would reach forty-eight dollars per head, a quantity in excess of their wants, and of which they indeed export largely. The quantity of corn alone raised per head is thirty-seven bushels, or the same as at the West. The wheat product at the South gives four-and-a-half bushels per head of the white population, a quantity more than sufficient for its service, and it exports of the surplus largely to the New England States. The aggregate of agricultural productions, it appears, is forty-two dollars at the South, embracing the same articles which at the West give 50.25 dollars per head, and at the North 34.26 per head. The South, however, produced in addition, in the year 1849, 978,311,690 pounds of cotton, which was sold in 1850 at eleven cents per pound, according to the United States Treasury reports, making 101,834,616 dollars. It also produced 237,133,000 pounds of sugar, valued at 16,599,310 dollars; and, in addition, naval stores to the value of 2,107,100 dollars.

Further on we have the following calculation of the Southern trade with the North:—

Sent North in bills and raw materials	262,560,394
Sent North in other produce	200,000,000

Total to the credit of the South, per annum, 462,560,394

In 1850, the population of the South (including in that term the States we have above mentioned) was 9,664,656, and the population of the North, 13,527,221. In 1859, the total value of Southern exports was 193,389,351 dollars, the total value of Northern exports in 1859, 78,217,202 dollars. That is, without allowing for the relative increase in nine years, the population of the South was at least 30 per cent. less than the population of the North; whilst Southern exports were 150 per cent. in excess of Northern exports. We do not intend, by these figures, to insinuate that the activity and productiveness of the North is contemptible, but to point out the vast productiveness of the South. Without the South the North might have been, would have been, a prosperous country, but it would have been an ordinary, average prosperity, instead of a rapid growth of prosperity without parallel in ancient or modern times.

We have not at hand statistics that enable us to give an exact estimate of Northern profits, but that they must have been considerable is shown by Northern resources during the present struggle. We are aware that now and for some months past the financial state of the North has been and is increasingly desperate, but we must also remember how readily the means for gigantic armaments have been forthcoming, and that up to this time the pursuit of a wicked and barbarous war has not been checked by lack of money. The explanation is, that though wealth in the North was much diffused it was very great in the aggregate, and it was due to the productiveness of the South. The South has furnished the North with the means to attempt its subjugation.

One word as to internal improvements will suffice. The Southern States had in 1860 open 9053 miles of railroad, constructed at less than one-half the cost of railroads in the North; and, what is even more significant, constructed at the sole expense of the South. But it is needless to multiply instances of the riches of that most favoured region. Still, a thorough understanding of this matter reveals to us the mainspring of the unrighteous and bloodstained cupidity of the North.

Riches are not always a blessing. We are convinced that the North would have been better if it had been poorer. Its wealth attracted the rabble of Europe—this rabble was instantly admitted to the rights of citizenship, and every citizen, no matter what his character or position, was entitled to a vote. The mob became dominant, and political corruption was rampant. It is impossible to exaggerate the public profligacy, and truly, no pen can adequately describe it. Respectable men had no actual influence where the brawling beggar was as powerful as the wealthy merchant. What could be expected from the government of the scourgings of Europe but political profligacy? Look at the press. It is true, that in England we have had such scurrilous papers as the Town and the Satirist, and that we have newspapers in existence which preach socialist doctrines; but the first were unhesitatingly put down by law, and with the entire approbation of the community, and the latter are not known to the general public, and are only read by those persons who care nothing for politics, and who devote all their literary leisure to the perusal of police reports, trials for murder, and details of clever burglaries. But in America, scurrility and the most debasing socialism were advocated by leading papers; by papers of undoubted influence, because the dregs of society governed. Northern vapouring and bragging were worse than childish, for they were bullying. To bring on a war with England was apparently the constant aim of some popular journalists. Their creed seems to have been, and still is, bitter hatred to England. At length the opportunity came for smashing up this abominated country. Mark it well, reader! The New York press, as represented by its leading organ, unhesitatingly threatened England with repudiation, in the event of war.

Or can anything be conceived more thoroughly degrading than the eagerness with which the North has ended itself with the chains of despotism? There has not been any exhibition of sorrow; but, on the contrary, the slavery has been evidently enjoyed as a novelty.

Nor is public degeneracy the only evil that festers in the North. To it is added social immorality. We speak not of rabid fanaticism and gross superstition though these things are bad enough. We refer to what may be called individual and family morality. Thopious Western cities and towns that are now praying for Divine permission to gratify their lust for bloodshed and spoliation, are very plague spots. London, Paris, Vienna, are terribly stained with vice and immorality; but in these cities the evil is openly deplored except by the minority of evil-doers; whilst in the Northern States vice and immorality are treated with as much respect as virtue and morality. We write generally. We know there is a noble minority in the North which has not bowed down before the accursed idol of Insatiate Avarice. These thousands sorrow for their country, and if they dared, if they were politically and socially free, they would say "Amen" to our denunciations of Northern degeneracy and immorality.

As regards family immorality, we may observe that there are two hundred and seventy divorce cases before the court of Boston.

With respect to crime, we cannot do better than quote the following statement from Mr. Kettell's book:—

If we, however, take the numbers confined in the jails of each section, at the date of the census of 1850, we have the following extraordinary results:—

	Black Population.	No. in Jail.	One in
North	150,142	478	310
West	46,852	87	542
South	3,442,788	323	10,000
Total	3,639,782	888
	White Population.	No. in Jail.	One in
North	8,342,938	2,710	3,000
West	5,413,039	760	7,000
South	6,222,418	1,288	5,000
Total	19,978,395	4,758

The North again presents the most extraordinary results for the morals of that race, in a region where they are by far the most petted of the community.

The white criminals confined at the North were as one to 3,000 of the whole. It is true that a large portion of these were foreign born, showing that if the North has advantages from immigration, it has also disadvantages. At the West the proportion is less than in the other sections for the white race; when we come to the blacks, however, we find that at the North one out of every 310 is in jail; at the West, one out of 542 is in jail; and the South, one in 10,000 of all; but confined to the free blacks, it is one in 800.

We may reasonably hope that Secession will do good to the North, by making it poorer and more virtuous. The benefit that will be derived by the South is not problematical. Wealth will increase and productiveness be stimulated. Nor is it less easy to prognosticate the advantages Europe, and especially England, will derive from Southern independence. There will be more cotton for our looms, and a greater demand for our fabrics. The gallant South has to bear her Laptism of blood unfriended and alone. The nations that will share the fruits of her ultimate victory are mere spectators. Not that they look on coldly. We know too well the generous hearts of England, of France, and of the rest of Europe, not to feel assured that there is an intense sympathy in the heroic War of Independence that is being waged by the Confederate States of America.

The American Disruption: three Lectures. By A. J. B. BRERFORD HOPE, Esq. London: James Ridgway.

THESE lectures are the utterances of an English gentleman. They are neither clamorous nor abusive; yet they manifest the disgust with Yankee politics and manners that is felt throughout the civilized world. They have reached a sixth edition, and it is therefore unnecessary for us to do more than commend them to our readers as an exposition of sound English sentiment. Mr. Hope treats the legal right of Secession very lucidly. He points to the A. B. C. constitutional right of Secession. No circumlocution is needed to set it forth. The Constitution of the late United States, in theory and practice, recognized the sovereignty of the several States. Sovereign States cannot rebel, and their Sovereign Will, be it wise or unwise, is lawful. Hence Secession is perfectly and entirely constitutional. Men who oppose it are acting contrary to the letter and spirit of the Constitution. It cannot be too often repeated that Secession was not, in any sense, a revolution.

History of Friedrich the Second, called Frederick the Great. By THOMAS CARLYLE. Vol. III. London: Chapman and Hall.

A BOOK may be below, but it cannot be above, criticism. Such, however, is not the creed of modern reviewers. There is in this age very little criticism; books are merely noticed. Some are praised as perfect works, others are condemned as utterly bad. Degrees of imperfection are not recognized. The praise and the censure depend more on the author's name than on the intrinsic merit of the book. The general public sees through the flimsy sham. A novel well advertised will (provided the authors reputations are equal) sell as well as a novel that is favourably noticed by the press. Skeleton sermons have been composed for the benefit of the clergy, and we are convinced skeleton reviews would be received with much favour by newspaper proprietors. It would save a large amount of editorial fees. A clerk, or even an intelligent printer's devil, might fill up the blanks, and so do the reviewing, and do it as well as it is done at present. At all events, there is room for "The Polite Reviewer," which could be modelled on "The Polite Letter-writer;" or an intelligent professor might undertake to teach the art of modern reviewing in six lessons. Art? There is none required. Anyone can cover canvas with black paint, or with white paint.

We have a notable instance in Mr. Carlyle. When he made his first appearance in print he was either treated with contempt, or unsparingly censured. There was not to be found a critic within this realm of England who could or would take the pains to discover that there was genius in his writings, though obscured by grotesqueness of method and waywardness of opinion. The diamond was not cut and set in the conventional style, so the gem was decried as paste. Mr. Carlyle got reputation abroad, despite his grotesqueness and waywardness, and was confirmed in his faulty mannerisms. When he cared little for praise we forthwith took him into favour, and, to compensate for our former unkindness, canonised him. Whatever is written by Mr. Carlyle is right. Whatever Mr. Carlyle may hereafter write will be right. He is a literary demigod. It is unorthodox, it is heretical, downright wicked, to express an opinion adverse to the infallibility of the Chelsea philosopher. Bark not, ye reviewing dogs, when the oracle of oracles condescends to open his mouth. Wag your tails, and set up a chorus of gentle laudatory bow-wowing.

Having to criticise a work of Mr. Carlyle's is to us very irksome. It involves a desperate fight between heart and reason. We avow unhesitatingly the respect, the veneration, we feel for the man who has resuscitated Cromwell from the heap of calumnious rubbish that kept him out of sight—for the man who has done so much to bring the mind of Germany into communion with the Anglo-Saxon mind—for the man who has so boldly proclaimed the beauty of nude truth, and torn away the hypocritical and disfiguring fig-leaves. His books are our welcome companions in all places and moods. Still, our love is not blind, but rather increases our fretfulness at his shortcomings. We are sorry that his light is hidden from the million by a mountain of quaint verbiage. He is indiscriminate with his sarcasm. We regret that such a gallant knight will tilt at windmills as well as at men.

The book before us is called the "History of Frederick the Great." We grant its powerful fascination. But is it a history? We know not how to designate it. The hero is represented a colossus, and the rest of the dramatis persone are dwarfs; some very ugly dwarfs, and others passing fair. It is a grand prose epic founded on facts. The facts are indisputable, but they are distorted. Some are preposterously magnified, others are curiously diminished. It is like a map in which is marked every town and village of the country. So far the correctness is unexceptionable. But by looking at the map one gets an erroneous idea. Small villages are made to look like large towns, large towns appear as small villages, and the capital seems to embrace the whole country.

There is a sameness, too, about this work, very apparent, yet not wearying. According to the authority of Sam Weller, the vendors of meat pies use no other flesh than the flesh of cats; the difference of flavour is produced by different seasoning. Mr. Carlyle employs a variety of meats, but always the same seasoning. Every morsel is served up with ridicule as a condiment. Here is a specimen, in which the French king is the butt:—

The whole assemblage passed now into the king's ante-room; had to wait there about half-an-hour more, before the king's bedroom was opened. But then at last, lo you,—there is the king, visible to Gousan and everybody, "washing his hands." Which effected itself in this way. "The king was seated; a gentleman-in-waiting knelt before him, and held the ewer, a square vessel silver-gilt, firm upon the king's breast; and another gentleman-in-waiting poured water on the king's hands." Merely an official washing, we perceive; the real, it is to be hoped, had, in a much more effectual way, been going on during the half-hour just elapsed. After washing, the king rose for an instant; had his dressing gown, a grand yellow silky article with silver flowerings, pulled off, and flung round his loins; upon which he sat down again, and,—observe it, ye privileged of mankind,—the Change of Shirt took place! "They put the clean shirt down over his head," says Anton, "and plucked up the dirty one from within, so that of the naked skin you saw little or nothing." Here is a miracle worth getting out of bed to look at!

We grant this is humorous, but why introduce such a passage into a history? The etiquette of courts, past and present, is absurd to the philosopher. So, too, is the etiquette of private life. Since it was the fashion for the French king to dress in public, it was necessary the ceremonial should be decently performed. No man, not even Mr. Carlyle, can be a hero to his valet. If it was indispensable to sneer at the French Court, there were fitter subjects of sarcasm than its etiquette.

Sometimes our author indulges in romance. Very pretty, but very wild romance. Take his description of the march of the Prussian soldiers en route for Glogau:—

Rain still heavier, rain as of Noah, continued through this Tuesday, and for days afterwards; but the Prussian hosts, hastening towards Glogau, marched still on. This Tuesday's march for the rearward of the army, 10,000 foot, and 2000 horse; march of ten hours long, from Weichau to the hamlet Milkau (where his Majesty sits busy and affable),—is thought to be the wettest on record. Waters all out, bridges down, the country one wild lake of eddying mud. Up to the knee for many miles together; up to the middle for long spaces; sometimes even up to the chin or deeper, where your bridge was washed away. The Prussians marched through it, as if they had been slate or iron. Rank and file, nobody quitted his rank, nobody looked sour in the face; they took the pouring of the skies, and the red seas of terrestrial liquid, as matters that must be; cheered one another with jests, with choral snatches (tobacco, I consider, would not hurt); and swished unweariedly forward. Ten hours some of them were out, their march being twenty or twenty-five miles; ten to fifteen was the average distance come. Nor, singular to say, did any loss occur; except of almost one poor Army-Chaplain, and altogether of one poor Soldier's Wife;—sank dangerously both of them, beyond redemption, she taking the wrong side of some bridge parapet. Poor Soldier's Wife, she is not named to me at all; and has no history save this, and that "she was of the regiment Bredow." But I perceive she washed herself away in a world-transaction; and there was one rough Bredow, who probably sat sad that night on getting to quarters.

Du Chaillu's gorilla adventures, and Mr. Gordon Cumming's lion hunts, are improbable stories; but the above is simply impossible. 10,000 infantry and 2000 horse, could not march "up to the knee for many miles together; up to the middle for long spaces; sometimes even up to the chin, and deeper!" And note, we are told, "rank and file, nobody quitted his rank." Mr. Carlyle might as well have written that the Prussian army marched for many miles under water, without drowning or breaking their ranks. It is much to be deplored that a clever man, pretending to write history, should pen pantomimic nonsense. It is worse, much worse, than such expressions as "cock with his own gizzard much out of sorts, too!" Besides, though we like them not, we are accustomed to, and expect, Carlyleisms. We are quite prepared to see the wise as well as the foolish children of our author's brain arrayed in motley. But paraphrases of Jack the Giant Killer, put into a history, are not so laughable, though more incredibly ridiculous than those panning extravaganzas of Mr. Byron, not of or most distinctly connected with Newstead. Much of Mr. Carlyle's historical wit, or humour, or fun is as easy to imitate as his style. Having faithfully painted a portrait, endow it with ass's ears.

This book, with so many blemishes, is good, excellently good, and contains some passages of marvellous power.

Slurring over "bottled whirlwind," so as not to conjure up the thought of bottled ginger-beer, the following is singularly martial and inspiring:—

"Forward!" cries Römer; and his Thirty Squadrons, like bottled whirlwind now at last let loose, dash upon Schulenburg's poor Ten (five of them of Schulenburg's own regiment)—who are turned sideways too, trotting towards Hermsdorf, at the wrong moment,—and dash them into wild ruin. That must have been a charge! That was the beginning of hours of chaos, seemingly irremediable, in that Prussian right wing. For the Prussian Horse fly wildly; and it is in vain to rally. The King is among them; has come in hot haste, conjuring and commanding: poor Schulenburg addresses his own regiment, "Oh shame, shame! shall it be told, then?" rallies his own regiment and some others; charges fiercely in with them again; gets a sabre-slash across the face,—does not mind the sabre-slash, small bandaging will do;—gets a bullet through the head (or through the heart, it is not said which), and falls down dead; his regiment going to the winds again, and his care of it and of other things concluding in this honourable manner. Nothing can rally that right wing; or the more you rally, the worse it fares: they are clearly no match for Römer, these Prussian Horse. They fly along the front of their own First Line of Infantry, they fly between the Two Lines; Römer chasing,—till the fire of the Infantry (intolerable to our enemies, and hitting some even of our fugitive friends) repels him. For the notable point in all this was the conduct of the Infantry; and how it stood in these wild vortexes of ruin; impregnable, immovable, as if every man of it were stone; and steadily poured out deluges of fire,—"five Prussian shots for two Austrian;" such is perfect discipline against imperfect; and the iron ramrod against the wooden.

Two more extracts must suffice. They give a fair conception of the interesting contents of a volume, that needs not critical commendation to insure it a host of readers everywhere. The first is Mr. Carlyle's introductory remarks on the first meeting of Friedrich and Voltaire; the other is Voltaire's account of that interview.

Friedrich's First Meeting with Voltaire! These other high things were once loud in the Gazetteer and Diplomatic circles, and had no doubt they were the World's History; and now they are sunk wholly to the Nightmares, and all mortals have forgotten them,—and it is such a task as seldom was to resuscitate the least memory of them, on just cause of a Friedrich or the like, so impatient are men of what is putrid and extinct!—and a quite unnoticed thing, Voltaire's First Interview, all readers are on the alert for it, and ready to demand of me impossibilities about it! Patience, readers. You shall see it, without and within, in such light as there was, and form some actual notion of it, if you will co-operate. From the circumambient inanity of Old Newspapers, Historical shot-rubbish, and unintelligible Correspondences, we sift out the following particulars of this First Meeting or actual Osculation of the Stars.

"I was led into his Majesty's apartment. Nothing but four bare walls there. By the light of a candle, I perceived, in a closet, a little truckle-bed, two feet and a half broad, on which lay a little man muffled up in a dressing-gown of coarse blue duffel; this was the King, sweating and shivering under a wretched blanket there, in a violent fit of fever. I made my reverence; and began the acquaintance by feeling his pulse, as if I had been his chief physician. The fit over, he dressed himself, and took his place at table. Algarotti, Keyserling, Maupertuis, and the King's Envoy to the States-General"—one Rißfeld (skilled in Heriat matters, I could guess),—"we were of this supper, and discussed, naturally in a profound manner, the Immortality of the Soul, Liberty, Fate, the Androgynous of Plato" (the Androgynoi, or Men-Women, in Plato's 'Convivium'; by no means the finest symbolic fancy of the divine Plato),—"and other small topics of that nature."

There is a mighty lesson taught to kings and people by this book. Prussia, with 3,000,000 of inhabitants became a European Power. How? Not by favoritism or marriage dowry, but by the inflexible will of the king and the loyalty of his subjects. A small nation united is unconquerable when the numbers against it are great; and if aggressive, it is well nigh irresistible. Prussia acquired greatness, because king and people pulled one way. Judging from the signs of the times, it is likely king and people will pull in opposite directions. Will opposite results follow from opposite causes? Will the struggle issue in deterioration? It depends upon how long the constitutional war is continued.

PROSPECTS OF THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

THE kind notice you took of the remarks I made on the prospects of the South in your last number, emboldens me to trouble you again with some feelings on the same subject which I find extensively prevailing among the classes in England who view this intestine war without personal or pecuniary bias. In the first place, armistice, arbitration, remonstrance, is out of the question. The Confederacy must "stand the hazard of the die." She must and will win her independence. She must owe the proud inheritance of Freedom, which she will bequeath to her children's children, to no sword but that of her own sons. She must tread the wine press alone, and who can doubt she will fulfil her glorious destiny? It is most marvellous that the press of Europe cannot comprehend that in no single instance has there been heard a cry from the struggling Confederacy, "Come and help us!" Not one voice has ever been raised in whining despondency or importunity for aid. The attitude of the South has been uniform and dignified from the very commencement. She declared her rights solemnly before the world, and asserted her undying resolution to defend them against the invader by the dread arbitrament of the sword. She has never swerved from that determination, nor shifted that attitude. All the questions of breaking the blockade, of interference on the part of European nations to prevent this wicked slaughter and destruction among brethren and fellow-countrymen, have been raised on this side of the Atlantic. And why? The reason is obvious. Because, in America the war is a question of principle, and here of interest. The Confederacy can well afford to conquer her position in the family of nations without the recognition of England and France; but can they afford to lose her? Can they afford to see her cities destroyed, her piles of life-giving cotton, instead of feeding the mouths of their starving labouring population, and swelling the coffers of their commerce, given to the devouring flames by the indignant owners, rather than they should fall into the hands of their hated enemies? Can England and France afford to see the rice-fields and tobacco-grounds revert to the original dismal swamps from which the energy and enterprise of the South has raised them? They know they cannot—they dare not; and hence the cry. Test for one moment the present feeling in both countries. There is but one class that dares to advocate the cause of the North—those whose pockets are suffering, and are likely to suffer—the men whose money is invested in Northern securities, and to whom the ruthless and reckless invaders of their neighbours are partners in trade. This is the whole secret of Northern sympathy in England.

On the other hand, all that is generous and noble in the human breast is roused at the contemplation of a united nation struggling at fearful odds against an invasion of their hearths and homes. The statesman recognizes the trumpet of Freedom's battle, which Bequeathed from sire to son,

Though baffled oft is always won.

The political economist recognizes the great principle of free and unrestricted commerce with the world, proclaimed by the emancipated Confederacy, just emerging from the chains of selfish and degrading monopolies; while the philanthropist may rejoice in witnessing the unflinching courage with which, under terrible inferiority of numbers, of preparation, and scientific strength and appliances, the men and women of the South have with united heart and hand withstood the mercenary hordes of the North, "though they came in upon them like a flood." You have, sir, already so ably pointed out the several delusions which events have successively and successfully dissipated, that I will not attempt to go over the same ground; but there is one delusion which I trust will not much longer be suffered to flaunt itself before the public eye; and that is, that the people of this country regret the terrible ordeal, or view with pain the disruption of the Union, as is daily asserted by the leading journal. I do not, of course, mean the miserable satisfaction of seeing our neighbours weakened, which some paltry, timid politicians may feel, though they dare not express, but I mean the noble and honest beat of the English heart, that acknowledges the throb of sympathy with indignant repelling of coercion; the sentiment of the British Barons, who extorted Magna Charta at the sword's point at Runnymede, reproduced by their posterity in the defence of their legal rights and liberties upon the soil of their native Southern land; the natural offspring of Cromwell and Hampden's unconquerable spirit, asserted by their representatives on the soil to which they themselves looked forward to as their land of promise in the hour of darkness and despair.

AN ENGLISH SYMPATHIZER.

THE PRESENT AND THE FUTURE.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

THE boasted military power of Northern America pauses before the reality of Southern preparations for defence. In the East, at Yorktown, the great army of the Potomac fears to advance upon guns and gunners nerved by revolutionary memories. The Merrimac rules the neighbouring waters like a monarch, the Northern vessels clinging affrighted to Fortress Monroe. In the West, an entrenched army defies the arrogant legions who have made their way into a hostile country only by the aid of gunboats. Here there has been already a battle fought, and a victory won.

There were no masked batteries, no earthworks, to aid the South. They went miles from their entrenchments, and utterly demoralized an army of, perhaps, equal strength. Their victory was followed up after this routed enemy was reinforced by Wallace's division, and by gunboats, and in spite of both they took from 8000 to 10,000 prisoners, and 36 guns; and they returned to their entrenchments, in the good order they came from them, only when the whole of Buell's army, fresh and keen for slaughter, was added to the numbers against them. In this affair, the South lost more than its usual percentage of killed and wounded, and one who counts as many, for their commander-in-chief, Sydney Johnston, now "sleeps his last sleep, and has fought his last battle." But yet, forsooth, the South lost the day, because they did not utterly destroy the Northern hosts. The latter have followed up this famous victory of theirs by the capture of a telegraphic despatch—but they decline to state their losses in this and other achievements near Corinth. We hear of a Southern sorité at Yorktown, doubtless to prevent entrenchments by the Northern troops, but as truth only reaches Europe through the blockaded ports of the South, we have not heard the result. We hear further of a Northern general, who went towards Richmond in a balloon, and was glad to get back again—and so "the siege progresses" here. The groundlings may cry onward to Richmond until they are hoarse, the people may be exhorted to give thanks for victories yet to be won, or for escapes from being cut to pieces; but the stubbornness of artillery still blocks the way between promise and performance. We were told, too, that as far back as the 1st of April, the attacking fleet, with their big mortars and big General Butler, were ready to crush Forts Jackson and Philippe, and the last mail says that they began somewhere about the 19th of April. It is, perhaps, not material to discuss which of these statements is "probable." We will decide this after another eighteen days. It is patent to all the world that the only progress made by Northern arms, away from the coast, up to this time, has been by the aid of gunboats and water communication, against which the South has had no defence. The prestige still rests with the South, that, upon equal terms, she has resisted everywhere manfully and successfully the desolation of her homes; that the spirit of her people rises under the burden of trials; that there has been no huckstering nor trafficking for gain or profit; no grovelling to Northern power when forced upon her destitution and ruin as far as accomplished. Not only is the sacredness of her cause intact, but the confidence in its invincibility makes a unit of her children. They are gathered together in the name of their country; those who have no rifles fight with their shot-guns; those who have no guns use pikes, and in battles, where they have exhausted their ammunition, they have sought death or victory, clubbing their guns as their weapons of attack or defence. All these things we know, as glimmerings of truth amid the darkness with which Northern censorship seeks to eclipse truth, or Southern glory, or both. We know, too, that the North has spent many months of preparation, many thousands of lives, and promised to pay many hundred millions of dollars, to reach in this struggle a fair beginning; for we are at the threshold only of the war, if it is to be prosecuted until the South is subjugated. The siege of Troy was nothing in duration to the siege contemplated of the million of square miles, all armed with the spirit of liberty, in the South.

But conquest would seem to be a folly even beyond Northern conceit, or the insolence of office and pretension which mark their plans for dominion. The past year has shown in the North an utter disregard of the great bulwarks of freedom. Neither speech, nor conscience, nor the press, is free to her citizens; and ministers of God have been arrested for praising their Maker in their own way; whilst no crime is too great to be committed by those in office in the name of Union—from wholesale robbery to petty pilfering; the former rewarded by foreign missions, and the latter aided by permission for politicians to fleece the soldiers under the name of Sutlers. There is throughout an accumulation of official dishonesty, of a rottenness in principle, among the oppressors of the South. The exaggerations of the press, the publication of "Halleck" despatches, are among the small burdens entailed upon the Northern people by this war. Upon their credulity rests the whole ability to prosecute it. But for this fact, no doubt, a tax would be laid upon credulousness, as prolific of revenue. Everything else has been taxed, at least by enactment; all that Sidney Smith detailed, and some things which even his imagination failed to take in. At the South all the usual guarantees of liberty have been preserved. There has been a majesty in the singleness of purpose with which this beleaguered land has guarded those great objects for which she sought separate existence, and at the same time the public defence. It is saddening to dwell on another contrast between North and South, although it is one of the surest pledges of triumph for the latter. The South has opposed the flower of her youth—most of them acting as private soldiers—to hordes of whiskered outcasts of cities, slaying for hire, some of whom rival in brutality the men of Wallenstein. Perhaps her independence will be all the more precious, purchased with such blood, and wrung from such opponents; but many a heart and many a home is already desolate. The conversion of her church bells into artillery shows the determination to use every means of defence. If there were ever a doubt of the accord of Southern men it has been crushed out by this war, and its prosecution in a spirit of hatred and vengeance. For what? Not to restore the old Government, for it no longer exists. The Constitution has been violated and trampled upon in every way. Is it to make a new one? If so, they employ strange means for future harmony. When will it end? So long as pride and covetousness continue to sway and debase the human heart, just so long will the North persist in its warfare, provided her people will pay the bills. Hence it is that there is a Government conduit-pipe, through which news flows to be garbled. So satisfied does the North appear that her own people need alone be feared, that she has already been thanking God for escape from foreign intervention. If we admit the pervading error will continue to goad this Northern cupidity the only path to peace is through foreign intervention. And why, we ask, should the South, free-trader as she is, be treated with less liberality, less fairness, than the rest of the world? Is there one law of blockade for the strong, and another for the weak? Should a paper blockade be called effectual, in order to leave vessels of war free to attack Southern cities? Is it not in proof that this blockade has been habitually violated? Is it not patent how the South has sustained herself against the most formidable military preparations of modern days? Why, then, does Europe deny her what justice and usage would accord, and what suffering humanity pleads for? It is discriminating against her, against the oppressed, and in favour of the oppressor, to apply unusual harsh rules in her case to the law of blockade. We care not how strong the North may be—right is stronger still, and by the rules of right, the South to-day should be acknowledged by the world an independent nation. She has asked no favours, but simply the recognition of her existence, and an interchange of commercial commodities for the common benefit of mankind. It would imply neither magnanimity, nor entail undue responsibilities, to do unto the South as other nations would be done by. The suffering of starving thousands in England and France makes hers a case where the oppressed should be aided rather than injured. We do not believe, as the North seems to, that Europe will be as readily deceived by paper victories as by a paper blockade. But if so, what limit is there to be to the present inaction. Shall the war go on until the North permits foreign nations to recognize the South? Does any sane man believe that it is waged for remission? Shall the staples of the South be lost to mankind? Suppose by midsummer no final results be attained, will the South be recognized then, or will it be next autumn, or next year? We are convinced that this tide of malice and persecution will flood and blight the South, and this thirst for blood be unglutted, just so long as the world at large permits it, unless the bubble of Northern finance should burst. We therefore ask, in the name of justice, of consistency, of humanity to the great peoples on both sides of the ocean—we plead for the widow and orphan—that Europe should not continue to regard with criminal indifference and apathy one of the "bloodiest pictures in the book of Time."

Paris, May, 1862. A SOUTHERNER.

SECESSION, FROM A NORTHERN POINT OF VIEW.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The question we have heard most frequently asked in relation to the fratricidal war in America, is this: "What are they fighting about?" Now, the variety of answers given to this question by European journalists, diplomats, essayists, legislators, and pamphleteers, not only shows what a diversity of opinion exists in regard to the causes of the war; but indicates both lack of knowledge and confusion of ideas in regard to the origin and history of the Government of the United States. We have no disposition to disparage the ability, or detract from the honesty and fairness of the English press; but truth and justice compel us to say that American politics are less comprehended in England than English politics are understood in America; and for the simple reason, that the institutions of England are old; those of America are new. It is true, the literature, the language, the common law, and the religion of the two countries, are the same. But the constitutions of the two governments are different; the elections, the legislatures, the administration of justice, are different; while social distinctions and habits of life render the two peoples almost as unlike as different races.

The United States have long since ceased to be a homogeneous people. The Anglo-Saxon element has become so mingled with foreign blood by the influx of emigration from all parts of the civilized and semi-civilized world, that the present generation, especially of the North, has lost much of its original and distinctive character. Englishmen can no longer justly judge

Americans by themselves. Comparatively few leaders of public opinion in England, including cabinet ministers, publicists, and members of Parliament, have had an opportunity of personally witnessing and investigating the peculiar institutions of the United States. Now and then a roving M.P., or a correspondent of some enterprising newspaper, crosses the Atlantic—makes a hurried tour through the States—reads the articles of the Federal Constitution—Bancroft's History—Spark's or Irving's "Life of Washington"—and forthwith proceeds to pronounce judgment, pro or con, upon the success or failure of the "Model Republic." Superficial knowledge, of course, leads to unjust conclusions. Politics, parties, and persons are equally misunderstood and misrepresented. The quadrennial contest for the election of President comes before the people. Two great parties take the field, to say nothing of one or two minor ones. What are the issues that create these political antagonisms? Hitherto, under the general names of Whig and Democrat, the masses have been divided into what they were taught to believe formed the conservative and radical wings of society; but even this natural division was never drawn with reference to a social opposition between rich and poor, or aristocrats and democrats. Many of the wealthiest men in America, and even those who make pretensions to "old families," have always acted with the so-called democratic party. In the North, especially in New England, the rich mill-owners are generally Whigs, or high tariff men; in the South, free trade has always been the interest, and therefore the policy, of the land-owners; and, consequently, the South is always, nominally and politically, democratic; although in habit, feeling, and principle far more aristocratic than the North. Herein lies the secret of the great social and political dissension, resulting in the disruption of the Federal tie, followed by a more deadly and devastating civil strife than the world has ever before witnessed; for it cannot be too often repeated in Europe, what every one knows to be true in America, that the North is not fighting for the emancipation of slaves, but "for Empire," as Lord Russell very felicitously expressed it; while "the South is struggling for Independence."

The Federal press is constantly guilty of falsely reporting the existence of a "strong Union feeling in the South." Such is not the fact; nor has it been since the issue of President Lincoln's war proclamation some thirteen months ago. No doubt, that now and then a cowardly prisoner, to save his life and his property, has, under stress of fear, avowed "Union sentiments." Victims upon the rack have often been tortured into recantations of their faith; but we do not hesitate to declare the opinion that there is more latent Secessionism, in the city of New York alone, than there is Unionism in all the States of the Confederacy. In the first place, there are thousands of Northern men who are now, and always have been, theoretical Secessionists; that is, they believe in the absolute right of a State to withdraw from the Federal Union; and under certain exigencies, they regard this political right as a most sacred duty. The free-trade democrats also sympathize with the South, and would rather aid than impede them in establishing their independence. Over and above all these political considerations, there are ties of relationship, of friendship, and of love, which cause the heart of many a Northern man, and woman, too, to beat quick and warm for the near ones and the dear ones who are now standing—

Between their loved homes,
And the war's desolation.

Has it never occurred to the English people, that the masses of the North—composed, as they are, of fragments of every nation on the earth—absolutely hate the social institutions of England, with as much intensity as the English abolitionists of the Exeter Hall School hate the institution of slavery? Did not Colonel Corcoran, who has been held a prisoner at Richmond, since the Bull Run route refuse to order out his regiment to receive the Prince of Wales on his arrival in New York? Is it not one of the leading objects of the Irish-American orator "on the stump," to defame the Government and the nobility of England? And do they not now openly threaten, at some future date, to strip the "laurel" from the brow of royalty? "England's necessity," they say, "shall be Ireland's opportunity;" and they even dream of the day when France and the United States shall join hands against haughty and "perfidious Albion," to revenge the wrongs of their—

"Own loved Island of Sorrow."

And yet the thunder of England sleeps; and no voice of power protests against the wholesale slaughter of patriots, gentlemen, and Christians, of English name and race and blood, whose only crime consists in the invincible determination to be free.

A NORTHERN MAN.

WHO PLANNED THE MERRIMAC?

Letter from the Confederate Secretary of the Navy.

"Confederate States—Navy Department,
Richmond, March 29.

Hon. Thomas S. Bocock, Speaker of the House of Representatives:

Sir,—In compliance with the resolution adopted by the House of Representatives on the 15th inst., "That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to make a report to this House of the plan and construction of the Virginia, so far as the same can be properly communicated; of the reasons for applying the plan to the Merrimac; and also what persons have rendered special aid in designing and building the ship," I have the honour to reply that on the 10th day of June, 1861, Lieutenant John M. Brooke, Confederate States' navy, was directed to aid the department in designing an iron-clad war vessel, and framing the necessary specifications.

He entered upon this duty at once, and a few days thereafter submitted to the department, as the results of his investigations, rough drawings of a casemated vessel, with submerged ends and inclined iron-plated sides. The ends of the vessel and the caves of the casemate, according to his plan, were to be submerged two feet; and a light bulwark or false bow was designed to divide the water, and prevent it from banking up on the forward part of the shield with the vessel in motion, and also to serve as a tank to regulate the ship's draught. His design was approved by the department, and a practical mechanic was brought from Norfolk to aid in preparing the drawings and specifications.

This mechanic aided in the statements of details of timber, &c., but was unable to make the drawings; and the department then ordered Chief Engineer Williamson and Constructor Porter, from the navy yard at Norfolk to Richmond, about the 23rd of June, for consultation on the same subject generally, and to aid in the work.

Constructor Porter brought and submitted the model of a flat-bottomed, light draught propeller casemated battery, with inclined iron-covered sides and ends, which is deposited in the department. Mr. Porter and Lieutenant Brooke have adopted for their casemate a thickness of wood and iron, and an angle of inclination nearly identical. Mr. Williamson and Mr. Porter approved of the plan of having submerged ends to obtain the requisite flotation and invulnerability, and the department adopted the design, and a clean drawing was prepared by Mr. Porter of Lieutenant Brooke's plan, which that officer then filed with the department. The steam frigate Merrimac had been burned and sunk, and her engine greatly damaged by the enemy; and the department directed Mr. Williamson, Lieutenant Brooke, and Mr. Porter to consider and report upon the best mode of making her useful. The result of their investigation was their recommendation of the submerged ends, and the inclined casemates for this vessel, which was adopted by the department.

The following is the report upon the Merrimac:—

"In obedience to your orders, we have carefully examined and considered the various plans and propositions for constructing a shot-proof steam battery, and respectfully report that, in our opinion, the steam frigate Merrimac, which is in such condition from the effects of fire as to be useless for any other purpose, without incurring a very heavy expense in rebuilding, &c., can be made an efficient vessel of that character, mounting * * * heavy guns, and from the further consideration that we cannot procure a suitable engine and boiler for any other vessel without building them, which would occupy too much time, it would appear that this is our only chance to get a suitable vessel in a short time. The bottom of the hull, boilers, and heavy and costly parts of the engine being but little injured, reduce the cost of construction to about one-third of the amount which would be required to construct such a vessel anew.

"We cannot, without further examination, make an accurate estimate of the cost of the proposed work, but think it will be about * * * the most of which will be for labour, the materials being nearly all in the navy yard, except the iron plating to cover the shield. The plan to be adopted in the arrangement of the shield, for glancing shot, mounting guns, arranging the hull, &c., and plating, to be in accordance with the plan submitted for the approval of the department.

"We are, with much respect, your obedient servants,

"WILLIAM P. WILLIAMSON,

"Chief Engineer Confederate States' Navy.

"JOHN M. BROOKE,

"Lieutenant Confederate States' Navy.

"JOHN L. PORTER,

"Naval Constructor."

Immediately upon the adoption of the plan, Mr. Porter was directed to proceed with the constructor's duties. Mr. Williamson was charged with the engineer's department, and to Mr. Brooke were assigned the duties of attending to, and preparing the iron, and forwarding it from the Tredegar Works; the experiments necessary to test the plates and to determine their thickness; and devising heavy rifled ordnance for the ship, with the details pertaining to ordnance. Mr. Porter cut the ship down, submerged her ends, performed all the duties of constructor, and originated all the interior arrangements by which space has been economized, and he has exhibited energy, ability, and ingenuity. Mr. Williamson thoroughly overhauled her engines, supplied deficiencies, and repaired defects, and improved greatly the motive power of the vessel.

Mr. Brooke attended daily to the iron, constructed targets, ascertained by actual tests the resistance offered by inclined planes of iron to heavy ordnance, and determined interesting and important facts in connection therewith, and which were of great importance in the construction of the ship, devised and prepared the models and drawings of the ship's heavy ordnance, being guns of a class never before made, and of extraordinary power and strength.

It is deemed inexpedient to state the angle of inclination, the character of the plates upon the ship, the manner of preparing them, or the number, calibre, and weight of the guns; and many novel and interesting features of her construction, which were experimentally determined, are necessarily omitted.

The novel plan of submerging the ends of the ship and the caves of the casemate, however, is the peculiar and distinctive feature of the Virginia. It was never before adopted. The resistance of iron plates to heavy ordnance, whether presented in vertical planes or at low angles of inclination, had been investigated in England before the Virginia was commenced, and Major Bernard, U.S.A., had referred to the subject in his "Sea-Coast Defences."

We were without accurate data, however, and were compelled to determine the inclination of the plates, and their thickness and form, by actual experiment.

The department has freely consulted the three excellent officers referred to throughout the labour on the Virginia, and they have all exhibited singular ability, energy, and zeal.

I have the honour to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. R. MALLORY,
Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES' LAW OF ARREST.

SENATE, 15th April.

Mr. McDougall, of California, called up the resolutions submitted by him some days since, calling on the Secretary of War to communicate to the Senate under whose order Brigadier-General Stone was arrested, what (if any) charges have been preferred against him; who made the charges; why the course customary in such cases had not been pursued; whether and how often General Stone has applied for a speedy trial; what privileges enure to General Stone under the articles of war; on what pretence he is kept in custody, if not for a violation of an article of war, &c.

Mr. McDougall said it was now fifty days since Brigadier-General Stone was taken from his home at midnight unexpectedly, and removed to one of the darkest dungeons and fortresses in the country, without communication with his family or friends. Since that time he had not, nor his friends, been able to learn directly on what charges he was arrested, or by whose authority—whether by the Secretary of War, the General-in-Chief, or other official. If these things could take place in what is called a free republic, we were in no better condition than England in the dark ages. The law required that military officers when arrested be sent to and confined at their quarters, and the charges made known to the accused in eight days. But all the efforts of General Stone himself, and all his friends, steadily pursued, had failed to elicit the charges. He had himself called to see the Secretary, and that functionary had refused to admit him.

Mr. Wade, of Ohio, who is chairman of the Committee on the Conduct of the War, indignantly repelled the intimations of Mr. McDougall. The committee had endeavoured to correct many wrongs in the army; had never published a word, but had given the results of their investigations to the Executive. As regards General Stone, he would say here, in his place, that there was evidence which showed probable cause for his arrest. He would not, however, make known that testimony—it should not now be drawn from him. Whether General Stone was arrested on that testimony he did not know. The man who would talk of constitutional guarantees, of habeas corpus, the phrases that "no man shall be deprived of life or property without due process of law," &c., in this great crisis, was a traitor at heart. Since the day that that infernal traitor, John C. Breckinridge, day after day here talked of "constitutional guarantees," this thing has been continued. There was not anything that had been said by the gentleman in regard to General Stone, on account of gallantry, services, &c., but as well applied in behalf of the hellish traitor, Jefferson Davis, who had distinguished himself in Mexico, and held high civil positions. Lucifer was once an angel in Heaven, but had fallen, and he had not been much respected since in that quarter. Mr. Wade continued at length, urging a vigorous prosecution of traitors, and the sacrificing of slavery, if necessary for the salvation of the country. Let slavery die and the Union live.

Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, moved to amend. That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate any information in regard to the arrest of General Stone, not incompatible, in his judgment, with the public interest.

The subject was then laid over.

THE BOMBARDMENT OF FORT JACKSON.

From the New Orleans Picayune, April 16.

For the first time since it was built, Fort Jackson—one of the strong defences of the Mississippi River below the city—was on Sunday last "under fire."

Availing ourselves of a courteous invitation, we accompanied a pleasant party to the forts, leaving the city in a steamer on Saturday night, and arriving, after some detention by a fog on the river, in the forenoon of the next day. Just as our boat touched the landing we heard the drum beat "the long roll," while a bugler standing on one of the bastions sounded the call to quarters. At this summons many of the soldiers who had been engaged outside set off at double quick, and made their way to the interior of the fort, and when we entered we found the various companies drawn up in line, or on their way to the casemates and the parapets. Soon all were in place beside their guns, ready for the threatened conflict, while General Dancau and his assistant officers were seen pacing the parapet, spy-glasses in hand, and casting eager glances to the point of woods about two miles down the river, and behind which they could already discern the masts of the enemy's vessels coming up.

At this moment a red flag was raised over the Confederate banner, by way of signal to St. Philip opposite, that the enemy was approaching, and immediately the blue crossed, white starred battle flag was run up on the staffs of both forts.

Meantime, the several gunboats lying off the forts, formed in readiness to take part, if need were, in the contest. One of these went down on a reconnoitering expedition, and having neared the point of woods that yet hid the boats of the enemy from our sight, returned, but not without being honoured on her passage with a compliment or two from the guns of Commodore Farragut. She accomplished her return without injury, and soon a black hull was seen to emerge beyond the woods, and making her way towards the left bank of the river. Having attained what she probably considered an eligible position for her purposes, she came round, and presented her broadside to the fort, being then about two miles distant.

A few moments of eager expectation, and a flash, followed by a puff of smoke, was seen to issue from one of her guns, and then there came whizzing and hurtling through the air—heard by all, and seen by many in its course—the first shot ever fired at Fort Jackson. It was a very creditable line shot—a shell—and passed critically near the position of those who were watching its destination. It passed over the fort, and fell between its walls and the river, smashing a small foot-bridge, and making a formidable splash in the mud and water thereabouts. The next was aimed with about the same degree of precision, and fell beyond the walls, within a few feet of the outer bastion, facing the river. Some portions of this exploded shell were secured by the spectators as relics. We have one we should be pleased to show any curiously inclined friend.

Some twelve shells in all were bestowed upon us from different positions in the course of the forenoon, including one fired from the screen the woods afforded, which we took for a mortar shell. This described a lofty aerial curve, and when in mid-air exploded, the fuse being too short to carry it to its desired goal. Two of the shots came in very dangerous proximity to our pretty steamer, which lay at the landing, one passing over the pilot-house, and the other dropping into the water just abaft the stern. Another passed clear over the river, beyond St. Philip, into the prairie, and others were thrown, but like the rest, all without accomplishing their hostile intent.

All this, of course, was done mainly by way of "getting the range," though it is not to be doubted that every shot was intended to tell. From St. Philip some six or seven of the enemy's vessels, of different classes, were plainly to be seen; and from Jackson the masts of the flag-ship of the fleet, with the gridiron flaunting at the peak, were visible over the tops of the wood.

There were but three responses made on our side to these repeated compliments of the enemy. But these were all most elegantly turned. After the gunboat that opened the ball had amused herself awhile in this way, a seven-inch rifled gun was brought to bear on her, and, although not as effectively as desired, yet showed good practice, and flatteringly prophetic of a "better next time." At all events, the enemy deemed it prudent to retire for the time, and as he was making his way across to the point of woods, to seek once more his leafy shelter, he was greeted with two more messengers that very closely neared, if, indeed, one of them did not hit him.

Take it altogether, though but a reconnoissance on the one side, and a ready and prompt reception on the other, it was a brisk little affair, and greatly interested the spectators during the two hours or so it lasted.

But though the enemy did not pay any further attention to the forts during the day, he was not idle. Captain Mullen's company of sharpshooters were annoyingly about among that long reach of woods to which we have referred as skirting the river below the fort. Rumour reached us in the course of the day, that an epauletted Federal had been picked off by the rifle of one of these bushwhackers, to whom the officer presented a tempting mark as he stood on the quarter-deck of one of the vessels. And this may be the reason why, at intervals for several hours, there was a cannonading kept up by the enemy's gunboats upon the woods. The grape and caisson were very freely distributed among the trees and underbrush, but, we fancy, with but little effect.

When we left, on our return to the city, there was a prevalent impression in both forts, that the grand drama, of which this little affair was probably but the prelude, might commence in earnest any day, yesterday, to-day, or to-morrow, but undoubtedly in the course of the current week. The strong impression left upon our minds by the manner in which Fort Jackson deported herself on the occasion of her first fight, and by the conviction that her consort, over the river, when the time should come, would be equally formidable, was, that the enemy, if he runs that gauntlet successfully, will have to make a better fight than we think he will or can.

SHOOTING OF MR. WHARTON AT WASHINGTON.—We have been furnished from an authentic source, with the particulars of the killing (April 21st) at the Old Capitol prison, Washington city, of Jessie B. Wharton, one of the prisoners confined there. It appears that, about eleven o'clock, Mr. Wharton approached the window of his room in the second story, when the sentinel, standing on the pavement below, ordered him to take his damned head in, or he would shoot it off. Wharton, a young man of high spirit, retorted by saying that none but a coward would threaten an unarmed man and a prisoner. An altercation ensued. Wharton walked to the rear of the room, but hearing the sentinel talking on the pavement, again advanced to the window, folded his arms, and said: "Shoot, you damned coward, if you dare!" The sentinel took deliberate aim and fired, the ball passing through the left arm and entirely through the lungs of the unfortunate young man. Mr. Wood, the superintendent, kindly sent for Mr. Wharton's wife, who is the daughter of Colonel Whiting, of the Federal army; and Dr. John O. Wharton, his father, who resides at the Agricultural College, near Bladensburg, was called to his bedside in time to see him expire. The facts, as above stated, we understand were derived from his fellow-prisoners, one of whom is a son of Chancellor Walworth, of New York. Mr. Wharton was formerly a lieutenant in the United States' army, but was arrested four months ago, at Hagerstown. He was a nephew of the Hon. John Thompson Mason, and his connections are of the highest respectability.—The Maryland News Sheet.

We understand that on the 20th April, Dr. Lemoine, the representative of 30,000 French residents of Louisiana, held an interview with M. le Comte Henri Mercier, the French Minister to the United States, who arrived in this city from Washington on Wednesday. The result of the interview we have not ascertained, but it is very probable that matters were represented in their true light to the visiting Minister respecting the war, its causes, and policy.—Dr. Lemoine is an enthusiastic sympathizer with the South, and is looked up to by those whose sentiments he speaks, with confidence and veneration.—Richmond Inquirer, April 21st.

MALIGNITY OF THE TENNESSEE REBELS.

The Salem (Mass.) Register publishes a letter from the venerable Wm. Driver, who hoisted the American flag, which he called "old glory," at Nashville, when our troops took possession of that city. He says that the rebel leaders are destroying immense quantities of cotton and other property in Tennessee, to prevent it from falling into Northern hands. In Marshall, Giles, Rutherford, and other cotton-growing counties, the traitor cavalry have burnt all they could find, baled or unbaled, not even giving the owners a certificate of the amount destroyed. In Memphis there is an immense amount of sugar, molasses, coffee, &c., gathered together ready for the "torch," and also large amounts of cotton, not one pound of which is owned by the Confederacy or citizens of Memphis. Mr. Driver says:—

"Our enemy is bitter as death, as implacable as the savage of the forest; he will do anything to gain his end. Twice has the 'Black Flag' been flaunted in our faces, and cheered by a portion of our citizens. Our women are more bitter than the men, and our children are taught to hate the North in church, in school, and at the fireside. Our city still presents a sullen, silent front; it will take as long a time to root treason out of Nashville, as it did the household sins of Egypt out of Israel."

The vessel-chartering system, which has been the rage for several months with the War and Navy Departments, needs a little attention from somebody. When I state that there are steamers now in Government service whose charter money, at this moment, amounts to a sum twice as great as the price at which the vessels were offered for sale at the time of chartering, it will be conceded that taxpayers have some slight interest in checking this ruinous and sometimes rascally method of procedure. I know of one steamer which has been employed by Government almost two hundred days at more than 1200 dols. per day (1000 of which is acknowledged to be profit to the owners), and yet 100,000 dollars would have been cheerfully accepted as purchase money at the date of the charter contract. Is this a necessary part of the "pomp and circumstance of glorious war?"—Correspondence of the Boston Post.

H. O. BREWER AND CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

DOTCHFORD, BROWN, AND CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Speciations furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOUDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rufford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
Jos. J. Robinson,
8, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool.
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS,
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world is now in a ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers, in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that might lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.
The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers, and thus to draw them
&c., to advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important seaport and inland city of Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRESS INTERNATIONAL DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.
THE Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress International de Bienfaissances, will take place in London from the 5th to the 14th of June.

The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.
The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon at the same place.

A series of Soirées will be given during the period
of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entitled to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will be admitted to all the Meetings of the Association and Congress,
and to the Soirées, &c.

Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C.; and 12, Old Bond-street, W.

As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association
has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.
For every £5 subscribed to this fund, subscribers
are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City office, Guildhall, E.C.; by Messrs. Ransom, Houever, and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Westminster Bank, Lombard-street, E.C.; the Union Bank, Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kennard,
and Co., 4, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George
Ledger, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.
GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.,
and Chairman of Executive Committee.
A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.
G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO AND BRITISH COLUMBIA, via Panama—Steamers from Southampton to San Francisco and British Columbia, and return, by the Royal Mail Steam THROUGH BILLS OF LADING for goods, &c., are issued by the ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, in connection with Messrs. Wells, Fargo, and Co., of San Francisco. Goods should be sent to Southampton, addressed to the care of a shipping agent there. Jewellery received in London.
For further particulars apply to Captain Vincent.
Superintendent; or to R. T. REEP, Sec.
Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 55, Moorgate-
street, E.C.

BRAZIL AND RIVER PLATE
MAIL STEAMERS.—The ROYAL MAIL
STEAM PACKETS leave Southampton on the 9th of every month, carrying Her Majesty's Mail, passenger, cargo, specie, &c., for CAPE DE VERDES, Pernambuco, Bahia, Rio de Janeiro, Monte Video, and Buenos Ayres. For further particulars apply to Captain Vincent, Superintendent, Southampton; or to
R. T. REEP, Sec.

No. 55, Moorgate-street, London.
Specie, goods, parcels, or luggage, sent to Southampton, should be addressed to a shipping agent there.

WEST INDIES, Mexico, Colon, or Aspinwall, Panama, Central American, and
South Pacific Ports, San Francisco, and British Columbia, by the ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY'S STEAMERS leave Southampton, with H.M.'s Mails, on the 2nd and 17th of every month, conveying passengers and parcels, also specie and goods, under through bill of lading for any of the places mentioned above. For particulars apply to Capt. Vincent, Superintendent, Southampton; or to
R. T. REEP, Sec.

Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 55, Moorgate-
street, London, E.C.
Parcels and specie are received at the Company's office, in London. Specie, goods, parcels, or baggage sent to Southampton, should be addressed to
a shipping agent there.

LITHOGRAPHERS WANTED.—

Five or six experienced Lithographic Printers, willing to go abroad, can find permanent employment at liberal wages by applying at the office of THE INDEX. None but first-class workmen, with good references, need apply.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, on their legal representatives, on and after the second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. F. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,735 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.

Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on and a ter 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE.....
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 690,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,460 98

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1859.

Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poutx.
G. Monold.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
O. Nichols.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. F. Voorhier.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 93

The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.

Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
W. M. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI- CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 3 per cent.
primage.

PATERN PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight of other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper duties, and the owner will be liable therefor.
Does not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquafortis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur
a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to III. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event, So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object,
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—May 16th, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 4.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 22, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	39
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET	50
Liverpool Letter	50
Manchester Letter	50
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Prices Current	51
Marriages and Deaths	51
Private Letters and Extracts	51
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Our Washington Correspondent	53
Our Paris Correspondent	53
Our New York Correspondent	53
Our St. Thomas, W.I., Correspondent	53
Southern Prospects	54
TABLE OF SOUTHERN SECURITIES	55
LEADERS—
The War in America	56
Continued Insults to the British Flag	56
What does Intervention Mean?	57
French Diplomacy in America	58
Political Parties	58
Editorials	58
CRUISE OF THE SUMNER—
The Trail too Fresh	59
On the Look Out	59
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—
Our First Adventure	60
A Triumphal March	60
REVIEWS OF BOOKS—
A Historical Parallel	61
AMERICAN CIVILIZATION	62
DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS AT WASHINGTON	63
IS REUNION POSSIBLE?	63
ADVERTISEMENTS	64

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE evacuation of Yorktown has caused more excitement in New York and in Europe than in the Confederate States. The measure was evidently anticipated. The Richmond papers published during the last days of April openly advocated the withdrawal from positions that were assailable by the enemy's gunboats: and having held the Federals in check until the hot season, to allow them to march into the country, where they must fight at a disadvantage, and at such a distance from the basis of their operations, as would make defeat ruinous.

The evacuation was ordered on the 1st of May, commenced on the 2nd, and completed on the night of the 4th. When McClellan had sent up a balloon to assure himself that the Confederates had really gone, he ordered his troops to advance. The booty consisted of seventy-one guns, but we are not informed how many of them were quaker guns. McClellan further wrote a despatch, in which he says, "I am now fully satisfied of the correctness of the course I have pursued. The success is brilliant. You may rest assured its effect will be of the greatest importance." On the 4th, the Federals came up with the rear-guard of the Confederates, but declined fighting until the 5th, when there was a smart encounter, in which, according to Northern accounts, the Federal loss was 17 killed; the Confederate loss, 80 killed and 200 prisoners. This does not tally with the official report of the General:—

I find Johnstone in front of me in strong force, probably much greater than my own. General Hancock has taken two redoubts, brilliantly repulsing the rebels.

I do not know our exact loss, but fear General Hooker has lost considerably on our left. I learn from prisoners that the rebels intend disputing every step to Richmond. I shall run the risk of at least holding them in check while I resume my original plan.

My entire force is undoubtedly considerably inferior to that of the rebels, but I will do all I can with the force at my command.

Next day the 200 prisoners, like Falstaff's men in buckram had wonderfully increased. On the 6th, McClellan writes, "We have 1000 prisoners and 1000 wounded prisoners." This despatch concludes with this significant item, "We have other battles to fight before we reach Richmond." We may just observe that as usual the Young Napoleon was too late for the skirmish, and did not take the field until the fight was over.

The Federals occupied Williamsburg on the 6th. One curious feature in the official account is, that though McClellan knew the Confederate loss to a man, all he could tell about his own loss in Hooker's division was, "The Federal loss in General Hooker's division is heavy." Perhaps it was heavier than the General liked to confess.

The progress of the Federals was stopped at the Chickahominy River, the Confederates having destroyed all the bridges.

Twenty thousand men, under General Hutchins, have been landed at West Point, and on the 9th McClellan reported that he had effected a junction with them.

The Federal iron-clad steamer Galena has gone aground in James River.

From New Orleans we learn that there was a protracted fight between the enemy's boats and the forts, before the evacuation of the City. "The loss of the Federals amounts to 30 killed and 100 wounded. The Confederates lost 1500 men." All decimal numbers it will be noticed.

Does any one in Europe doubt the determination of the South? Let him read and digest the following items of Northern news brought by the North American. What eloquent testimony does the North bear to the character of the South!

"The Confederates, with their own hands, are stated to have destroyed cotton and shipping to the value of from 8,000,000 to 10,000,000 dols."

"The Louisville Dispatch reports that along the Mississippi from New Orleans to Memphis there is a general bonfire of property, particularly of cotton. At Memphis, sugar and molasses in large quantities were on the bluff ready to be rolled into the river, and all cotton was to be burnt.

"At the approach of the Federal fleet the people of the river towns retreated inland, destroying the property all along the southern tributaries of the Mississippi. Among their great number only one planter was found who objected to burning his cotton."

The one exception gives us a fine picture of the unanimous self-sacrificing population.

It is estimated that 11,000 bales of cotton were burnt at New Orleans.

It is reported in New York that Forts Jackson and Philip surrendered conditionally, that the officers should be allowed to retain their side arms, and the garrisons be permitted to retire on parole.

The Virginia and the Monitor have approached each other without coming to action.

We take the following paragraph from the New York summary, per North American (May 10th):—

An engagement has occurred at West Point between General Franklin's First Division and the Confederates, under General Lee. The Confederates were shelled by the Federal gunboats and retreated.

Does this mean that the Federals were beaten, and that the Confederates having gained the day retired from out of range of the gunboats?

M. Mercier arrived at Yorktown on the 4th.

There is no news of the movements of General Beauregard.

Savannah is to be resolutely defended. General Lawton has formally communicated to the city council his determination never to surrender the city. The council have resolved to sustain General Lawton.

According to information from Richmond, vid Washington, the planters had determined to raise no tobacco this season, and the military had seized the stock on hand, to prevent its falling into the hands of the Federal army.

On the 9th inst., the House of Representatives at Washington addressed a vote of thanks to General McClellan and the Army of the Potomac.

Postal communication has been re-established between New York and New Orleans. We venture to say that very few letters will go South by the agency of the United States.

It is rumoured that a Federal flotilla is advancing towards Natchez.

The French power in Mexico is growing. The English and Spanish have retired from the scene. The French troops have occupied Orizaba, taken a small fort, and at the last advices were still advancing. They have given four reasons for breaking the Soledad compact—the declaration of war by Juarez, the assassination of several French soldiers, annulment caused by Juarez, and the entire interception of all kinds of food. A large number of the inhabitants had approved of a proclamation issued by Almonte, in favour of foreign intervention. Anything is thought better than the dominion of Juarez. It has been reported in Paris that Marshal Serrano will form a camp in Mexico under the command of General Gasset, and that it is the Marshal's intention to prepare transports to bring back the Spanish troops immediately upon receiving orders to that effect from Madrid.

The seizure of the British steamship Bermuda, by the Federal cruiser the Mercedita, is an instance of the insolence with which the Yankees treat British vessels. As the Bermuda did not stop at the firing of the first gun, a shell was sent whistling about her rigging. The papers were examined and found to be regular; but as there were military stores on board, and as the Bermuda loaded at Liverpool, the captain of the Mercedita ordered her to be searched and ultimately seized. It is worthy of remark that before the search was over, the seizure was virtually made by altering the course of the vessel. Captain Westendorff, of the Bermuda, writes:—

Some of the officers subsequently informed me that they had a list comprising quite a number of British steamers that they were ordered to seize wherever they might catch them, and that if we had passed the Mercedita, two other steamers were cruising inside of the Providence Channel, and just around the port of Nassau, which would have been our aim to take us; in fact, that that harbour was well blockaded.

We should think that such insolent Yankee overhauling must rather disgust Jack Tar.

Mr. Adams has demanded that the Emily St. Pierre, the ship so gallantly rescued from fourteen Federal captors by her captain, cook, and steward, should be sent to the prize port to which the Yankees could not take her. We should think such a diplomatic communication must have disturbed the gravity of our noble Foreign Secretary. Possibly Mr. Adams will next demand that the English navy shall be actively employed in capturing English ships for the benefit of the Yankees.

On Monday, Mr. Disraeli reviewed the finances of the country, and glanced incidentally at the foreign policy of the Government. He showed that, in 1859, there were exceptional circumstances to call for a large army and navy expenditure, but though in 1862 there were no such exigencies—the expenditure is increased by £1,674,000. In reference to America, the right honourable gentleman observed:—

The other night I made a statement illustrative of the relations that existed between the Governments of France and England, with regard to America. I was urging then upon the House that it was inconsistent with our cordial relations with France to hear the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs bicker against the foreign policy of our ally; but I said I thought, at the same time, that if there were any place where France and England had a common object, and should have a common course of policy, it was America: notwithstanding which, I regretted to add, word had reached my ears that there was the same want of accord between the representatives of the two Governments there which we find in other places. I did not say much on the subject; it was a delicate one. But I said that there was a sort of constant management, an attempt to obtain rival influence, which, considering that they were accredited to the President of a Republic, and were in direct communication with the Minister of a Republic, seemed to me quite out of place, and more in keeping with the intrigues round the capricious tyrant of a Divan. I said that; I could have said a great deal more. I refer to a past debate, with the permission of the House, because this is a personal matter. The noble lord, when he replied, contradicted me on that head in terms which, allow me to say, were neither social nor Parliamentary. The noble lord said the statement was false. * * * I knew the matter would keep, and, therefore, being here again, I must tell the noble lord that I believe the statement that I made was most accurate, and, although from its particular character it is not capable at this moment of mathematical proof, before very long, perhaps, there may be even on the table of this House; but certainly in a form scarcely less authentic, sufficient proof of that statement.

Lord Palmerston defended the large estimates, and stated that the French Government had now eleven iron-clad vessels more than we have. In reference to Mr. Disraeli's reiterated charge of diplomatic intriguing at Washington, the noble lord observed:—

I denied that when the right hon. gentleman made the statement, and I repeat that denial now. Every one who knows Lord Lyons knows that a man like him, so honourable and straightforward in his dealings, would be incapable of intriguing and planning against his colleague. I have not the pleasure of knowing Mr. Mercier personally; but I have watched his progress through the many diplomatic missions which he has fulfilled, and I believe him to be a man as incapable as Lord Lyons himself of doing anything which he and his Government could not manfully avow. Therefore, I must again assure the right hon. gentleman that he has been totally misinformed, with regard to the assertion which he has made. Whatever the right hon. gentleman may think of former assertions, I again assure him that he is completely mistaken as regards our Mission and the French Mission at Washington. Lord Lyons and Mr. Mercier, I am happy to say, are in constant and friendly communication—neither of them has done anything without communication with the other. There has been no concealment; there has been what I may call joint action. The two Ministers have worked and co-operated almost as if representing the same Government; and they have exhibited the most perfect good faith towards each other in their negotiations with the Cabinet of Washington.

Later in the evening, the Government were defeated on the second reading of the British Museum Bill, by a majority of 92.

On Tuesday, Lord Russell laid on the table of the House of Lords the treaty for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade, lately concluded with the Washington Government. The substance of it is the extension of the right of search, a species of right which the Yankees are now thoroughly enforcing with English vessels. The treaty is for ten years, and renewable if the contracting parties think its continuation desirable.

The Prussian Diet was opened on Monday. The Minister President made a speech intended to be conciliatory. He announced that the additional taxation should not be levied after the 1st of July next; and reductions in the military administration; saving in the cost of administration of the public debt; and increased revenue were to meet the decrease of income arising therefrom. He informed the Diet that repeated examinations have manifested the possibility of further savings, of a temporary character, being effected in the military expenditure. These reductions, however, in order not to injure the vital condition of the organization of the army, can only be continued until a new source of revenue is opened by the land tax. By this means the Government shows that it was ready and desirous to meet the objections raised in former sessions, and is therefore justified in expecting that in considering the arrangements and requirements of our military force, due provision may be made for the independence and security of the country, which depend upon the undiminished excellence of the army." If the Diet is in a mood for compromise, possibly these terms will be, no doubt, rejected. The Government is fully aware that it has not gained by the re-election.

The Montenegrins are likely to give the Porte considerable trouble. On Sunday, they captured Nicksich, with 800 men, 27 officers, and 23 guns. Those who have invested in Turkish securities will not be pleased to learn that the commission for the consolidation of the public debt has not agreed upon the terms. The Porte objects to consolidate the whole floating debt. Certainly, the English Chancellor of the Exchequer would find it rather difficult to get on without an unfunded debt, and what we find so useful may be indispensable in Turkey.

The Hesse dispute has reached a climax. The Elector has rejected the Prussian ultimatum, and diplomatic relations are broken off by the recall of the Ambassadors from the Prussian and Hessian Courts. At an extraordinary sitting of the Federal Diet, the representative of Electoral Hesse declared that his Government was willing to suspend the elections, under the supposition that the resolution of the Federal Diet constituted a formal prohibition. The Diet referred him to the precise wording of its resolution. Possibly the Diet finds it easier to pass resolutions than to explain them. The Hesse affair is only worth notice as an example of the ineffectiveness of Federalism in Germany.

General Goyon's departure from Rome has greatly pleased the liberals. The General is accused of visiting Francis II., and of encouraging reactionary movements on the Roman frontier by his dilatoriness in their suppression.

The International Exhibition has been rather better attended this week. On Tuesday, the total number of visitors was 16,722. On Wednesday, an horticultural fête in the Society's gardens, attracted a large concourse. Still, the commissioners must mainly rely on the shilling days for the funds to pay the builders and relieve the guarantors of their responsibilities.

The German Ocean has flooded 10,000 acres of the Bedford Level, which, at the time of their submersion, were covered with crops. The accident has arisen from the blowing up of the middle level shore, and the subsequent breaking down of the banks. It is feared that the progress of the inundation cannot be checked soon enough to prevent further damage. The Bedford Level is a tract of low land, containing about 400,000 acres, situate in Northamptonshire, Huntingdonshire, Cambridge-shire, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Lincolnshire.

The Prince of Wales arrived at Constantinople on Tuesday. He was greeted with a royal salute from the Turkish fleet. The Grand Vizier and the Captain Pasha immediately went on board the Prince's vessel. The Prince landed at the Imperial Palace, on the steps of which he was received by the Sultan. Court carriages and an escort were in waiting to convey his Royal Highness to the British Embassy. The Sultan returned the Prince's visit an hour.

Latest dates from Nassau confirm the report that the said port has been blockaded by Federal ships.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, May 21st, 1862.

The past week has been one of great excitement and violent fluctuation in our market, with a panic at one time scarcely inferior in severity to that which was caused by the affair of the Trent. Our last report left Middling Orleans nominally worth 12½, with a very dull feeling, under the news per City of New York. On Thursday and Friday the depression continued, the circulars of the latter day generally quoting Middling Orleans 12½ per lb., but on Saturday the market received another staggering blow from the advices by the Persia. By her the unexpected news arrived of the evacuation of Yorktown by the Confederates, with a fresh crop of rumours respecting Mr. Mercier's recent mission to Richmond. It was freely asserted that he was the bearer of very tempting overtures from President Lincoln to the South, that an offer was transmitted through him to the Confederate Cabinet, guaranteeing the Southern States in the possession of all their former privileges if they would return to their allegiance with an amnesty for past offences, and additional security for slave property in the future. This report produced a very uneasy feeling among some holders of cotton; many persons argued that the proposition, if true, was so tempting a bait to the South in its present embarrassed state, that it might be accepted; and looking upon a sudden conclusion of the war as not unlikely, they became very anxious to get out of stock. Others, again, paid less attention to the report of mediation, but felt apprehensive of cotton shipments being resumed under the protection of the Federal power; they looked upon the retreat from Yorktown as another proof of Confederate weakness, and contended that before long the power of the South would be so shattered that the planters along the Mississippi would be glad to forward their crops to New Orleans under the shelter of the Federal gunboats. Influenced by these feelings, a regular panic sprang up in our market on Saturday. Forced sales of American cotton were made at a full ¾d. decline, or on the basis of 12d. for Middling Orleans; while even greater sacrifices were made in Surats, one considerable parcel of Middling Fair Dholerah cotton bought the previous week at 8d., was resold at 7½d., and a few other transactions occurred on the same basis. On Monday and Tuesday the depression continued, though with less of a panic feeling; but American cotton was sold even lower, and several transactions took place on the basis of 11½, 11½, and 11½ for Middling Upland, Mobiles, and Orleans respectively. Surats, however, were more firmly held, and the extremely low sales of Saturday were not repeated, the business done being chiefly based upon 7½ for Middling Fair Dholerahs. One sale of New Omrawatee "to arrive" was quoted as low as 7½, but very little was done in cotton afloat.

To-day, however, the tone of our market has changed as suddenly in the other direction. The North American's news has produced a revulsion in public feeling—no allusion is made to peace propositions, showing that the subject is passing from men's minds; and very alarming accounts are transmitted of the destruction of cotton and Southern produce along the Mississippi and its tributaries. What degree of credit is due to these accounts is difficult to decide, but enough is known to satisfy most persons of the desperate resolution of the Southern people, and the improbability of getting supplies of cotton from the ports while the war goes on. A strong speculative demand sprang up in consequence—all the cheap lots were withdrawn, and prices rapidly improved till ¾d. advance was paid on the forced sales of yesterday. Business has been much checked by the stiffness of holders, and the sales are restricted to 5000 bales, while Middling American cotton may be quoted at 12d. for Uplands, 12½ for Mobiles, and 12½ for Orleans. In Surats prices have recovered the largest part of the decline, the better description especially. Broach are within ¾d. of the highest point, while Dholerah Omrawatee, and generally speaking, the grades below 8d. are within ¾d. of the top. Middling Fair Dholerah may be quoted 7½d. to 7¾d., and fair 8d.

It may be remarked that in the last day or two strong and apparently well-founded reports have been circulated that the peace propositions above alluded to were actually made by Mr. Mercier on behalf of the Washington Government, but were peremptorily declined by the authorities at Richmond. This news is generally attributed to Mr. Slidell, the Southern Commissioner in Paris, and is looked upon as highly probable.

MANCHESTER, May 20th, 1862.

From the date of my last report of this market, the decline in cotton has been so decided as to lead to the expectation, on the part of buyers, that they would be able to purchase on much easier terms to-day than they could have done on Tuesday last.

The inactivity and despondency thus occasioned by American advices continue without mitigation, and to-day's market has been very dull, but more firmness is apparent at the close.

Yarns are, with some exceptions, lower all round as a rule; the best qualities spun from American cotton being scarce, maintain their value very steadily, and the decline in this class of yarns is very trifling.

The cloth market is very dull and irregular, with little business doing; manufacturers, however, as a rule, are moderately firm.

The Indian advices are very encouraging, and but for the opinion now gaining ground with respect to American affairs, that this is the beginning of the end, an increased supply of cotton may be looked upon as certain. As to the quantity likely to come forward, no one is in a position to form the slightest idea, and the uncertainty on this point is a ground for caution, both among buyers and sellers. But for this apprehension of consequences likely to arise out of a speedy settlement of the American question, we should have had a much larger business. Buyers for export, more especially to Bombay, have much encouragement, from the fact that shipments of goods, from January to April, both months inclusive, are only 38,646,692 yards, against 32,770,712 yards same time last year, from English ports, and from the Clyde 919,825 yards this year, against 1,831,623 yards same period last year.

As it is, buyers do not see their way very clearly, and are desirous of awaiting the advices of next mail, and then the next, such advices causing a feeling of mistrust or confidence, according as the news may be interpreted, as favourable or the reverse, to the termination of the war.

Prices in a general way are against sellers, but it is impossible to give quotations, since no offers large enough have been made to test prices.

The Cotton Supply Association are still pursuing experiments as to the extent to which cotton growers in India can be made available for the purposes of spinners and manufacturers, and specimens of yarns and cloth are constantly exhibited in our Exchange, which show a most decided improvement over the productions of last year, made from the same material.

The most marked decline to-day has been in both warp and weft cops suitable for Blackburn. These may be quoted at ½ to ¾ per lb. lower, and even 1d. per lb. from the highest point has, in one instance, been submitted to; this decline, however, has induced manufacturers to increase their stock of yarns.

The offers made for shirtings suitable for India and China, have been on the whole, much too low for manufacturers to accede to.

The concession is more apparent in the inferior qualities of cloth made from Surat cotton, than in the stocks of good cloth held over of last year's make, for which full prices are required.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRICES CURRENT.

(From the latest received Confederate Papers.)

NEW ORLEANS, Monday Evening, March 21, 1862.

COTTON.—We have not heard of a sale to-day.
TOBACCO.—80 hds. sold last week at very high prices.
SUGAR.—The market is extremely dull and the sales are confined to about 500 hds. at prices too irregular and unsettled for quotations.

MOLASSES.—The market is very dull, and the sales are confined to about 200 bbls. at 12 cents to 12½ cents for fermenting, and 15 cents per gallon for reboiled.

FLOUR.—The sales are confined to retail transactions at 18 dols. to 18 dols. 50 cents for superfine, and 20 dols. per bbl. for extra.

CORN.—624 sacks white, in bad order, sold at 1 dol. 45 cents, and 1250 sacks prime white, in store, at 1 dol. 50 cents per bushel.

RYE.—About 100 sacks sold at 2 dols. per bushel.
BRAN.—169 sacks sold at the advanced rate of 3 dols. per 100 lbs.

BACON.—3 casks of hams sold at 30 to 31 cents per lb. The retail demand is supplied at 27 cents for shoulders, 29 cents for hams, and 30 cents per lb. for clear sides.

PORK.—Mess is retailing at 45 to 50 dols. per bbl.
BEEF.—Prime is retailing at 32 dols. 50 cents, and mess at 37 dols. 50 cents, per bbl.

LARD.—The retail demand is supplied at 23 cents for tierces and 25 cents per lb. for kegs.

WHISKY.—The retail demand for old (Bourbon and Moon-gahala) has been supplied at 1 dol. 70 cents to 2 dols.; and rectified, made from Louisiana Rum, at 1 dol. 20 cents to 1 dol. 25 cents per gallon.

Nothing else reported.

CATTLE MARKET.

JEFFERSON CITY, March 25, 1862.

Arrived yesterday 130 Texas Beeves and 40 Veal Cattle. Amount of stock sold was 148 Texas Beeves, 153 Hogs, and 24 Veal Cattle. Stock remaining on sale is 205 Texas Beeves, 715 Hogs, 151 Sheep, 67 Veal Cattle, and 25 Milch Cows. We quote

PRICES.

Texas Beeves, choice, per lb.	10 to 15
Texas Cattle, first quality, per head	35 00 to 45 00
Texas Cattle, second quality	25 00 to 35 00
Western Beef Cattle, first quality, per 100 lbs. net.	— to —
Western Beeves, second quality, per 100 lbs. net	— to —
Hogs, first quality, gross, per 100 lb.	12 00 to 15 00
Hogs, second quality, gross, per 100 lb.	10 00 to 12 00
Sheep, first quality, per head	5 00 to 8 00
Veal Cattle, first quality, per head	12 00 to 15 00
Veal Cattle, second quality, per head	— to 9 00
Milch Cows, first quality, per head	60 00 to 75 00
Milch Cows, second quality, per head	45 00 to 60 00

NEW ORLEANS, Friday Evening,
March 14, 1862.

Our commercial community appear to fully approve the act passed by the Lower House of Congress, for the burning or destruction otherwise of cotton and tobacco, when in imminent danger of being seized by the enemy. In fact, many of our planters have already made the necessary arrangements to burn, not only their baled crops, but their seed cotton, in case the emergency should arise contemplated by Congress. Not only this, but the determination appears to be coming quite general to plant only a very small amount of the staple, and employ their labour in the cultivation of cereals, and the raising of hogs and cattle.

COTTON.—The sales reported during the past week comprise 300 bales, on the spot, sold to the navy department on Saturday at —; 150 bales, for future delivery here, on Tuesday, at 8½ cents for middling, and 100 on plantation, at 7½ cents for strict middling, 100 on plantation, on Wednesday, at 7½ cents for middling, and 81 on the spot, on Thursday, at 10½ to 11 cents for middling. This makes a total for the week of 731 bales. We have heard of no transactions recently at more than 8½ cents for future delivery, although last month we noticed sales at 9 cents. Middling on the spot is quoted at 11 cents, but has sold higher for good staple.

There have been some further receipts, but as they were on special permits from the Governor of the State, for immediate transshipment, they have made no addition to the stock.

Week's receipts 1,150 bales; last year 22,450. Total since Sept. 1, 26,333; last year, 1,714,500. Week's exports, &c., 1,150 bales; last year, 69,550. Total exports, &c., 25,437 bales; last year, 1,469,470, including 885,930 to Great Britain, and 295,210 to France.

STATEMENT OF COTTON.

Stock on hand Sept. 1, 1861	bales 10,118
Arrived to date	26,031
to-day	302— 26,333
Exported to date and in transit	36,451
Stock on hand not cleared, exclusive of amount in transit	25,237
Stock on hand last year	319,400

SUGAR.—The market opened this week with a less active demand, and the receipts being quite liberal, prices for the better qualities—the only description which have been in brisk demand—gave way ½ cent to 1 cent, while during the past three days this downward tendency has been more general, and prices have become so completely unsettled that we are compelled to omit quotations. The sales comprise 2600 hds. during the early part of the week, fair to fully fair closing on Tuesday at 25 to 30 cents, and 2700 since, including 1200 to day. This makes a total for the week of 5300. There is a great want of force to move the receipts, the labourers having mostly gone to the war, and planters are urgently advised to forbear shipments until there be a favourable change.

Sales corresponding week last year 6000 hds. at 1½ cents to 5½ cents for fair to fully fair.

Week's receipts, 14,070 hds.; last year, 7250. Total since 1st September, 166,906; last year, 138,750. Week's exports gone.

MOLASSES.—With moderate supplies and a slack demand, the market has continued inanimate throughout the week, the sales embracing 1800 bbls. during the first three days at 13 to 14c. for fermenting, and 16 to—c. for prime to choice, and 2500 since, including 800 to-day, at 12 to 13c. for fermenting, and 14 for reboiled, which may be regarded as fair quotations. This makes a total of 3500 bbls. In half barrels we notice sales of 650 packages at 15 to 17c. for fermenting, and 18 for prime.

Our receipts are about 70,000 bbls. in excess of last year's to the corresponding date.

Week's receipts, 6744 bbls. and 426 half-bbls; last year 8130 bbls. Total since September 1, 337,931 bbls.; last year 268,480. Week's exports, none.

TOBACCO.—There has been a good demand, but factors have either withdrawn their stocks from the market, or ask a greater advance than buyers are willing to pay, and we have not a sale to notice.

Lugs, Factory	— to —
Lugs, Planters'	— to —
Leaf, Inferior to Common	— to —
Leaf, Fair	— to —
Leaf, Fine	— to —
Leaf, Choice and Selections	— to —

Week's receipts, 20 bbls.; last year, 503 bbls. Total receipts since the 1st of September, 1018 bbls.; last year, 17,320. Exports, none. Total exports, 000 hds.; last year, 19,573.

STATEMENT OF TOBACCO.

Stock on hand 1st September, 1861	hds. 15,121
Arrived to date	1018
to-day	000— 1018
Exported to date	000
to-day	000— 000
Stock on hand not cleared	16,139
Stock on hand last year	18,375 hds.

LONDON, Wednesday Evening.

The aspect of affairs at the Stock Exchange was decidedly more favourable on Friday. The markets were in all respects better, and the arrival of the Porcia with the nature of the intelligence alleged to be communicated through this channel, stimulated purchases. It was then rumoured that the interference of the French Minister had produced an influence, and anticipations were expressed that hostilities would shortly be brought to a conclusion.

But on Saturday the market became weaker, and has not rallied yet. The impression has been gaining ground that money will shortly become dearer. It is unquestionable that the numerous foreign loans and schemes must take money from this country. On the other hand, the letters and accounts from America failed to strengthen the anticipations regarding the possibility of an early termination of the civil war, as the general opinion among the New York and Washington bankers is, that the South are without any disposition whatever to surrender. Many persons believe, however, that the recent negotiations of M. Mercier may lead to sudden and important results. Consols that opened on Friday at 93½ to 94 for money, and 92½ ex. div., for the account, were last quoted, to-day, 93½ to 94, again for money, and 92 to 93 ex. div., for the account. Many of the foreign stocks exhibit a partial depreciation, and railway shares also manifest weakness.

MARRIAGES AND DEATHS.

MARRIED.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, by Rev. Thomas Foley, Dr. J. F. Morgan to Miss M. E. Gough; both of St. Mary's county, Md.

On the 22nd April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. James E. Alford, William Norris to Elizabeth Magers; all of that city.

At St. Vincent's Church, Baltimore, by the Rev. Mr. McCarthy, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Myers, Thomas Hedican to Annie Heiniken Myers, third daughter of Jacob Myers, Esq.

On the 20th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. S. A. Wilson, John Lee Wooten, of Baltimore, to Rebecca E., daughter of the late W. S. Bosley, of Baltimore county.

On the 17th April, at Frederick, by the Rev. Dr. Daniel Zacharias, George S. Roberts, of Baltimore, to Miss Laura A. Carmack, of Frederick.

On the 17th April, at the residence of the bride, by the Rev. W. H. Bates, Charles C. Sears, U. S. A., to Miss Jennie Skinner, both of Baltimore.

On the 17th April, at the Seventh Baptist Church, Baltimore, by the Rev. Richard Fuller, Edmund L. Woodside to Margaret E., daughter of R. B. Porter, Esq., all of that city.

On Tuesday evening, 15th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Henry Scheib, Charles Kennel to Miss Margaret A. Bregel; both of that city.

On the 8th April, at Baltimore, by the Rev. Dr. Wyatt, John Hamilton to Miss Julia Ann Coulter, all of that city.

At Baltimore, Maryland, on the 22nd of April, by Rev. M. Slattery, William T. A. Beatty, to Miss Charlotte Jane Saugston, both of Baltimore.

On Tuesday, 4th inst., in New Orleans, W. C. D. Vaught, to Miss Isadore L. Walker, daughter of Felix Walker, all of this city.

On Thursday, the 6th inst., in New Orleans, at the residence of Captain Burns, by the Rev. Dr. C. S. Hedges, Mr. James Goodwin, to Miss Emily Augusta Hamilton, both of this city.

On the 2nd inst., at Pass Christian, Mississippi, by the Rev. Mr. McNeil, C. M. Bisbee, to Miss Mary C. Giese Cramer, both of Mississippi.

On the 13th inst., in New Orleans, by the Rev. C. S. Hedges, D. D., Mr. William Tell, to Miss Jane Eliza Richardson, all of this city.

On Thursday evening, 13th inst., in Mobile, by Rev. Dr. Moore, at the residence of the bride's mother, Mr. Lilia M. Hammond to Robert Robert, both of this city.

DIED.

On Monday, April 7, 1862, on the battle-field of Shiloh, Captain Charles C. Campbell, of the Sumter Rifles, Crescent Regiment, Louisiana Volunteers, aged 33 years, a native of Adams' County, Mississippi.

On Sunday, April 6, 1862, at the battle of Shiloh, Lieut. George Lewis Bond, 1st Louisiana Infantry, youngest son of S. T. Bond, of New Orleans.

On Saturday, April 12, Adelaide Probst, wife of T. Dantz, of New Orleans.

On Friday, April 11, in New Orleans, Mary McNamee, wife of George Tate, aged 45, a native of Ireland.

On Tuesday, April 6th, on the battle-field of Shiloh, Casilear Joseph Hartnett, aged 20 years and three months, step-son of a well-known citizen of New Orleans, Thos. H. Shields, Esq.

In San Francisco, on February 19th, Captain William P. Rogers, of Baltimore, Md.

In Richmond, Virginia, on April 11th, Mrs. Catherine Adair, wife of P. H. Skipwith, of New Orleans.

On Saturday, April 22nd, in New Orleans, H. B. Kemper, aged 58 years, a native of Kentucky.

On Sunday, April 22nd, in New Orleans, P. L. Moreau, aged 32 years, late Alderman from the Fourth District.

Near Franklin, Tennessee, on April 4th, William Scott McCants, aged 19 years, a private in Company E. Scott's Regiment Louisiana Mounted Men.

On Monday, 21st April, at Baltimore, Benjamin F. Staatch, in the 30th year of his age.

On the 19th April, at Baltimore, of consumption, Philip Linhard, in the 33rd year of his age.

On the 19th April, at Baltimore, Magdalene, wife of William Leinz, in the 29th year of her age.

In New York city, on the 22nd April, Frederick Bloomer, Esq., formerly of Baltimore. At rest.

In Washington, on Monday morning, 21st April, Mrs. Margaret R. Fleishell, daughter of the late Abraham and Elizabeth Wise, of Adams county, Pa.

On the 20th April, at Ashland, Baltimore county, Ann Connor, wife of Patrick Connor, in the 35th year of her age. My sharpest in peace—Amen.

On Sunday evening, April 20th, at Mt. Vernon Factory, Susan Ann Mason, wife of Moses Mason, in the 25th year of her age.

On the 19th April, in Washington city, Norval Wilson, eldest child of Thomas H. and M. Cornelia Havenner, aged 15 years.

On Friday, April 18th, at Hyatts own, Montgomery county, Carolina A., wife of Eli Wolfe, aged 53 years.

On the 16th April, at 11 p.m., at Cambridge, Md., Virginia T., consort of Dr. J. N. Baird, after a lingering illness, which she bore with Christian fortitude, and in the hope of a blissful immortality beyond the grave.

On the 13th April, at his residence in Queen Ann's county, Eastern Shore of Maryland, William Henley, of apoplexy, in the 53rd year of his age.

On the 10th December, at Pennsville, Morgan county, Ohio, John Burgess, in the 77th year of his age; a native of Maryland, but for the last fifty years a resident of Ohio.

On the evening of the 16th April, at Baltimore, Mrs. Harriet M. Wilmer, wife of Charles Wilmer, and daughter of the late Lloyd N. Rogers, Esq.

On Thursday, 17th April, in Harford county, near Fallston, Edwin Jane, in the 15th year of her age, youngest daughter of Mary M. and the late Captain Edwin Robinson.

On the 17th April, in Harford county, Edward Fiddington, aged 51 years, formerly of Baltimore.

On the 7th April, in Chickasaw county, Iowa, Jane Hollis, beloved wife of the Rev. Charles Hollis, formerly of Baltimore.

On the 19th February, in San Francisco, Captain William P. Rogers, a native of Baltimore, but for some years a resident of the former place.

DEATH OF A WELL-KNOWN CITIZEN.—We record, with pain, the death of Mr. Thomas W. Tobin, one of the publishers and proprietors of the Baltimore Free Current. Mr. Tobin has been in delicate health for some time, but until within a few weeks past has been actively engaged in his attendance on the Corn Exchanges. The deceased came to this city some years since from the North, and for a short time was occupied at his profession as a printer. During his sojourn here he has made hosts of friends, and few depart from this life in so deeply lamented nor more warmly esteemed.—N. O. Crescent.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following letter from a citizen of the Northern States to a friend in this country, proves that amid the general madness and frantic delusions of the North there are still some sober-minded men left, whose judgment remains clear, and whose voices must be heard in the first hall of the present hurricane of infuriated popular passions. The writer is a gentleman of vast political experience and high social standing:—

New York, May 1, 1862.

Though Spence's admirable book upon the civil war in this country has not reached us, yet its review in the Quarterly and North British Review, a tolerable insight into its principles and merits. Though kept down by the tame and depressing of the pro-Union press, yet its publication at such a critical moment in this country, where a day will bring about a change in the ruling articles in the Journal of Commerce of the last week in April, as well as to-day, you will perceive a manifest change in sentiment, and though that press was last year bribed or threatened into a fierce support of Government, yet it is now coming out strongly for the support of the Constitution and State rights. And, as it would scarcely dare to do this of itself, the query arises if it be not under the prompting of the Government? The suit brought by Pierce Butler against the late Secretary of War, for false imprisonment, and which, no doubt, will be followed by many others, has perhaps alarmed the Administration, and it finds that it has gone too far. I do not know that, with an experience of forty years in studying our Constitution, that I can add anything to Spence's (or rather the Quarterly's) excellent review. There is no sort of question that the States made the Constitution as States, and not as a general people; for besides Spence's arguments (or the reviewer's) all amendments are provided to be made by three-fourths of the States—not of the people. Our Constitution, however, is not only not understood by foreigners, but not even by ourselves, except in rare instances. It is founded upon "the consent of the governed," as expressed in the Declaration of Independence. What governed? Not the people of the United States, for there was no United States at the time; only thirteen sovereign States, who appointed—what? why a mutual agency with certain limited powers, not an arbitrary Government. The right of withdrawal of any of these constituent States was neither conceded nor retained in terms. This might make the right of Secession a matter of doubt, perhaps; and behold, on a matter of doubt the North institutes a war against the South!!—and this in the nineteenth century—and by a people professedly extra moral, enlightened, and religious. But further, the Constitution has no penal clause against a State that secedes, even if it were refused by that instrument—no specific power of coercion or punishment; and the States were too careful to grant only specific powers to leave anything to inference. And behold, upon the double inference merely that the Constitution forbids secession and allows coercion, the Government, institutes a fratricidal war, instead of "considering a clear case for compromise, or friendly separation. But it is argued that the Constitution provides for the punishment of treason or rebellion. So it does, as regards those appertaining to the Government, such as its soldiers, sailors, employés, &c., as well as all citizens disowned by their respective States. But can a sovereign State be a traitor to its own agent—which it helped to make, and endowed with limited powers? But further, all States have full control over their own citizens, beyond the powers granted to the general Government. The most important, that of life and death and all internal management, exists with the State. She is, to all intents and purposes, a limited sovereign, as is the general Government. Hence, she says to the latter, "hands off my people, you cannot meddle with my citizens while under my ægis, you must face me as a sovereign State duly organized as such, and secured by the Constitution." This is a dilemma, indeed,—but it is the fault of the Constitution, not of those who avail themselves of its defects to withdraw, or do any other act not expressly denied in the document. The effect was just this, as probably intended. We had a Government strong enough, under consent of the governed, but too weak when force became desirable towards its constituents. No coercive power to restrain or punish was conceded by the sovereign States to their limited agent. But "as we made our bed so ought we to lie in it;" and our Constitution, weak or otherwise, abided by; but not only has it been violated in these doubtful points, but in actual provisions, habeas corpus, right of speech, and the press, war measures, &c., to say nothing of all political consistency. Says Mr. Lincoln, in his inaugural address—"Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always, and when, after much loss on both sides, and no gain on either, you cease fighting, the identical questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon us."

And this is the man that in one short month proceeds to violate his own theory and the Constitution. But the real causes of the war on the part of the North lie beneath the clap-trap surface of patriotism and maintenance of the Union. They are three:—Firstly, if not mainly the spoils, the stupendous plunder arising from the control of thousands of millions under war expenditure. Secondly, the secure and permanent establishment of the protective system, for ever under a tremendous debt, and necessary war taxation. Thirdly, the war is intended to keep hold of the slave chain; does this stirle? Why, where have all the permanent profits of slave labour existed for the last thirty years? What has added spindle to spindle, ship to ship, dollar to dollar, and aggregated the wealth and capital of the thrifty North, which has, in fact, had the kernel, while the South has had but the mere shell of slave labour? why it takes a thousand ships to carry cotton alone. Was the North, then, ready that any foreign Power should step in and control the stupendous profits of slavery,—supply the South at a low-tariff with all her needs, and take all her productions under a favourable treaty? No, indeed, and poor well-meaning Lincoln was soon overwhelmed by this trinitarian power; nor, perhaps, in all the annals of war have three such powerfully selfish motives ever been brought into action at once. Ponder upon this and let the British public know the real causes of this abominable war—this trinity of motives.

The next letter, from Philadelphia, is from a large and influential mercantile firm to their English correspondents:—

PHILADELPHIA, May 6, 1862.

Since our letter of the 8th ult. relative to the position of affairs, several events of a military character have occurred. We have had the severe battle of Shiloh, in which the Union loss is now officially acknowledged at 11,000 killed, wounded, and missing; and the result of which has been to check the forward movement of the Western army, notwithstanding the concentration of all disposable forces in that quarter. Fort Pulaski has been captured, while Savannah remains unattacked, and we have also the capture of Fort Macon, which is not a very important position. There have been some skirmishes, with varied successes, in Tennessee, Northern Alabama, and North Carolina. In Virginia the principal event has been the evacuation of Yorktown by the Confederates, at which point they had kept at bay General McClellan, with his entire command, for nearly six weeks. Opinions are divided as to the result of this movement, although we are inclined to adhere to the views expressed in our letter of the 8th ult., that the military policy of the Confederates may lead to their evacuation of Virginia, and their retirement to the Cotton States, where they may maintain their stand during the approaching summer, and they will probably have some 350,000 men under arms. But that which is regarded as the most important event is the successful passage of the Mississippi River to New Orleans, by a portion of the United States' naval forces running the gauntlet of the forts below, which were, and to our latest advices are, still held by the Confederates, and which has placed the city under control of the former. The advices thus far received are very meagre and unsatisfactory, but generally concurring as to the destruction of the cotton, tobacco, and other staples. We think the maintenance of this occupation somewhat dependent upon further military operations now in progress.

Inasmuch as all that has occurred was not only looked for by the writer, but even greater military results expected, we have no reason to change the views we have heretofore expressed as to the course of matters. Nothing has yet happened to affect the masses of the Southern people, beyond fortifying their determination of resistance, by increase of bitterness and exasperation.

The only announcement which the French Minister has felt at liberty to make publicly in connection with his recent visit to Richmond, is his conviction of their persistent resistance, relying in the last resort on the vastness of their territory, and the impracticability of holding it under military occupation. The hot weather is now rapidly approaching, and our Northern unacclimated soldiers will have to endure the trying test of the summer season in a calamitous climate, whose dreadful diseases will prove as powerful an ally for the Southerner as the winter winds for the Russian, under somewhat similar circumstances. Thus there are considerations which serve to counterbalance the advantages recently obtained.

It is now understood that there can and will be no resumption of unrestricted commercial relations with the seceded States whilst the war is in its present position. The Government have announced their intention to permit limited shipment to and from some of the ports, but under restrictions that will probably neutralize the permission. The reason is obvious. If the planters can obtain supplies, the war would never cease. We think that any hope of the early receipt of cotton may be abandoned, for if the Government were even disposed to open any of the Southern ports in their possession without restriction, so long as the interior of the Cotton States is held by the Confederates, the cotton will either be withheld, or if likely to fall into the power of the United States' forces, it will be destroyed. We, therefore, see no other prospect than the virtual stoppage of the cotton machinery of Europe, and the necessity of the consideration, on your side of the water, of the best means of providing for the unemployed millions who are dependent upon it.

MOBILE, April 15, 1862.

I have before me your valued lines of the 6th January, handed to me by Mr. —. This gentlemen, having for a few days since. The salt I have sold deliverable from the ship's side at 12 dollars per sack. The soap I hope to dispose of at 25 cents per lb. The bagging is nominally worth 25 cents per yard; but as our planters, in view of the continued recognition of an illegal and inefficient blockade by foreign Powers, are only planting a very small space of ground in cotton, the demand is somewhat slow for the article.

I have suggested to Mr. —, seeing how high rates of exchange are, the propriety of investing all proceeds of sales in cotton, to be held until shipment can be made with safety. All such purchases I would place under the protection of the British flag, with a certificate from the consul that it is British property, as a guarantee from molestation in the event of invasion.

There is a large crop on the plantations of last year's growth, but wherever the enemy approaches the torch is applied, owners preferring that their property should be utterly destroyed rather than stolen.

It would be impossible to enter into particulars at this time about our domestic affairs; suffice it, therefore, to say, the Southern people are firm in their determination to be free, or to perish in the attempt; and although some reverses have been met with, the Northern people are farther from accomplishing what they took in hand than they were when they first commenced the war twelve months since.

Cotton on plantation, sells at 5 to 7 cents per lb.; on the spot, 8 to 9 cents.

Sir,—I give you below some extracts from a letter I have recently received from a relative in the Confederate States of America, which will show the firm determination of the Southern people to win their independence, in spite of all the reverses they may meet with from the Federalists.

Speaking of the State of Georgia, he says:—

"A recent requisition was made on this State, by the Confederate Government, for twelve regiments, in response to which twenty have volunteered, and when they get off we shall have seventy regiments in the field. You can scarcely have an idea of the enthusiasm which pervades the whole country, and now that we have been successful in getting in from abroad what we most wanted, you need have no fear that we will be subjugated, although the insane madness of our enemies may protract the struggle to the bitter end, and bring upon themselves an hopeless state of insolvency. It seems strange to me that England, who is so largely their creditor, does not see this, and try to arrest a war, which, besides the most ruinous effects upon her trade and commerce, must cause her capitalists to be such heavy losers in the depreciation or worthlessness of the American securities they hold. England, usually so wise, so far-seeing, has, I fear, temporarily fallen into the hands of a fatal abolition clique (which we call here the "Exeter Hall Cabal") that will not give up the idea that the present move is to result in the abolition of slavery, to accomplish which they would ruin one of the fairest portions of the earth; degrade the slaves from Christianity to heathendom, and all its degrading vices; and destroy one of the main elements of the prosperity of England—the supply of cotton; on which so large a portion of her population depend for labour and subsistence."

"You are no doubt much annoyed by the false reports and rumours which you get through the Herald, and other leading New York papers, sent out for effect upon the people of England and France. They often manufacture and send out the most arrant lies, for which there is not a shadow of foundation; and when they refer to things which have occurred, they magnify their own temporary advantages and detract from ours."

"The capture of Fort Donnellson was one of the dearest bought victories which ever occurred. Our loss was about 7000 prisoners, and 1500 killed and wounded, while theirs is variously estimated at 6000 to 7000 killed and wounded. Such fighting was never heard of before; their dead were piled up five and six deep in some places on the field. Our men fought against the greatest disparity of numbers, and never gave up till they were utterly exhausted with four days' hard fighting, and fresh reinforcements came up against them. I think this victory (as they call it) has produced the most chilling effect on the North of anything that has occurred during the war; and, although they now hold possession of Kentucky, and part of West Tennessee, including Nashville, yet they find no sympathy with the inhabitants; and as soon as they attempt to move away from the rivers and the support of their gunboats, I think they will be cut up and suffer utter defeat. Be assured the public sentiment here is, that there never can be any reconstruction or further union between the North and South. Nor do we believe that all the power they can ever bring can subjugate a people who are determined that the bones of themselves and their wives and children shall bleach on the soil of their own sunny clime, before they will ever yield to their detestable invaders."

Such, Mr. Editor, are the sentiments expressed by one who is old in years and experience—who has a large stake in the welfare of his country—who has been at all times "a man of peace;" and yet he is now willing that this most unnatural war should be waged even to the bitter end, rather than again come under that Constitution of which the Northerners are so fond for others, although they themselves have broken it over and over again. How long will it be ere the reflecting men of the North begin to see that the conquest of the South is impossible? How long will the Christian nations of Europe stand with folded arms and see fellow Christians shedding each others blood; and for what? As Earl Russell very properly said, some months ago, "for independence on the one side, conquest on the other." And are our starving millions to perish while this is being decided by the dreadful ordeal of the sword? God forbid! Surely it is now high time for the might of England and France to step forward, and say to the troubled and bloody waters of fratricidal strife, "Peace, be still; the world can no longer look on in horror at such a spectacle of brothers rushing at each others throats. We can no longer allow our cotton operatives to stand idle, our ships to rot at the wharves, our trade and commerce to be paralyzed, merely that you should go on sacrificing both life and wealth for no practicable purpose; so, 'Uncle Sam,' if you cannot persuade 'Cousin Sallie' to come back into your loving arms by more gentle means than you are now trying, you must let her go to seek her fortune in her own way, and we will act as her 'chaperons' when she is first introduced as an independent nation of the earth."

Would not such a course of action be true wisdom in the end? J. S. H.

Forest Hill, 19th May, 1862.

A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, who accompanied General Mitchell, writes from Huntsville, dated April 24, as follows:—"The people here, as at all points this side of Nashville, Shelbyville excepted, are seceded. Many are despondent, and admit our superior strength and their hopeless condition, but the majority feel and talk fight. I have sounded their sentiments, and assure you that there is nothing left in their organization, mental or other, friendly to the Union cause or betraying aught that speaks of love for American institutions. In the mistaken notions the Northern people entertain relative to the feeling of their misguided (?) brethren in the South, their thoughts are second to the wish. Let the North become reconciled to the fact that, in order to restore the Union as it was, the South must be subjugated, and act accordingly."

Foreign Correspondence.

WASHINGTON, May 6th, (by Persia.)

The great event that has happened since I last wrote you, has been the evacuation of Yorktown by the Confederates. I have advised you, for some time past, that McClellan was making his approach to these works in regular siege form, and that, with his superior artillery, he would be able to destroy them whenever his preparations were completed. It appears that there was a council of war early last week, at which General Lee and other principal generals were present, and the result of which was a determination to fall back. The retirement was, therefore, commenced about the middle of the week, and the entire army, said to consist of not less than 70,000 men, successfully withdrew, without the loss of a man, leaving behind them their heavy siege guns, some ammunition, and some camp equipage and stores. The Union troops, early on Sunday morning, found the works deserted, and immediately entered and occupied them, finding in the town of Yorktown but four inhabitants, and they were negroes. McClellan immediately despatched the news by the wires, and closed his despatch by stating that "he was in rapid pursuit of the enemy," whom he intended to "push to the wall." His advancing columns soon reached their proposed destination. They came up to the rear-guard of the Confederates on Sunday afternoon, were met, and repulsed with considerable loss, and left a cannon as a trophy to the Confederates. Our last advices are up to Monday morning, when the Union troops were evidently awaiting the arrival of reinforcements, preparatory to further demonstrations. The point at which McClellan's advance was checked was about two miles in front of Williamsburg. It has been stated that the Confederates had erected considerable defences at this point, but we have no positive knowledge of it. I do not think that it is their design to make any considerable stand at this place. The necessity of their evacuation of the Yorktown defences had not only become imperative from the probability of their destruction by the Union gunboats; but with the menacing columns of McDowell and Banks approaching on the north and west of Richmond, it became highly important that the lines of the Confederates, so widely extended, should be concentrated; and above all, it was necessary that the line of retreat across the James River should be held and kept open, if a defeat or other reasons rendered it necessary to abandon Richmond. It may finally be determined to retire into North Carolina, holding the army as nearly as possible intact; but I think it is barely possible that Virginia will be evacuated, except after at least one battle. Virginia has done so much for the Confederates, that the men from the Cotton States would scarcely desert her, unless it was rendered judicious and proper for the ultimate success of their cause. I have no doubt, that it may be contemplated to adopt, however, the Fabian policy, and throw upon the United States forces, the necessity of following into the low latitudes during the approaching summer months. The general impression is, evidently that the evacuation is a Federal advantage, and many people look forward to the occupation of Richmond within a few days, but there are a few who consider the withdrawal of the Confederate army, with a mere trifling loss of heavy siege guns, as a gain to them, and that McClellan has been out-generalled. Be this as it may, McClellan must and will, without doubt, press forward, and unless it be the design of the Confederates to abandon Virginia, there will be a great battle, which must necessarily take place within a few days, and may, perhaps, be transpiring even while I write. Upon examination of the works at Gloucester, opposite Yorktown, on the York River, it was found that they could easily have been carried, and it was probably the knowledge of this that caused the Confederates to risk nothing further by occupying a position which was not only becoming untenable, but really very hazardous. McClellan is said to have sent up the York River a considerable force by transports, which will probably land at West Point, but, of course, the Confederates will be prepared to meet them if necessary. We have nothing further from either McDowell's or Banks' columns, but I do not doubt they are quietly moving forward.

There was an engagement a few days ago near Corinth, with advantage to the Federals, but it was not very important. Halleck's army is now undoubtedly moving forward, and unless Beauregard also designs to withdraw from Corinth, there must be a battle at this point. It is very possible that the occupation of New Orleans may change the determination and plans of Beauregard, and I should not be surprised if he quietly retired, and held his forces ready to combine at a future day with the Eastern army, should it fall back into the Cotton States. From New Orleans we have not had anything of an official character.

The Confederates have sustained a considerable loss in the capture of two steamers, the Bermuda and Ellis Worsley (Isabel), containing munitions of war; almost as serious to them as the loss of a battle. I should not be surprised if some trouble was created by the Bermuda affair, as she was sailing under British colours, and on her voyage from Liverpool to Nassau; and was captured off the British Island of Abaco. Great Britain will be likely to make a fuss about it.

Money is getting to be a perfect drug—loans on call made at 4 per cent.; this is nothing more or less than the beginning of the experience of the inflation of the currency. Gold is rising—3½ is now the rate, and sterling has advanced to 114; and the bankers think that, no matter whether we have peace or war, the rate will go higher.

I have just seen an announcement in the New York Herald that the Forts St. Philip and Jackson, below the city of New Orleans, had been taken, or had surrendered. I do not think it comes in an authentic shape, but it is very possible.

PARIS, May 20th, 1862.

The friendly disposition of the French Government towards the Confederate States, as resolved in the Constitutionnel, "Conciliation, Mediation," far from having been checked by the fall of New Orleans and the retreat of the Confederate army from Yorktown, those events seem, on the contrary, to strengthen more and more the determination of the Emperor to offer his friendly mediation to the belligerent parties, and if rejected, to enforce it with the whole military and naval power of France.

I have stated, in one of my preceding letters, that I could have told you much more upon the subject had I felt at liberty to do so. Well, the truth, the whole truth, may as well be divulged now to the people of England, and, indeed, the time has fully arrived when it should be known without further reticence, so that the responsibility of the present European distress may attach precisely where it should.

I am at liberty to state this day, on the most undoubted authority, that, since the fall of New Orleans into the Federal hands, the Emperor has renewed his former propositions to the English Cabinet to recognize the Southern Confederacy; and, if necessary to put an end to this war, to combine a joint armed intervention. I am further informed, from the same source, that the strong, urgent, and repeated appeals of the French Cabinet have so far met with no response whatever from Lord John Russell, notwithstanding the universality of sympathy which has been so unmistakably shown by the English people in favour of the recognition of the Confederate States.

A letter of much significance from an intimate friend of Mr. Seward to a gentleman of high respectability, has been received lately, and as its contents are quite germane to the subject matter of this letter, I think they will prove acceptable to your readers, for they fully disclose the well-matured policy intended to be pursued by the United States' Government with regard to the existing state of things on the American continent.

The Government of Washington (says this letter) has no idea whatever of putting up with the violation of the Monroe doctrine by France and Spain. It has been elevated to the height of a political dogma for more than half a century, and shall not be permitted by the United States to be permanently disturbed. For the present, we have our hands full with the crushing of the Southern rebellion, and cannot give to the Mexican affairs the peculiar attention they are entitled to. But the rebellion once smothered, and the South organized into military territories under our dominion, it is the settled determination of this Government to pour into Mexico all the necessary forces to drive out instantly the European invaders. It is the firm purpose of President Lincoln to make Napoleon III. understand at once, that if the koozes who reign in Europe have been pleased thus far to kneel down at his feet, the Mexican and American Republics feel neither inclined nor disposed to bow to his would-be power and might; much less to permit even the supposition of his being capable to establish any sort of supremacy over the destinies of this continent. The United States' Government has, therefore, resolved to check, in the meantime, the progress of the French troops; with this view it furnishes now 250,000 dollars per diem to President Juarez to keep up an army equal to that task.

As to Cuba, we will make a quick work of it as soon as we are ready, and it is well for England she has had the good sense to withdraw her troops from Mexico.

This letter produced quite a sensation, while some regarded it as one of the vain boasts so familiar to Northern arrogance. The better informed diplomatists seemed, on the contrary, inclined to consider it well worthy the close scrutiny of the European Cabinets. They emphatically declared it to be their earnest conviction that the demagogues who held the power in the United States had construed the unintelligible patience of Europe into fear, and that unless it decided to put down the insolence of the United States, they would certainly involve the whole of Europe in a general war before many months elapse.

One of them unhesitatingly asserted that Mr. Seward had, during the whole of his political career, advocated the wresting of Canada from England; that all the filibustering expeditions had been gotten up by Northern capitalists, whose thirst for new territories had led them to consider Mexico, Cuba, and Canada as properties merely placed in trust in the possession of their respective Governments, for the ultimate use and benefit of the United States; that he thought it impossible for the North to conquer the South, especially more so to keep it subdued, if ever conquered; but that he had no earthly doubt that if his speculations, with regard to the issue now pending between the North and South, proved erroneous, then, in that case, the North, infatuated with its recent military achievements, would certainly take advantage of the present warlike dispositions of the American people to overrun Mexico and Canada.

In making all due allowances for the well-known exaggerations of Northern politicians, their long-cherished hope of extending their undisputed dominion over the whole American continent, the confidential relations existing between the writer of this letter and the United States' Secretary of State, everything tends to confirm the supposition, that it is the settled purpose of the present Cabinet to make a bold stroke to carry this plan through. Indeed, it is not at all improbable that the Secretary of the Treasury has already thought of alleviating the burden of taxation, so bitterly complained of at the North, by appropriating the fertile territories of Mexico to the payment of the United States' bonds.

It remains to be seen how far these plans of the United States' Cabinet will agree with those which, for a few days past, are currently attributed to the Emperor Napoleon.

If, as it seems to be generally accredited in Paris, the Emperor has made up his mind to endow France with the magnificent old kingdom of Montezuma, he who has boldly torn the treaty of 1815 in the face of all the European Powers is not likely to suffer his plans to be thwarted by the Munroe Doctrine.

If we can give credence to the London Times, one very important point is gained. Far from having any opposition to fear from England, this policy of the Emperor meets with its cordial and unreserved approbation.

PARIS, May 20, 1862.

The telegraphic transmission of political news has deeply modified the mechanism and the condition of existence of the newspapers. Now-a-days any important political news instantly runs over the wires through the whole of Europe, and is almost simultaneously spread in all the newspapers of the Continent. The over-busy reader throws a hasty glance over the telegrams; and believes himself sufficiently informed; but those who enjoy some leisure hours are not altogether satisfied with this smattering of news, their eager curiosity requires some further explanations, needs some few commentaries, and wishes to be made acquainted with the details accompanying the main facts. This last class of readers can hardly be reconciled to the conciseness of a telegraphic despatch, which always leaves behind much to be gleaned.

Inasmuch as you feel disposed to open THE INDEX to my letters, I will endeavour to bring home to you the rumours of the week, the general preoccupation of the day, and the impression produced by such or such a fact. I will observe, and tell you the result of my observations just as they present themselves to my mind, and without any pretension whatever to style. I will write to you as to a distant friend who feels an interest in knowing all that is going on in this great capital of the world. I expect my letter to be considered by your readers as a more friendly gossip with them.

Having thus exposed my programme, I come to the facts.

Italy, as you are aware continues to draw the close attention of the public, and of political men. A recent event has just disappointed the hopes of the go-ahead party—I allude to Garibaldi's project of invading the Tyrol and Illyria. The Government of the King Victor Emmanuel found it necessary to check this movement, though prepared by its own friends, on account of the remonstrances of the French Government. The Emperor Napoleon entirely disregards all the clamouring in favour of the Italian revolution, and has no idea whatever of being led into any such wild and ridiculous adventures. With regard to the Roman question, the newspapers are filled with the most absurd speculations. The rumour that France had advised the Pope to flee from Rome is a ridiculous canard. The Emperor ignores it knowing that such an astounding event would very seriously affect the strength of his own Government.

The French newspapers, which are subservient to the Italian cause, mistaking their aspirations and desires for realities, constantly announce, as accomplished, facts which they are soon compelled to contradict. The visit of Prince Napoleon was to be followed by the immediate evacuation of Rome; the momentary return of General de Goyon to Paris was a recall. What did these rumours amount to? Nothing but the instructive fact that it is a safe rule to guard one's self against the news and erroneous interpretations set in circulation by interested friends.

A fact which would certainly have provoked a great excitement in England, seems to pass here quite unnoticed. After a verdict discharging M. Mires of all the charges brought against him, he (M. Mires) responding to a spontaneous call of all the stockholders who had been made to suffer from the illegal proceedings of the Court of Paris, consented to take charge of the caisse des chemins de fer. He instantly set to work to retrieve the losses experienced by them in consequence of his detention. As fortunate as ever, M. Mires succeeded at once in a negotiation to procure a loan for the Austrian Government. He opened a subscription to raise the capital required. But as soon as M. Mires attempted to make the fact known through the newspapers, an order was issued by the Government to forbid the insertion of his advertisements, and this without any due notice given to Mires, or any legal reason alleged against this banking operation. Notwithstanding the numerous reports maliciously spread to injure his personal character, M. Mires is unquestionably endowed with great financial talents, powerful energy, and many noble qualities, which have secured him a large number of warm and devoted friends. He has immediately called for redress, and will no doubt obtain it at the hands of the proper authorities.

Two newspapers, the Temps and the Pays, have of late been engaged in personal quarrels of the most deplorable character. Abuses have been exchanged between their chief editors, provocations ensued, ink was very freely used, but not a drop of blood was spilt. After a great deal of talk and fuss, the antagonists finally came to an amicable settlement of their impending difficulties; the only true victims being the subscribers, who were deprived of their usual editorials for a whole week. However, it is generally thought that M. Granguiollot carried the day.

Instead of being detrimental to Paris, as it might have been supposed, the London Exhibition seems to prove extremely beneficial to the capital of France. Indeed, it has become the halting place of all the strangers who are on their way to England. They are daily met examining the beauties of the new Paris of Napoleon the Third, as though they were preparing their eyes to admire the better the industrial splendour of Kensington Palace. Said-Pacha, the Vice-King of Egypt, is now enjoying the royal hospitality of the Tuileries. Mahomed Eli Sadock, the Bey of Tunis, is expected in Paris next month. Both are said to be travelling through Europe for the purpose of forwarding their recognition as independent sovereigns. It is even asserted that France is just as well disposed towards them as it is towards the Confederate States of America; but I fear their projects will meet with no little obstacles on the part of England.

As you may well suppose, the American war is the all engrossing topic of the day. Paris may be said to be divided in two camps; but if by some the Confederates are thought to be inferior in number, they are generally considered the bravest, the most chivalrous, the best marshalled, and especially the most honest and trustworthy, of the two contending parties. Indeed, I heard a gentleman, indignant at the monstrous abuse made of the telegraph wires by the North, say, that it was a very fortunate thing the Transatlantic cable had broken, for long ere this the poor Southerners would all be thought killed and buried.

Not being a military man, I can form no precise idea of the bearing which the fall of New Orleans and the retreat from Yorktown may have upon the final issue of the war, therefore I can but give you the impression produced by these two events upon the French generals. They unhesitatingly pronounce it to be their opinion that the Southern generals are actually playing with the would-be American Napoleon as a man would with a child. One thing is certain, however, our commercial men are getting more than tired of this protracted state of things, and cordially wish Lincoln was out of this world's way.

Thalberg, the grand and celebrated pianist, who for the last ten years had kept himself sequestered from the musical world, has lately given four concerts, which have been attended by a numerous crowd of amateurs. He has been as brilliant as ever. Thalberg will soon be on his way to England, where he intends to give a series of concerts in honour of the Exhibition.

A subscription has just been opened to build a monument to consecrate the memory of Halcyon. The amount required is 40,000 francs. The Emperor has headed the list with 3000 francs, and Pereire has offered 2000 francs. The full amount is expected to be made up by the end of this week.

P. B.

ST. THOMAS, W.I., April 29th.

Political news you will of course not expect from me. Whatever of this kind I could send must necessarily be but a faint and inaccurate repetition of what has reached you long before in a more valuable form. We frequently receive letters and newspapers from the South, and in future I shall endeavour to send you such as come into my possession.

We look upon the signal victory achieved by the Confederate troops at Corinth, as an effectual check to any movement of the Federals for some time to come, though Halleck is concentrating the whole of his army for the purpose. Before he can get ready the hot weather will have fairly set in, and even without Beanregard in his way, he could not reach the Gulf without enormous suffering and much loss. Several Southerners have passed through here on their way to Havana, and to Bermuda or Nassau. — and — have both got safely in. All whom I conversed with, as well as all the friends of the South here, are hopeful of a termination of the war before the next business season opens. Meanwhile, however, a great portion of last year's crop will be destroyed, and but a scanty crop will be made this year to replace the loss. —, who arrived a few weeks ago, is positive that wholesale burning of cotton is absolutely certain, and says that throughout the country only small patches of cotton were being planted when he left. The plantations near the Georgia and Carolina coasts are, for the most part, wholly abandoned, and in Alabama and Mississippi the planters are of one mind as regards what they think their true policy.

Vessels are arriving daily at Havana from Confederate ports. Two steamers, the Circassian and Minbro, arrived safely from your side, and, having coaled, cleared for Havana. Others are expected.

Please direct the attention of your friends to the important use which could be made of this island in this respect, and concerning which I will write you privately.

Tonnage is at present scarce. Last engagements were at £4 10s., £4 10s. 6d., for direct ports in the United Kingdom; £4 12s. 6d., £4 15s. for the Continent. For Federal ports, 3 dols. per 110 gallons molasses, and 3 dols. 7½ cents. per 100 lbs. of sugar, are about the current rates.

Exchanges—Sterling 90: day bills, 475 to 477½.

SOUTHERN PROSPECTS.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

THE marvellous profusion of sensation paragraphs, telegrams, prophecies, and congratulations poured forth, without stint or effort, by the New York papers, reminds one more of the legerdemain of Houdin, than any other modern work of art. When out of a hat he produces tons of feathers, strips of coloured paper, and heaven knows what besides, one stands aghast at the immensity of the production. And such is about the position of most Englishmen at reading all the information presented to us, with an amazing volubility, by the only records of late events in the seceding States which the autocracy of Washington allows to reach these shores. It is almost impossible for a plain sober-minded man impartially to weigh and consider all this weight of matter. But when sifted, it appears to me to amount to this,—that Mr. Jefferson Davis has merely continued the programme which he announced some two months ago, the soundness and discretion of which met with hearty approbation from all well-judging politicians, viz., that the Confederates had attempted too large a plan for their resources, and must concentrate their energies for a more powerful action. Had there been any symptoms of terror or submission the case would have been widely different, but it is clearly the reverse. According to the invariable rule of human nature, partial defeat has made the South more determined to fight. But it having been proved to demonstration, that wherever their enemies can bring gunboats to bear upon a field of battle, success is hopeless in their present dearth of similar appliances to counterbalance this overwhelming power, the only course open to the Southern generals is to remove their forces to such positions as will preclude this action; and this has evidently been done under the advice, and with the concurrence of the ablest men, the sole exception being General Magruder, whose gallantry and eager desire to meet his foe may, we trust, ere long be rewarded upon a field where the chances are more even. Strategically speaking, the fall of New Orleans weakens the Federals. It must be kept by a large garrison, and that under circumstances which are likely to prove it no easy tenure. What its commercial value may be, it is impossible to tell, but it does not seem probable that the resources of the country, behind and above, will be forthcoming to load the vessels its reopening under the Federal auspices is supposed to give the means of recalling to its deserted wharves. The evacuation of the lines of Yorktown means nothing more than a very sensible refusal to meet McClellan at a position where his command of the sea would give him incalculable odds in his favour. As to moral effect, that is all rubbish. Does any one of the authorities assert that the South is cowed? Is there the slightest evidence of slackness of hatred on the part of the Southerners against the invader? On the contrary, is not the natural result of all these towns shelled or captured, the compulsory burning of their property, and the slaughter of fathers, husbands, and sons, bearing fruit in undying hostility against the mercenaries who are unconstitutionally forcing a detested rule upon a free and gallant people.

It is now some twelve months ago that some hundred gentlemen, in defiance of law, were arrested in the Border

States, and committed to prison for alleged treason against the United States' Government. Time after time, promises, threats, and cruelties have been lavished upon them. It is certain that the simple taking of the oath of allegiance would open their prison doors at once. Have any of them taken it? And if individuals so sorely tried can be constant, surely States in arms, free on their own desecrated soil, and fighting for their wives and daughters, as well as for the freedom of their native homes, are not likely to betray their sacred trust. I have somewhere seen the war described, on the part of the South, as a war of passion. It may be so; but to my mind it is more a war of principle, and when the two are combined it becomes a war of religion, and the history of mankind shows of what men are capable when fighting under such inducements. But there is another consideration which has not yet found its way to the public mind. In one of my early letters which you did me the honour of publishing, I called attention to the justification, on the ground of public safety, of the monstrous overriding of the courts of law by Mr. Secretary Seward and the muzzling of justice by his bare dictum, and drew the comparison of his tyranny to that awful prototype, the Committee of Public Safety of Paris, whose action he is imitating. There are other parallels in the case, which Europe would do well to lay to heart before it is too late.

Like France, the United States have sown the dragon's teeth, and armed myriads have risen to her call. Like France, she has created an enormous issue of assignats upon an imaginary security; what reason is there for supposing that different results should follow in the case of North America from those which deluged Europe with blood, and cost France a million and a half of the best lives of her children? Granted the complete subjugation and conquest of the South, what will the North do with their million of soldiers? They have already told us—Canada is to be overrun—Cuba and the West India Islands are to be wrested from their worn-out despotisms—Mexico is to be annexed—and not a single vestige of monarchy is to be left on the soil of North America. No doubt the Monroe doctrine is to be reasserted to the courts of Europe, backed by the argument of a million of trained soldiers. And as to the payment of these gentlemen there is but one argument, Ve victis. Thank God, things are not come to this yet, and, in my opinion, are not likely to do so! The Southern armies have never yet been beaten at fair odds, they have beaten their enemies everywhere, and on every occasion, where the naval superiority of the Northerners did not give the military an overwhelming advantage. The Southern councils are united and silent. We all remember the old sentiment of the great war of the beginning of this century, C'est affreux le silence des Anglais. It may be reproduced.

AN ENGLISH SYMPATHIZER.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune gives the following particulars of an interview between Captain John Morgan, and the Federal General Buell, at Nashville:—It seems that Captain Morgan, having learned that General Buell had determined to hang four of his men as outlaws, who had been taken prisoners in his memorable scout of March 8th, he proceeded with a flag of truce and ten of his men to Nashville. On his way he met General Mitchell, with a large force of the enemy's cavalry, and to whom he made his object known. Mitchell said he was just going out to search for Morgan, and regretted to meet with him under the protection of a flag of truce. Morgan, with a meaning look not to be misunderstood, assured the Federal General that no one more than himself shared his regret and his disappointment, and hoped that an opportunity would soon offer of meeting him under more favourable circumstances. Mitchell then gave Morgan an escort, and accompanied him to Buell's headquarters. Buell was greatly surprised at a meeting with the bold partisan face to face, and evincing no little uneasiness, asked to what circumstances he was indebted for the honour of this visit. Morgan replied that his errand was a Christian one; that he had been informed that General Buell had threatened to hang four of his men who had been taken prisoners, as outlaws, in violation of the rules of war and civilization; that he had thirty-six Federal prisoners in his possession, and that, if such was Buell's determination, he should retaliate by hanging nine Federals for every one of his men. Buell disclaimed any such intention, and said he should never violate the usages of civilized warfare. Morgan then proposed an exchange of the thirty-six Federal prisoners for his four men, saying that the difference in numbers was but a fair valuation of the services of his brave troopers. Buell replied that he was compelled to decline the offer, as he could not negotiate with an officer inferior to him in rank. "That is unfortunate, sir," replied Morgan, "as the objection could not hold good in any other sense;" and the interview then terminated.

The Memphis Avante has intelligence from Nashville, that, on the reception of Lincoln's Message to Congress on the subject of emancipation, nineteen Federal officers resigned their commissions, and returned home.

Wendell Phillips, the chief Anti-Slavery orator, made a speech in New York, on May 6, in which he said:—"I have a letter at home, which I will read to-night, from a man in Missouri. He says:—Your armies have driven out the armies of Secession in Missouri; you think you have done the work; but you are mistaken. There is no freedom of speech here. Three of my acquaintances have been killed for the expression of loyal sentiments. A man entered my store and shot my own clerk. I dare not walk the streets at all for fear of assassins."

MARKET VALUE OF SOUTHERN SECURITIES;

Prepared from the New York Stock Quotations.*

SOUTHERN STATE AND CITY SECURITIES.

DESCRIPTION OF SECURITIES.	Amounts out- standing.	Interest.		Principal pay- able.	Offered, per cent.	Asked, per cent.
		Rate.	Payable.
STATE LOANS.
Alabama—Coupon Bonds	3,423,000	5	May and Nov.	1877
Arkansas—Coupon Bonds	1,471,000	6	} In de- fault. {	1868
Georgia—Coupon Bonds	38,000	5		1868
" ..	525,000	7	"	Var.	63	64
" ..	2,073,750	6	"	Var.	74	80
Kentucky—Coupon Bonds	4,879,244	6	"	'68-'72	87	90
" (bank)	600,000	5	"	18..
Louisiana—Coupon Bonds	2,064,300	6	May and Nov.	Var.	68	70
" (banks)	5,398,533	6	"	Var.
" (railroads) ..	2,447,000	6	"	Var.
Maryland—Inscribed Certificates ..	5,064,251	6	Quarterly.	Var.	100	100
" (sterling) ..	8,857,222	5	"	Var.
Mississippi—Coupon Bonds	2,000,000	6	In def. si. '39	'41-'71
Missouri—Coupon Bonds	100,000	6	April and Oct.	1862
" ..	439,000	6	Jan. and July.	'63-'83
" Coupon (RR.) Bonds ..	23,101,000	6	"	'72-'86	52½	53
North Carolina—Coupon Bonds ..	9,129,555	6	Jan. and July.	1872
" ..		6	"	1883	69	70
" ..		6	"	1886
South Carolina—Inscribed Certificates	1,708,017	6	Jan. and July.	'68-'90	50	55
" Coupon Bonds (sterlg)	484,444	5	"	1868
" (capitol)	500,000	6	"	1886
" (RR.) ..	1,310,000	6	"	1877	55½	58
Tennessee—Coupon Bonds (banks) ..	1,125,000	5	Jan. and July.
" (capitol) ..	608,000	5	"
" (in. impmt.) ..	2,063,606	5	"
" (Hermitage)	48,000	6	"
" (RR.) ..	12,193,000	6	"	..	58½	58¾
" War Loan (1861)
Virginia—Inscribed Certificates ..	18,758,642	5	Jan. and July.
" ..	12,624,500	6	"	..	40	48
" Coupon Bonds		6	"	'85-'93	60	61
" (sterling) ..	1,865,000	5	"	1892
CITY LOANS.
Baltimore—Inscribed Certificates	6	Quarterly.	'70-'90	80	..
Louisville—Coupon Bonds (RR.)	6	Various.	'80-'83	70	70
" (?)	6	May and Nov.	1887
Memphis—Coupon Bonds	6	Jan. and July.
" (guaranteed)	..	6	"
New Orleans—Coupon Bonds (RR.)	6	Jan. and July.	'72-'74
" " municipal)	6	"	1892
COUNTY LOANS.
Bath (Ky.)—Coupon Bonds	6	April and Oct.	1883
Bourbon (Ky.)	6	Jan. and July.	'81-'83
Boyle (Ky.)—Coupon Bonds	6	"	1883
Clark (Ky.)—Coupon Bonds	6	April and Oct.	1883
Fayette (Ky.)—Coupon Bonds	6	Jan. and July.	'81-'83
Mason (Ky.)—Coupon Bonds	6	Jan. and July.	'81-'83
Montgomery (Ky.)—Coupon Bonds	6	April and Oct.	1883
Shelby (Tenn.)—Coupon Bonds	6	April and Nov.	1884

SOUTHERN RAILROAD BOND LIST.

DESCRIPTION OF SECURITIES.	Amount out- standing.	Rate.	INTEREST.		Principal payable.
			When Payable.	Where payable.
Alabama and Tennessee Rivers :—
1st mortgage, convertible	833,000	7	Jan. & July.	New York	1872
Louisville and Nashville :—
1st mortgage (after State lien)	2,000,000	6	Feb. & Aug.	New York	1883
Richmond and Danville :—
Mortgage, coupons	250,000	7	Feb. & Aug.	New York	1859
Mortgage, registered	150,000	7	April & Nov.	Richmond	1860
South Carolina :—
Sterling, coupon	183,333	6	..	London	1863
Sterling, coupon	2,000,000	5	1866
Virginia Central :—
1st mortgage (guaranteed by State)	100,000	6	Jan. & July	Richmond	1880
2nd mortgage, coupon	198,000	5	..	Richmond & N. Yk.	1872
3rd mortgage, coupon	926,000	6	1884
Virginia and Tennessee :—
1st mortgage (S.F.) coupon	500,000	6	..	New York	1872
2nd mortgage	1,000,000	6	1884
Income bonds	448,000	6	..	Lynchburg	1865
Wilmington and Manchester :—
1st mortgage	596,000	7	May & Nov.	New York	1866
2nd mortgage	200,000	7	1872
Wilmington and Weldon :—
Mortgage (sterling) coupon	443,555	6	..	London	1863
Bonds (sterling) issued 1858	144,000	6	1868
Bonds (endorsed by State)	150,000	6	..	New York	1876

A LIST, INCLUDING MILEAGE, ROLLING STOCK, COST OF PROPERTY, LAST YEAR'S EARNINGS, ETC.

Years Ending	Railroad.				Rolling Stock.			COMPANIES. [An asterisk (*) in the column "Rolling Stock" signifies that the cost is included in that of "Railroad." A dash (—) signifies "nil." Running dots (....) signify "not ascertained."]	Cost of Property.		Liabilities.		Earnings.		Price of Shares.
	Main Lines.	Lateral and Branch Lines.	2nd Track and Sidings.	Road in Progress or Projected.	Engines.	Cars.			Railroad and Appurtenances.	Rolling Stock.	Share Capital paid in.	Funded Debt.	Floating Debt.	Gross Earnings from all Sources.	Earnings less Current Expenses.	Dividends paid during Year.	Offered.	Asked.
						Passenger.	Freight, &c.
June 30, 1860	52	M.	M.	M.	No.	No.	No.	Alabama and Florida	1,328,996	122,340	$	577,953	$	803,500	105,255	$	101,102	37,866	p.c.	p.c.	p.c.
June 30, 1860	110	51	Alabama and Tennessee Rivers	2,261,927	184,906	1,067,006	777,777	210,485	207,626	111,232	3	5
May 31, 1860	95	..	7	Atlantic and North Carolina	2,157,503	*	1,545,225	400,000	276,372	103,953	35,572
June 30, 1860	87	16	7	124	Atlantic and West Point	1,192,389	*	1,250,000	126,000	..	418,136	265,827	8
Sept. 30, 1860	280	7	235	124	3,272	Baltimore and Ohio	21,314,042	3,604,731	13,118,902	10,781,833	566,070	3,922,203	2,305,788	6	41	..
Sept. 30, 1860	30	7	33	167	Washington Branch	1,650,000	*	1,650,000	462,880	290,840	9
Nov. 30, 1860	191	53	62	697	Central (Georgia)	4,366,800	*	4,366,800	1,715,025	764,574	29½
Mar. 31, 1860	171	61	Georgia (and Bank)	4,156,000	*	4,156,000	312,500	..	1,159,188	528,043	8
May 1, 1860	70	..	6	280	7	5	124	Houston and Texas Central	4,232,345	*	455,000	975,000	369,000	282,816	196,568
Aug. 31, 1860	207	Hannibal and St. Joseph	12,364,134	*	1,782,886	10,571,000	156,643	961,856	487,333
June 30, 1861	29	..	11	Lexington and Frankfort	591,121	52,300	514,433	130,000	..	108,914	43,268
June 30, 1861	65	..	14	..	13	10	225	Louisville and Frankfort	1,383,326	126,735	1,194,587	464,515	..	245,416	98,679	4
July 1, 1861	185	84	17	..	38	22	320	Louisville and Nashville	8,039,598	564,200	5,682,255	3,260,500	277,133	807,163	461,199
May 31, 1861	518	14	40	28	512	Mobile and Ohio	12,000,000	*	1,402,858	695,370
Feb. 29, 1860	89	28	23	14	283	Montgomery and West Point	1,838,718	427,265	1,419,769	922,622	23,579	505,156	260,269	6
June 30, 1860	272	20	20	..	43	37	672	Memphis and Charleston	5,866,578	878,069	3,809,949	2,659,000	157,730	1,635,096	873,596	4
April 30, 1860	286	25	22	336	Mississippi Central	4,966,022	756,292	2,000,961	2,551,732	895,992	584,342	1,328,692
Oct. 1, 1860	81	18	7	6	130	Mississippi and Tennessee	1,603,427	168,203	820,527	806,649	209,947	233,527	134,135
April 1, 1860	79	..	5	..	5	2	75	Norfolk and Petersburg	1,963,088	*	1,511,000	540,610	142,646	84,219	31,946
Sept. 30, 1860	104	8	North-Western Virginia	269,203	74,617
Nov. 30, 1860	151	8	44	..	39	17	319	Nashville and Chattanooga	3,632,882	*	2,056,544	1,731,000	..	734,118	337,384	6
Dec. 31, 1860	80	..	178	12	12	216	..	New Orleans, Opelousas, and Great Western ..	3,954,420	505,260	3,242,318	566,000	339,297	481,922	223,649
Feb. 28, 1861	206	..	203	45	37	513	..	New Orleans, Jackson, & Gt. Northern ..	5,570,452	1,040,729	4,500,000	2,665,000	935,717	1,232,624	555,434
Sept. 30, 1860	88	68	10	..	16	16	175	Orange and Alexandria	16,250,000	*	2,063,655	2,517,500	590,056	450,427	222,204
Dec. 31, 1860	49	11	22	120	Panama	8,000,000	*	4,976,000	2,190,238	44,900	1,550,873	1,036,132	12	121	121½
Sept. 30, 1860	141	3	12	..	28	30	418	Richmond and Danville	3,726,037	*	1,981,197	1,200,000	75,908	560,904	282,328
Dec. 31, 1860	136	106	67	50	790	South Carolina	6,911,230	1,084,260	5,819,275	2,643,833	363,688	1,499,630	701,943	7
July 31, 1860	106	101	16	..	18	22	201	South-Western	3,770,425	*	2,921,900	396,500	19,813	..	388,853	13
Sept. 30, 1860	178	..	21	7	27	19	228	Virginia Central	4,952,753	541,197	3,162,751	1,480,392	52,929	634,081	359,130	5
June 30, 1860	205	9	11	..	39	27	374	Virginia and Tennessee	5,994,259	838,475	3,452,813	3,265,600	571,958	740,489	317,957
Sept. 30, 1860	162	15	23	18	182	Wilmington and Manchester ..	2,632,737	*	1,130,470	1,045,000	51,300	469,158	219,688
Sept. 30, 1860	162	26	37	145	Wilmington and Weldon ..	2,927,129	*	1,399,860	737,555	62,135	500,269	246,494
Sept. 30, 1860	138	52	24	705	Western and Atlantic	5,901,497	*	832,347	451,411

* These quotations antedate the fall of New Orleans. They will be carefully revised from time to time: thus indicating what effect this event may have had upon the values of Southern Securities.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 22, 1862.

The War in America.

THE news of the North American is the most important that any steamer has yet brought since the outbreak of this unholy war. It proves that the Southerners made no empty threat when they declared that they would burn their property, and take their wives and children to the swamps, rather than have the appearance of even temporary submission to their Northern invaders. Along the whole line of the Mississippi up to the frontiers of the Confederate territory, and along the shores of the broad tributaries of that giant stream, the passage of the Federalist gunboats by the forts near its mouths was the signal of a universal conflagration—the parallel of which the history of the world does not afford. No one who knows the character of the Southern people ever doubted that such would be the reception in store for the Federal armies and navies. That Europe's so long persisted in scepticism is only another proof of how utterly fallacious is its estimate of the nation whose agonies it now witnesses with apparent indifference.

But this is only the prelude of the great tragedy which will surely be enacted, should continued success attend the Federal arms. Not a portion merely, but the whole of a magnificent crop, on which millions depend for their sustenance, the year's produce of a boundless soil unequalled in fertility—God's rich gift to all the nations of the earth—will be given to the flames as a holocaust to save one nation's life. Nor is this all. When the South has lost all worth living for—when its teeming soil is a smoking wilderness,—its beautiful homesteads heaps of smouldering ashes—its industrious labourers a swarm of thriftless vagabonds and paupers—when it has lost all that men hold dear and defend with their heart's blood, then it will live and fight for revenge. Assume that the North succeeds in overrunning the country, that Northern garrisons occupy every town, that Northern military governors rule each State as a subject territory—what then? Every marsh, every forest will be filled with desperate men, thirsting for the blood of the hated foe. Every march of Northern troops into the trackless interior will be a campaign, and so soon as they have crushed one insurrection, another will break out in their rear. Every rebel they hang or shoot will cost them a dozen lives; for assassination would be deemed a patriotic duty, and massacre a strategy of war. The next generation would take up the feud, and wage it more remorselessly than their sires. Not a mother but now teaches the child in her lap to hate the Yankees; not a father trains his son to use of the rifle without branding the same lesson upon his mind. Depths of hatred will be reached, nay, are reached already, that the imagination recoils at with a shudder.

Those whom age or sex precludes from the revenge of blood, would adopt another and an equally efficacious revenge. A social and commercial war would be waged long after the armies of the Confederation had crumbled into roving partizan bands. The Northern colonists with whom the Washington Government hopes to hold the country would be Pariahs among the sullen natives. It would become a disgrace to hold intercourse with them, an infamy to intermarry with them. To buy of them, to sell to them, to have a Yankee thing about one's house or person, would be to do what no man or woman, however slight their claims to social consideration, would dare to do. Not the open enemy alone, but even the lukewarm now, even those who, in the hour of success, might have obtained their pardon, would bear the mark of Cain on their forehead to all Southern eyes. Not one, whether on this or the other side of the Atlantic, might hope to be ever forgotten or forgiven. This is said from a thorough knowledge of the Southern character, strong and almost savage in its loves and hates. Already the Federalists reckon up their losses by the rifle balls of the guerillas in Kentucky and Tennessee at over 2000 men. What must it be if they should ever penetrate into the heart of South Carolina, or Alabama, or Mississippi, where every boy would have a father to avenge, and every wife a husband?

But we cannot see, in the latest accounts anything so promising to Northern success, that the South should be left to no other weapons than those of despair. As yet, not one of its armies has been scattered, not one of its leading generals defeated, not one pitched battle lost where water-courses did not afford the enemy the assistance of his naval forces. A country which has an unbroken array of 350,000 men under arms cannot be said to be subdued, nor to be near subjugation, though seaport after seaport, and even the capital itself, might fall into the hands of the invader. Richmond might be taken, and yet the proportions of what the North calls the "rebellion," would be fearfully greater than when President Lincoln, in April, 1861, rashly resolved to quench it with a levy of 75,000 men. More than four times that number would still have to be met by his armies, and met on battle-fields where mortar boats and iron-clad vessels cannot decide the victory. How greatly he depends on these may be judged from the more detailed accounts of the fall of New Orleans, for this city appears to have been most gallantly defended by the forts at the Mississippi mouth, and if it be true that the Confederates lost 1500 men, whilst the Federals lost only 30, the tale is told most eloquently, and the only wonder is that the forts held out so long. This tale means an attacking party, securely out of harm's way, beyond the range of opponents' guns, against defenders on whom each shot and shell tells fatally. It also confirms us more strongly in our first impression that the evacuation of Yorktown was a masterpiece of strategy equalled only by that at Manassas, and that McClellan's disgrace is equally great in both instances. Neither to the Confederates nor the Federals can this isolated peninsula be of the slightest military importance, and the only conceivable reason for its being held at all by the former—a fact which at the time surprised all Europe—must have been to check the invaders at their chosen point of attack, and to gain time for interior defences. This was from the first the opinion of the best military critics, who confidently predicted that it would suddenly be abandoned so soon as McClellan had wasted a month or two in laborious preparations for a siege.

Our object, however, is not at present to speculate upon the kaleidoscopic changes of this remarkable war. We wish to direct the attention of our readers to the fact, which seems almost forgotten, that there are other considerations involved in it besides those of the relative strength or chances of success of the contending parties. There is a moral consideration of right or wrong.

If the South can give stronger proofs of its unanimity and unalterable determination than it has just given, we are at a loss to imagine them. Wholesale destruction, like that which the telegraph announces, cannot be the work of the military authorities. It is impossible that the Confederate President should have had troops all along the banks of the Mississippi and its tributaries, ready to burn the harvest of unwilling owners. Such a deed is the deliberate self-sacrifice of the individual, and not of the collective mass. In all this fearful destruction, we are told but one planter was found who objected to the burning of his property. Will Europe longer allow itself to be deluded by Northern falsehoods, that this is a war against a set of treasonable conspirators against the authority of a lawful Government? And if it is a war against an unanimous and devoted people, determined to assert a right which in no modern instance has been refused to any people, by what train of reasoning, or upon what system of political or governmental theories, can the conduct of the North be justified? Is Europe prepared to admit, as a fundamental maxim of international law, that might alone makes right, that the stronger has always a right to subdue the weaker, and that a nation's sole title to existence rests not upon its fulfilling the usual conditions of nationality, but upon its ability to contend for an indefinite period against overwhelming odds, and under circumstances of peculiar and exceptional difficulties and disadvantages? If so, what right will Europe have to complain should the North follow up the assumed conquest of the South, achieved, as it would have been, by the indirect aid of Europe, with the conquest of other equally tempting regions, such as Mexico, Cuba, or Canada?

Continued Insults to the British Flag.

THERE are persons living in civilized communities, some of them British subjects—we grant they are few in number, and their influence is microscopically small—who regard national prestige and national honour as worthless chimeras. They would sell the one for a piece of calico, or a yard of carpet, and throw the other into the bargain. Does the protection of our immense Colonial Empire cost a seven-tieth part of our annual revenue? Then turn it adrift, let it stand alone, or affiliate with another Power, or do anything, provided the colonists do not buy less of our manufactures. Cannot we squeeze something out of the natives of India for governing them? Unless we are paid for our trouble, why should we care for the social progress and happiness of two hundred millions of our fellow-creatures? Let us rid ourselves of our Indian Empire. Let us leave it to anarchy and to retrogressive barbarism. Let gold be the nation's god, and let us worship it with all our heart, soul, and strength.

These soulless, sordid creatures are short-sighted and foolish, as well as despicably base. Prestige and honour are not only beautiful, but they are powerful, and the progenitors of wealth and prosperity. What saith history? There is not an instance on record of a nation losing its prestige or its honour without losing its commercial supremacy. National greatness and commercial greatness grow together, and cling together. They mutually thrive or mutually fade. Divorce them, and the one declines and the other decays. It is true, our costly armaments are a charge upon our commerce, but it is not less true that without our costly armaments our vast commerce would not have had existence, nor could not continue to exist. If England becomes a third-rate Power, her trade will proportionally dwindle. The strong and not the weak gather the riches of the earth. The maintenance of England's prestige and honour not only appeals to our manliness, our patriotism, and our chivalry, but it is allied, closely, inseparably allied, to our monetary interests. An unavenged insult does more than stain our reputation, it inflicts a debilitating and rankling wound.

Till lately the flag of England had never been insulted with impunity. Even enemies have shown respect for the honoured emblem of our glory. It was reserved for the Yankee to dishonour the flag of the mother country by taking a cowardly advantage of our unwise forbearance.

Ever since the Trent affair, when in place of ample reparation we accepted an idle shuffle, and a lame excuse, as insulting to our common sense as the act it professed to cancel was to our honour, our mercantile marine has been treated with the most astounding and unprovoked insolence by the Federal navy. Our ships are boarded and ransacked, and our seamen treated with a coarse impudence which would be an evidence of boldness, if it were not mere contemptible bullying. There is no bravery needed to fire shot and shell at the unarmed ships of a neutral and friendly power. Take the seizure of the Bermuda as a specimen.

The Bermuda was an English vessel, sailing in English waters. A gun was fired from the Mercedita, a Federal war steamer. The signal was not unnaturally disregarded. Instead of a second signal, a shotted gun was fired, and "the shell came whistling in between the mainmast and the smoke stack." An officer from the Mercedita was sent on board the Bermuda, the ship's papers were demanded, taken to the Federal vessel, and shortly afterwards Captain Westendorff was required to wait upon the captain of the Mercedita. The papers were perfectly regular, and it was rather difficult to find an excuse for seizing the Bermuda; at length Captain Westendorff was asked where he loaded, and having replied that he took in his cargo at Liverpool, the Federal captain remarked, "then that vessel must be searched." Captain Westendorff was detained on board the Mercedita, whilst three boats, with officers and men armed to the teeth (the Yankees seemed to have a wholesome dread of unarmed English seamen), were despatched to take possession of the Bermuda. Whilst the search was going on, the course of the Bermuda was changed, and the British flag was not hauled down again until three hours after the Federals had had entire charge of the vessel.

Setting aside the illegality of the capture, it is impossible to find any excuse for the insulting conduct of the captors. We must repeat that the seizure of the Bermuda, and the manner thereof, are not in any respects exceptional. Not to weary and disgust our readers with a long list of Federal outrages, we will just remark that we know that the Stephen Hart, a British vessel, sailing from a neutral port to a neutral port, without any intention of running the blockade, was seized by the Yankees, and the English flag was kept flying with the Yankee flag above it. It is also notorious that Judge Betts has refused to give a decision in reference to a disputed capture.

Notwithstanding our indignation at such infamous treatment, we have no desire to see England involved in war with the Northern States. But these insults must not, cannot, be endured. If they are much longer continued, we know the spirit of England too well to suppose that she will be contented with a diplomatic reparation. If the Yankees will have war, let us have war, and God defend the right. At all events, let those who are the chosen guardians of our national honour, and to whom that honour must be dear and sacred, by remonstrance or by force, prevent the Yankees from treating the Union Jack as a paltry rag.

What does Intervention mean?

THERE appears to be in many minds a singular confusion of the two subjects—intervention and recognition. They are political acts entirely distinct in principle; so much so, indeed, that the same principle may forbid the one and enjoin the other at one and the same time. For instance, a laudable desire to be on terms of amity with all other communities, may direct us not to intervene between belligerents, and provoke the hostility of one of them; yet this same desire may impel us to recognize a Government established over itself by a great population, lest, otherwise, the enmity of that community should be assured to us. Again, intervention assumes the use of force, either at once applied or held out in prospect, whilst recognition is a perfectly peaceful step, in strict accordance with international law, and with the established usage of the civilized world.

And those who confound matters so distinct as these, appear to be in some degree of error as to intervention itself. It is now becoming the fashion to denounce intervention, or speak of it with bated breath, as of something dangerous and reprehensible.

It happens that lately we have been employed in an intervention of the most objectionable character, conducted in the most clumsy manner, for objects which no one attempts to fathom or explain; and whilst our ships and marines were thus employed in one part of America, there were those who would have it regarded as a thing to be held up to reprobation, if, with vital interests at stake, and for objects comprehensible by all, we choose in another part of America to adopt the same course. We have been denouncing a principle and acting upon it at the same moment; and those who shrink from it and croak sensitively when remotely in prospect, are perfectly quiescent on the subject where it is in actual operation. Again, the doctrine itself, excellent though it is as a rule for general guidance, becomes little better than absurd when pushed to excess. If we are never to interfere in the affairs or with the acts of foreign Powers, the sooner we adopt the old legislation of Japan the better. Shut yourself up from all communication with the outer world—none will then interfere with you, or you with them. This is a simple, intelligible, and, it may be, virtuous policy, but it was never yet the policy of England. We, on the other hand, have chosen, instead of that seclusion, to take an active and influential part in the world's affairs. We have sent our ships to every port, and planted our feet wherever enterprise could find a ledge to stand on; we have created vast interests, which depend for their health or existence on the products, laws, conduct of other people; and, having thus incorporated ourselves as a living part of a great system, we cannot profess or affect isolation from it. It is not for us to say to other people, "whatever injures you, affects ourselves; if you destroy your crops, we also suffer, for they are part of our industry as well as yours; if you stir up wars, we, too, feel their effects; if you blockade great coasts, we, too, are stricken; but still, do as you list; we have abandoned a history of a thousand years, and adopted non-intervention as a law unto ourselves, and now if you strike us on one cheek, we will turn to you the other also."

Hence to adopt non-intervention as an article of faith is to remove political affairs from the hands of the statesman into those of the missionary. Political questions are not the field for abstract doctrines, but for dealing as wisely as we may with hard facts, each of them to be weighed on its own merits. In this case, whilst we differ entirely as to the doctrine, in the exaggerated form it now commonly assumes, we agree that in America intervention by force of arms, or, in other words, a war with either party would be a great evil to this country. We cannot enter into any war without something to lose, and this is one in which there would be nothing to gain. Is there any contingency which would expose us to great danger of such a war? Undoubtedly there is, although at present it may be remote. The subjugation of the Southern States by the North—the inflation of such a victory—the employment of the million of armed men cast adrift—that lust of dominion which grows with what it feeds on, and, beyond all these, the stinging remembrance of the Trent reparation to be avenged, all these together would impel the victorious North to discover that it needed the St. Lawrence as well as the Mississippi. Those who shrink from the idea of a war with half of that people would then have to encounter one with the whole of it.

The recognition of the Southern Government affords, on the other hand, a sure escape from this danger. It is well known that such a course has long been desired by France, and if taken in concert with that Power, it would not only be an act held to be peaceful by every international code, but it would also be the restorer of peace to the country now afflicted with war in its direst form, and the means of removing from the future that danger of war with this country which impends as an event certain to follow one possible result of this contest. But it may be necessary to show in greater detail why such action on part of the two Governments would be a harbinger of peace. We will admit that in order that it should be such certain conditions are necessary. First, that recognition should not be confined to a single Power, for this might permit its influence to be disregarded for a time. Secondly, that the position of military affairs should at the time permit all reasonable men to entertain doubt as to their final issue. Both these conditions would exist. Whenever the independence of the South shall be acknowledged by this country, there will be several Powers, Spain and Belgium, as well as France, quite ready to join in the measure. The other consideration exists already. A large proportion of the intelligent men of the North has long been satisfied that the attempt to subjugate the Southern States was chimerical, and if continued much longer must result in national bankruptcy. Letters constantly reach this country imploring for some form of mediation to terminate the sufferings of the country. A peace-party has always existed at the North, and must exist, unless we are to assume that all are blinded by passion or self-interest; but this party has been powerless and dumb in the presence of contractors and their allies, and of those impelled by the zeal of fanaticism or the spur of ambition. There has been, too, the fear of Fort Warren before its eyes. Immediately on the recognition of the Southern Government by the European Powers, it would speak out, and with the voice of common sense. Excitement would sober down into reason and the great majority of the community would wake as from a distempered dream.

Another effect of the measure, still more conclusive, would be its result in a financial point of view. The history of the world has never presented such an instance of corrupt and wasteful extravagance, or of reckless plunging into debt. An expenditure from which nations of the accumulated wealth, and with the vast revenues of England or France would shrink aghast, is here treated with unconcern by a people comparatively poor, and whose national income is insignificant. But this can only be done for a time. A youth with an income of £100 a year may spend £1000 a year, and whilst doing so will appear to the by-stander a much richer person than if he were living within his means. All the world knows how this will end, though none may precisely say in what month the career will come to its inevitable fate. This war is carried on entirely upon such a system. There is not even the pittance, the £100 a year—no particle of income exists, nor has any tax yet been levied towards a war expenditure which cannot be estimated at less than £150,000,000 per annum. If the total expenditure be taken at Mr. Sherman's last estimate, it will, after allowing for all sources of income, leave the rate of descent into debt even greater than the sum named. The effect of European recognition, in such a state of affairs, is so obvious that no reader can require it to be argued.

Another consideration would present itself to thinking men. They would say, "The Powers have already suffered, and with no little patience. That patience is now exhausted; shall we do well to trifle with it more? At present we may with a good grace yield to the wishes of Europe, and in doing so demand such terms of peace as those Powers will be glad to second. If, on the other hand, we persist further the consequence lies plain before us,—they will adopt other means to save their working classes from misery, and instead of ourselves declaring the terms that would suit us, we shall have to swallow what others dictate."

If these views be correct, recognition is a peace-maker, and nothing else. It is not our purpose to express any opinion whether or not the day has arrived for the friends of the South to ask it at the hands of those Governments which profess no longer to be guided by the doctrine of Divine Right. We believe that, up to the present time, no such request has been formally made by any of the representatives of the Southern Government. They complain that the public law of Europe has been slighted, wilfully slighted, in submitting to a blockade, the inefficiency of which, at some points, has been plain to every person of mercantile or naval experience. From whatever motive this has arisen, whether out of recollection of the past, or foresight into the future, or calculations of advantage to accrue in other directions, or the habit of truckling to the coarse petulance of the Washington Government—whatever its cause, they hold that the declarations of Paris should not have been passed to be spurned on the first great occasion. They marvel, too, that the Powers of Europe should submit with humble acquiescence to the insolent defiance which shuts out their people from three-fourths of the coast of America. But upon the question we are considering—that of the recognition of the South—we believe they have hitherto been contented to abide with confidence the issue of military events—assured that, whatever the sufferings of the Southern people, their endurance would be equal to the occasion, and that, whatever the casualties of the war, it would in due time be proved that a country of a million square miles, inhabited by brave men, is not to be subdued by mercenary troops or amateur generals; and that the Government appointed by such a people, with a unanimity rarely, if ever, equalled, is a fact which ere long the justice of Europe, and its respect for truth, would lead it to admit and recognize as a fact.

French Diplomacy in America.

WHERE the field of conjectures is so vast and inviting, we may be pardoned for also trying our skill in competing with others to frame them. If we are not more fortunate than others little harm will be done; but we venture the assertion that those we shall make rest upon a better foundation than many which have authoritatively claimed public credence. We build our conjectures upon two facts, which must be considered as indisputable. First, that M. Thouvenel disclaims any knowledge of the objects of M. Mercier's visit to Richmond, or of its results, neither having been communicated to him by the French Plenipotentiary. Secondly, that Lord Lyons has informed his Government on the strength of a conversation held with M. Mercier himself, on that gentleman's return to Washington, that M. Mercier was charged with the mission from Mr. Seward to the Confederate authorities, assuring them that if they would voluntarily lay down their arms and re-enter the Union, no concession would be deemed too great—no amnesty too ample—no guarantee to their property and institutions too stringent to be cheerfully accepted by the North. Assuming that both M. Thouvenel and Lord Lyons make their respective statements in perfect good faith, there is a tangle of mysteries, great ones and small ones, covered by these two facts. Why should the French minister, known to be a prudent as well as an astute diplomatist, venture upon a step which has set the whole world in a blaze of curiosity, and which, of itself, forms an event of no small historical importance, without so much as informing, much less consulting, his immediate official superior? Having thus taken it without consulting, or even informing that superior, why should he leave him still to share that curiosity which he must feel in common with all those who have a less imperative right to the desired information? But, stranger still, why should the French minister adopt so unusual a course for no better reason than to carry a message, which he must have known in advance, to be worse than useless for any practical purposes, from one Foreign Government to another Foreign Government, and the latter a Government not recognized by his Sovereign? Why should Mr. Seward send such a message, and why of all the diplomatic corps, should he select the French Ambassador as his envoy?

We have a theory of our own, which seems to us the only one that can make these apparent absurdities intelligible. According to this theory, M. Mercier acted upon instructions received direct from the Emperor, and not transmitted through the usual diplomatic channels. This would enable M. Thouvenel to reply truthfully to the enquiries which could not fail to be made by the English Ambassador at Paris, that he knew nothing of M. Mercier's object or intentions, and that no instructions had been forwarded to him from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. M. Mercier's report would necessarily go to the same quarter from which his instructions were received.

This again would enable M. Thouvenel to make the same truthful reply to the same anxious enquiry a second time. Lord Palmerston and Mr. Layard, in their turn, might assure Parliament and the country that M. Mercier, for aught they knew to the contrary, might have gone on a pleasure trip, or for the benefit of his health to the capital of an "Insurgent Power." The advantage to England of her Premier being able to give so comforting an assurance may appear questionable to those who cannot appreciate the wisdom of her present Foreign policy. The advantage to France appears clear enough. If M. Mercier's mission resulted in nothing, there was an end of it, and many disagreeable explanations spared. If it led to its intended results, the Emperor had only to say "I did it," and this again saves disagreeable explanations.

So far, our theory of the play is consistent with the known characters of the dramatis personæ. To apply it to the second act, we must endeavour to borrow a little Scotch second sight. Let us then imagine M. Mercier, having received his instructions, to cast about for a plausible pretence to carry them out. He has an interview with Mr. Seward. With true French candour, he represents to the Federal Secretary of State that Europe begins to entertain great doubts about the speedy termination of the war; that the accounts from the South are unsatisfactory and contradictory; and that he is seriously meditating to ascertain in person, what the true condition of the "Rebels" is, and what the real policy of their leaders. Mr. Seward, putting the best face on a disagreeable matter, assures the French Ambassador that the Government of the United States can have no possible objection to his giving himself so much unnecessary trouble. The Frenchman is sure to reply that it will be no trouble at all, and that he should only be too happy if he could be made the instrument of effecting a reconciliation. Mr. Seward can of course trust him to hold no official intercourse, nor have even the appearance of holding official intercourse with the rebel authorities. But Mr. Seward has so repeatedly taken pains to convince him that the United States have no other motive in this war than to preserve the integrity of their territory and the authority of its lawful Government; that if these objects are attained, the Government is ready and anxious to preserve intact the rights of the several States, and all the rights secured to individuals by the Constitution; that it is willing even to add to that Constitution such clauses and new guarantees as may have become necessary to the security of the South owing to its recent misguided course. Would M. Mercier be authorized to repeat these assertions of Mr. Seward to influential men with whom he may come in unofficial contact during his Southern tour? Mr. Seward assures him that he is quite at liberty to use these conversations wherever, and with whomsoever, he deems proper. He not only reiterates what he has said before, but adds much more in the same mild conciliatory way. No cat ever purred more gently, nor had its claws more carefully hid in velvety paws; for the Southern mouse had yet to be caught. This is our theory of the mission with which Lord Lyons informs his government Count Mercier was charged by Mr. Seward.

What the third act in the play will be, we will not now pretend to predict. Our well-informed Paris correspondent states, positively, that M. Mercier's report to the Emperor can leave the French Government no room to doubt as to either the ability, or the determination, of the South to continue the war until its independence shall be acknowledged, or its annihilation completed by its own hands. The recent destruction, by the owners themselves, of property so valuable to the commerce and industry of all nations, proves that the French Minister's impressions at Richmond were not those of a man who forms a hasty judgment. It is possible that M. Mercier's instructions had in view a more extensive pacification of America than has heretofore been ascribed to them. France has interests in Mexico, as well as in the Confederate States of America. If M. Mercier was directed to make these interests heard at Richmond, he must have found willing ears. Not only would it be sufficient for the South to become the enemy of any cause, that the North has constituted itself its friend; but there are weighty considerations which might incline the Confederate Government, even in times of profound peace, to favour French views in Mexico. Between the rival factions of that Republic, it has, indeed, no choice. The worst that can be said of either is, that it is as bad as the other. But the South is deeply impressed with one truth, which, in practice, has been recognized since the beginning of history; but which, in theory, has been almost ignored in modern times. This truth is, that two races cannot co-exist in the same country without one being subservient to the other. All the perplexities of modern politics, in the judgment of Southern statesmen, have always been summed up in the brief phrase—"Mexico needs a white man's government." In whatever manner, or by whatever means, a government of white men can be secured for its neighbour, the South would be glad to lend a helping hand. We are not sure but it would willingly see a monarchy established in Mexico; and would care but little whether the monarch was Prince Napoleon of France, or Archduke Maximilian of Austria, or Prince Frederic Karl of Prussia, or any lackland scion of royalty who possesses the nerve and ability to create order in that chaos of anarchy. Itself, moreover, has for thirty years been learning the lesson that too much democracy is not good, even for the white man; how much more deeply must it be convinced that it is not suited to the wants nor promotive of the happiness of a population, the bulk of which is composed of Indians, negroes, and the hybrid offspring of the crossing and recrossing of half-a-dozen different races. Certain it is that the South could well afford to give a fourth of its present army to any scheme of Mexican pacification, in exchange for a few vessels of war or a steel-clad frigate or two, by means of which the remainder of its army might be better supplied with weapons and munitions of war. The South lacks neither men nor courage, nor generalship, nor stern resolve; what it does lack is an abundance of arms and military stores, to obtain which no price would be too dear. Even as it is the South has proved itself a formidable foe to encounter, and even in its present hour of trial it would be a valuable ally to secure.

Political Parties.

If posterity judges of the political character of Englishmen by the history of the last two years, we shall be regarded as an eminently apathetic people. John Bull, the prince of grumblers, submits like a lamb to Mr. Gladstone's fiscal phlebotomy. The tax-gatherer finds his office a very pleasant one. Instead of being received with angry frowns, he is welcomed with genial, grateful smiles. Within the memory of very young men, Mr. Gladstone was the champion chosen to destroy that terrible, devastating, devouring dragon, the Income Tax. What is the conduct of the gallant knight? Instead of slaying, he enters into a cordial alliance with the ravening monster, and tells us that the Income Tax is not likely to be repealed or diminished. The right hon. gentleman's inconsistency is forthwith and unreservedly forgiven. He miscalculates the Revenue; or he runs us into debt, or he does not provide a sixpence for contingencies; and we care for none of these things. If we intimate deferentially that a little reduction of taxation would be rather pleasant, we are blandly informed by Mr. Gladstone that he has an intense desire to reduce taxation, and would do so if it were not for the wicked expenditure of the naughty Palmerston Government. We presume to remind the right hon. gentleman, that he is Chancellor of the Exchequer, a leading member of the Palmerston Government, and responsible for its acts. He replies, in one of those speeches which are so delightful to persons who have a taste for rhetorical tickling, and after informing us that he does not shirk his responsibility as a Member of the Government, and hinting at the dual character of a Chancellor of the Exchequer, concludes by defending the Colonial administration of the Government.

And so, too, with our foreign policy. John Bull has a considerable share of pride. He will stand a vast amount of pinching at home if he appears grand abroad. He would rather have a daily collection of assessed taxes than follow the advice of Professor Smith, and give up his colonies and dependencies, because they are expensive. He was proud, too, of his Continental reputation. He insisted upon being consulted and considered in all European affairs. Whether he knew the music or not, he always expected to play first fiddle. Who can forget the popular enthusiasm excited by Lord Palmerston, when he sent a fleet to annihilate a little kingdom, because the said little kingdom owed, or was supposed to owe, a little money to a little cosmopolitan personage euphoniously designated as Don Pacifico, the Jew? Alas! what a change has come o'er us! Prussian railway officials treat English travellers with unbridled violence. The Yankee does as he likes with our mercantile marine, and our shipowners must instruct their captains to be very humble and submissive to Yankees who choose to board and search their vessels, lest ship, cargo, and crew should be sunk by shot and shell. Our European influence is at a low ebb. We are too glad now to be allowed to play second fiddle, for fear of being condemned to the ignominious task of beating the drum. Englishmen know these things are so, and they say it is a pity they are so; and there is an end of it.

We might enlarge on this apathy; we might notice that the prostration of our great manufacturing industry produces no excitement; but having said enough to show its existence, we will proceed to investigate its cause—which we believe is the anomalous state of political parties.

Until 1846, there were two great and distinctive Parties: the Tories, who thought progress consisted in the steady development of the Constitution; and the Whigs, who associated progress with the idea of improving of the Constitution. For example, neither party objected to Reform, if Reform appeared expedient; but the Tory theory of Reform was a more complete representation of interests, whilst the Whigs thought only of an extended suffrage. Sir Robert Peel broke up the Tory Party. We say nothing against his conversion to Free Trade. In our opinion it was reasonable and well timed. But he need not have deserted his friends. He should have counselled the repeal of the Corn Laws on the ground of expediency, but should not have been the proposer thereof; and then, when Free Trade had become the law of the land, the Tory Party would have accepted the situation, and been strong enough to carry on the Government of the country. He pursued a different course, and the result was faction and confusion.

The complexity was increased by new party nomenclature. Whig and Tory were in themselves indefinite terms, but they implied definite differences; the terms Liberal and Conservative are very definite, but they imply differences that do not exist. A Liberal is so Conservative that he will not consent to any radical changes; and a Conservative is so Liberal that he freely advocates constitutional progress. When the Conservatives are in office, the Liberal organs decry them for passing Liberal measures; when the Liberals sit on the right of the Speaker, Radicals are indignant at the Conservative tone of Ministerial speeches and measures. Yet there is the same difference between them as between Whigs and Tories—a very important and salutary difference.

The Radicals saw their opportunity and embraced it. Their strength greatly increased. Had they been prudent they might have become dangerous; as it is, they have unintentionally but effectively reconstructed the Tory party. Mr. Bright's rabid Reform agitation, his revolutionary denunciations of the rights of property, his coarse and bitter tirade against the Peerage, has made Conservatism unusually popular. At the present time the Conservative Opposition in the House of Commons is stronger than the Liberal Party: and this brings us to a very curious part of our subject.

The strength of the Opposition is unquestionable. The Government is defeated time after time. The Independent members are willing to give an independent support to a Derbyite Government. The Irish members would regard the accession of Lord Derby to office as a signal triumph. In the House of Lords there is a clear Conservative majority. Sometimes comments are made about the small attendance of peers; but if the occasion came, Lord Derby could command a full attendance. Why, then, have the Conservatives continued in opposition?

Not that they altogether approve of the policy of the present Government. But Lord Palmerston is a thorough Conservative, and has been enabled from his peculiar position, to perform some very signal services for Conservatism. His Lordship is personally popular with all classes. Lord Palmerston's mild Conservatism is more cheered by an audience of working men than Mr. Bright's blatant demagogism. He has managed, with commendable tact to play with the Radical Party, and break its power. To the horror of the Radicals, they discern how they have been checkmated on Reform, and that the Tories are on that question more liberal than the Liberals. Lord Palmerston deserves the thanks of the country for putting an end to all chance of mob rule. The Tories could have resisted a Radical onslaught, but they could not have stultified it so effectively. The Conservatives have remained in opposition because it was better for the country to keep Lord Palmerston in office.

We thus explain the political apathy, which is, indeed, only political inactivity. Lord Palmerston is personally popular, known to be Conservative in his principles, and capable of checking the arrogant pretensions of Radicalism. Besides, the Opposition has been so strengthened that it can put a veto on the proceedings of the Liberal Government. Thus all things secure, there was no need for any great political action. The heavy taxation, the perpetuation of the Income Tax, the Budget blunders, the unsatisfactory state of our foreign relations, the prostration of our manufacturing industry, have been silently endured, from the knowledge that at the fitting moment the Opposition was able to change the Ministerial policy, or to undertake the administration of affairs.

The press generally supports the Liberal Ministry; the country unquestionably supports the Conservative Opposition, and the Liberal Government is continued by permission of the Conservatives. Will this last? Now that Radicalism is routed, will the Conservatives still support the present Cabinet? We reply that it is impossible. A Government on sufferance is a source of national weakness. It is likewise unconstitutional. The House of Commons represents the governing interests, and the Cabinet ought to represent the House of Commons. We believe that the Conservatives would have been in office early in the Session but for the sad event that darkened the close of the year 1861. The desire not to disturb the sorrowful retirement of Her Majesty may give the Palmerston Ministry a little longer term of office. But our gracious Queen is too devoted to the discharge of her sovereign and constitutional duties to permit the public service to be hindered by her domestic afflictions. It is evident that important political movements will shortly take place. The sooner the better for England. A strong Opposition is a safety valve of the Constitution; but an Opposition stronger than the Government is a dangerous innovation.

THE Commercial Agent of the Confederate States gratefully acknowledges the generous donation, by a patriotic Southern lady, of £50 to be applied to the relief of distressed seamen entitled to the protection of the Confederate Government.

Several cases had of late occurred where such relief was needed, but the Government, during the continuance of the blockade, had not deemed it necessary to provide a fund for this purpose. The fact coming casually to the ears of this lady—whose name we regret not being at liberty to mention—without suggestion or solicitation from anyone, she placed this liberal sum at the disposal of the gentleman who requests us to express his thanks through these columns. A short time since a number of Southern ladies, whom the outbreak of the war found residing in Europe, and prevented from returning, sent a very considerable amount of money to the Confederacy, to relieve the widows and orphans of the Confederate soldiers. A country which nurtures such women cannot be easily subdued.

SMALL items of intelligence are sometimes exceedingly significant. The summary of news per North American, concludes with the following paragraph:—

The North American touched at Cape Race on the 13th, but was unable to receive the latest news, owing to the breaking down of the telegraphic line upon the previous day.

The damage must have been considerable to entirely cut off the communication, or to need more than a day to repair it. Was the breaking down caused by the conveyance of news unfavourable to the Federals?

The Cruise of the Sumter.

FROM NOTES TAKEN ON BOARD BY ONE OF HER OFFICERS.

THE TRAIL TOO FRESH.

WE followed the French steamer into where a pilot could be obtained, and as the tide did not serve for crossing the bar both vessels anchored. We sent a boat to the Frenchman, which proved to be the steamer of war, Vautour. In the afternoon, the tide being favourable, we steamed up and anchored off the town of Paramaribo. The governor and people received us very kindly, but we had great difficulty in getting coal. As it happened, the supply was very limited, and the United States Consul had not been idle; all his influence was brought to bear on the merchants to prevent our obtaining supplies. However, after a day or two, money prevailed, and we commenced coaling; the process was very slow, for Dutchmen on the other side of the water are like Dutchmen on this side. Official visits were interchanged with our "French friend." He did not like the manner in which the Sumter had come down on him at sea, as he said, when we saw his flag we should have allowed our men to leave their quarters. In answer he was told that a few minutes before we ran down on him we also had the French flag up, and thought probably he was endeavouring to deceive us, as we had endeavoured to deceive the supposed Yankee. He was not exactly satisfied on the point, and he and our captain argued a clear case into total obscurity, drank wine, smoked cigars, and separated very good friends. We heard here that the United States steamer, Keystone State, had been in Barbadoes, coaling, while we were in Trinidad; she had been in pursuit of us for some time. We were anxious to meet her, as our armaments were about the same, and the number of men about equal, though she was much the larger of the two vessels. After we left Trinidad, she went there, and finding we had gone to the eastward, in order to overtake us, she went to the westward—rather a strange idea we thought—it put us in mind of a sportsman in California, who was very anxious to kill a grisly bear; he had been hunting for them a long time. At length he found the trail, and, after following it for some hours, gave up the chase and returned to camp. On being questioned why he did not follow in pursuit, he quietly replied the trail was getting too fresh. It must have been so with the Keystone State. The trail was getting too fresh.

Every obstacle that could be possibly thrown in our way was done by the Yankee consul at Paramaribo. He tried to buy all the coal in the market, and gave orders on his Government for it; but the United States credit was not very good out there, so that failed. He then endeavoured to hire all the lighters, and very nearly succeeded in doing so; one or two merchants held back, and allowed the use of theirs to us. He then bribed the lightermen to sink forty tons of coal that they were bringing down the river to us; and in every way, by little underhand petty meannesses, sought to annoy us during our stay in port. Such little things do not redound to the credit of any man, particularly the representative of a great Government.

ON THE LOOK OUT.

On the 31st of August, everything being ready, coal and supplies on board, we left Paramaribo, leaving behind us many who had received and entertained us kindly there, and whose good wishes for our success will long be remembered with gratitude. The morning of our leaving, the captain sent his servant on shore for marketing, &c., and that miserable creature, the Yankee consul, induced him to desert the ship. Poor Ned! perhaps you have had dreams of freedom, now you have the reality, but I venture the assertion that before many months have passed you will be

Longing for the old plantation,
And for the old folks at home.

Before leaving, we heard of six or seven large fast steamers in pursuit of us, and were satisfied that some, at least, would take the right direction; that is, if their size was double that of our own. So it behoved us to get away as fast as possible from the probable cruising grounds of our pursuers. By getting out of coal off the mouth of the Amazon a whole month has been lost to us; we must endeavour to make up the lost time. After getting to sea stood to the eastward along the coast, bound to Maraham, in Brazil, where we arrived without any incident worthy of note, except striking once very hard on a rock as we were about entering the harbour—knocking off our false keel, and doing other damage, the amount of which we could not ascertain, as there were no docks there. Here, too, we were received very kindly by the authorities and the people, in fact, everywhere we went the people either took a kind of sporting interest in us, or considered us as "enfants perdus," and of course could not withhold their sympathies from us. We took in coal at once, and on the 15th of September put to sea again, bound to Cape St. Rague, with the intention of cruising off there to catch the homeward bound ships from the Indies. On getting out from under the land, we found that the trade winds were blowing a half gale of wind, and from the former experience of the officers on board, they would continue fresh until November. We were compelled therefore, very reluctantly, to give up St. Rague. We then changed our course to the northward, crossed the equator again, and steered for the calm belt, which at this season of the year we would find from latitude four to eight degrees north, and where we hoped to meet plenty of vessels, to break again into the monotony of a long sea trip. We could not expect to get many rich prizes there, but we had been so long without taking one that any kind of one would do, in order that we might know that there were some afloat.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.

OUR FIRST ADVENTURE.

Dalton, Georgia, April 23th, 1861.

DELAYED here by want of rolling stock, as it is said, to carry off that vast northward flowing tide which gathers volume at every wayside station. Some say we are delayed to await orders from Montgomery, as there are dark rumours afloat that Tennessee has forbidden the passage of Confederate troops through her territory, in the same manner as she has emphatically refused that passage to the Northern forces intending to invade the South. I believe these reports to be malignantly circulated by emissaries of the enemy, to produce ill-feeling and mutual distrust where harmony of thought and action is so essential. In a few days, if not hours, Tennessee will assuredly be a member of the Confederacy, for none but cowards can be neutral in such a contest as is now approaching, and none but fools can hope to stay it by conciliatory attitude. The North has drawn the sword; we must force, not beg her to sheath it again. Some men in Tennessee may still talk of "impartiality," and of "keeping her soil sacred from the tread of hostile armies;" but the heart of the people is sound, and its beatings cannot be repressed by a few would-be leaders.

There are several regiments forming here, most of them from Georgia, but one or two from Alabama. They have given quite an animated appearance to this little village just struggling into life by virtue of its being the point of intersection of several railroads. In one of the half-built houses, upon which the village rests its title to be called a village at all, I have just seen one of the prettiest and most novel sights that I ever added to my memory album. The ladies, for thirty miles around, have collected here in an improvised sewing society, busy with needles and sewing machines in working for the soldiers. Where they have found so many sewing machines I cannot imagine, unless they have emptied the store of some enterprising dealer in "Yankee notions," who may have speculated upon the future grandeur of this still unborn city. At all events, never have these useful contrivances of Northern ingenuity served a better purpose than they now are, in making tents for those who go forth to defend their homesteads against Northern covetousness and rapacity. Few of the companies here have uniforms, most of the men being still in their civilian clothes, and ours is, I believe, the only company which has its own tents and camp equipage. These ladies are truly engaged in a patriotic service, for without them, many of our enthusiastic youths here must go into the field without a change of clothes, or a tent to sleep under. It is a strange sight, this large hall filled with high-bred dames and damsels, all bent with an industry which they never knew before, upon a toil which, but for its object, would be as repulsive to them as it is new. Most of them are accompanied by their black attendants, and mistress and maid vie with each other in the amount of work each can do. And real work they do, indeed, for ever and anon a lot of jackets, or of trousers, or underlinen, or a set of tents, is handed over to the quartermaster's officers, who, but for these ladies, would have no stores to dispense.

There is a guard at the entrance of the hall to screen the fair workwomen from the intrusion of the merely curious; but some of us have found access, under various pretences, the most unscrupulous of which is in the case of a member of our company, who cut off several buttons from his new jacket to have the pleasure of having them sewed on again by the delicate fingers of a beautiful young girl, whom the wretch deliberately made the unsuspecting victim of his guile. There was at first a suggestion that the mutilated jacket should be sent in without its wearer; but how can a soldier be expected to have a choice of wardrobe ready for a change at the bidding of an impertinent sentinel? The young lady seamstress, who sewed the buttons on again, is, strange enough, a niece of Mrs. Lincoln, a Kentucky belle, on a visit to friends here. Mrs. Lincoln, it appears, is, like her husband, a Kentuckian by birth.

Eight o'clock, p.m.

Orders have just arrived. We are to leave here at one o'clock to-night. The rumours of this morning seem unfortunately only too well founded. Eastern Tennessee, through which we must pass on our way to Virginia, is in a state of excitement, which may already have broken out into open insurrection. There is good reason to believe that the railroad-bridges are held by armed bands of Union men, and that the first blood we may have to shed will be on Southern soil. We are to have fifteen rounds of ammunition served out, and the unexpected need for this proves to be the true cause for our detention here. The bitterness of feeling among our men is intense, and I fear if we have to fight our way through to Virginia, it will be difficult to restrain them from excesses which they would never have thought of committing on a Northern foe. I must still believe that the reports are grossly exaggerated. East Tennessee, I know, is inhabited by a population widely differing from that of the middle and western portions of the State in origin, in interests, in manners, and pursuits. A large portion of it is a mountainous country, with a sterile soil, settled by small farmers more resembling the peasantry of Europe than the planters of the South. Such a people could not, perhaps, be expected to appreciate and understand the great change which has, to them suddenly, come over the country. The great issues at stake are unknown to them, except through the wilful perversions of leaders like Parson Brownslow, men whose very existence is a plague-spot to any community. But I cannot think so ill even of the East Tennesseans as that they would take for their model one whose chief delight is to blaspheme his Maker in the very robes of His servants, and in the very place of His worship; one whose masterpiece of pulpit eloquence was in saying, "that he should fight Secession until hell froze over, and then fight the Secessionists on the ice."

Knoxville, Tennessee, April 30th.

Our first adventure is at an end, and would be amusing if it were not for the real hardships of our journey hither. We left Dalton at one o'clock last night, in no better conveyance than cattle cars, thirty men in each, closely packed on the floor, and with no ventilation except that afforded by the fissures in the sides. The doors, for some unexplained reason, were closed, and we kept in the full enjoyment of the atmosphere left behind by the sheep and pigs that had preceded us as passengers. A series of forced marches would have been preferable to this railway journey in a dark foul prison, momentarily expecting an attack, against which we would have been helpless. We had ten rounds of ammunition served out to us on leaving Dalton, with strict injunctions, repeated to each man in person by the company officers, not to fire or even load without express orders. About an hour after daylight this morning, the train stopped for wood and water. Thanks to our frantic beating against the walls of our prison, and our united yells many times repeated, the doors were thrown open, and we had once more a glimpse of light and a mouthful of fresh air. I believe if we had continued in this locomotive Black Hole some of us would have died.

On looking out it was discovered, with amazement, that we were the only live freight on board. During the night, the train being too heavy for the engine, had been divided, and that portion on which the troops were, left to follow. Nothing in the appearance of our car indicating the presence of human beings, and a cattle car resembling in all respects a luggage van, we were, by a not unaccountable mistake, sent on with the heavy freight. When the discovery was made we were within an hour's run of Knoxville. A consultation was at once held, and there being neither officer nor non-commissioned officer among us, the first step was to find a leader. To avoid even the appearance of an election, which we all condemn in principle, the unanimous voice of our little forlorn hope gave the command to one who had on several occasions acted as corporal in company drills. The engineer informed us that the railway bridges which we had passed were indeed held by Tennessee troops, but they were troops under the orders of the governor, sent to protect them against the malignity of disaffected individuals. It was therefore decided to go on to Knoxville, there quietly to await the arrival of our companions. If insults were offered us, we were ordered to hear them with dignified silence; if violence by a greatly superior force, to make no resistance. It was an anxious half-hour, that last one before making the chief city of East Tennessee.

So, here we are, in the town of Parson Brownslow, the place which had been represented to us as the hot-bed of disloyalty to our sacred cause. Thirty men at the mercy of any band of his followers who may choose to insult us, or do worse. But neither Brownslow nor any of his men can be seen or heard of. On approaching the station, we descried the United States' flag waving from a huge staff, but reversed, and with the banner of the Confederacy floating triumphantly over it. So soon as the cars stopped, we were greeted with a loud "Hurrah for Jeff Davis!" and surrounded by men who cordially took us by the hand, and offered us the hospitalities of the city, in the shape of unlimited drinks at the neighbouring bar-rooms. They seemed mortified when we informed them of the suspicions we had entertained, and assured us that though "there might be a few damned scoundrels of traitors in their midst, they dared not show their faces, and would be 'eaten up' if they did," and that even the blasphemous parson kept prudently silent. In a short time all apprehension was removed, and we obtained leave to disperse in various directions to take a look at this really beautiful town.

A TRIUMPHAL MARCH.

Lynchburg, Virginia, May 1st, 1861.

If we were a band of conquering heroes returning home with well-won laurels, instead of a set of youths who have yet to win their spurs in their country's cause, we might more appropriately have accepted the ovations we have received ever since we left Knoxville, and, indeed, ever since we left Montgomery. We have been pelted with bouquets at almost every village we passed, and scarcely a man of us that has not secured his own individual trophy. Many of the bouquets have cards attached to them, with patriotic prose or verse written in dainty ladies' hands. My own reads:—

God speed ye, patriotic sons of the South. Our hearts follow you to your battle-fields, and our prayers shall strengthen your arms in your sacred duty. Conquer, or die in the attempt; but let none return so long as a Northern foe threatens our homes.

Another which I am permitted to copy by the happy recipient, is, if possible, still more enthusiastic:

Hail! brave defenders of a holy cause. Our heartfelt wishes, our constant prayers, attend you whithersoever you go to search the hated foe. Let no Yankee footsteps pollute the native soil of free men and free women. Your memory will be sacred to us if you fall, our smiles shall reward you if you return victorious. Better death than disgrace. God defend the right!

The younger members vow that when the war is over, they "will come back and find out these noble girls that write such pretty notes." Each one thinks that which fell to his share the most eloquent, and hugs the conceit that it was specially intended for him. Wherever the train stops, hives of girls of all classes of society crowd the depot, and the more enterprising of the gay volunteers generally manage to leave the cars, and make the best use of the few minutes the locomotive is willing to allow to their flirtations. Men we seldom see in any large numbers; they are all drilling and making ready to follow us. The only place, besides Knoxville, where we received the greetings of our own sex, was near Marietta, in Georgia, where 400 commissioned officers of the Georgia militia had been formed into a camp of instruction under the personal supervision of the Governor.

The ladies, however, are not unmindful of our material wants, and know that we cannot feed on the rose leaves of their nose-gays. At Greenville, in Tennessee, we found a substantial lunch prepared by them for the whole regiment, and good hot coffee enough for two regiments. We were agreeably surprised at this, because we had been led to consider this locality the most disaffected in all East Tennessee. It is the home of Senator Andy Johnson, over whose house still waved the Stars and Stripes, as if in defiance to the Secession ensign displayed from the flagstaff at the station. The Senator himself we had passed a few hours before in a train going towards Knoxville. He looked pale and suffering. A few of the men were sufficiently lacking in self-respect to groan as the two trains stopped by the side of each other, to which he replied by taking his hat off. The offenders were severely reprimanded by the officers, and their conduct condemned by the whole regiment. It is, however, a remarkable forbearance on the part of our people to let this man, as well as Brownlow, go at large. Johnson was actually on his way to make a Union speech at some place on the road. He is said to be an eloquent orator, and to have unbounded influence among the people of the mountains.

At Whitville, a small hamlet marking the boundary of Virginia and Tennessee, we found no breakfast, except for some twenty or thirty of us, for the few hospitable private houses could accommodate no more; but we were welcomed to Virginia by a speech of no moderate pretensions. Among the privates of our company is a barrister of note, whom we appointed orator of the occasion. Unfortunately, in the midst of his eloquent peroration, the whistle sounded, and orator and audience had to scamper, saute qui peut, to jump on the moving train.

At Liberty, some 300 ladies had assembled, and with their own hands prepared us dinner. Ours and another company, perhaps because we were the best dressed, had a table allotted us overlooked by a low back gallery thronged by our fair entertainers, thus enjoying the advantage of hearing their comments on the appearance, individually and collectively, of our modest selves. The repast came near having a tragic termination, for a portion of the frail balcony gave way, though, thanks to the prompt rush in assistance, without more serious consequence than the display of a well-turned ankle or two.

Whatever had been the enthusiasm of our reception on the way, it is exceeded by our welcome to Lynchburg. The city seems to have gone mad with joy. As the regiment marched through its whole length (for the regiment is now together, the various companies having overtaken us during our different stoppages), we seemed passing through a city on fire, so continuous were the flashes of fireworks, and so dazzling the blaze of light. We were leaving the suburbs for our camp-ground, a few miles further off, when the telegraph announced the passage of an ordinance of Secession by the Legislature of Tennessee. Though we are punctilious sticklers for military discipline, no sooner had the news been passed by the officers along the line, than the regiment burst forth in cheer after cheer, joined in by the thousands in the streets and windows; "Hurrah for Tennessee!" "Hurrah for the Southern Confederacy!" "Hurrah for Jeff. Davis!"

Reviews.

A HISTORICAL PARALLEL.*

MR. MOTLEY'S works are too old for serial criticism, and too new for critical essayism. We have no inclination to dispute the unanimous and deservedly favourable verdict that has been pronounced upon their merits. We desire, in directing attention to "The Rise of the Dutch Republic," and "The History of the United Netherlands," to point out the parallel between the struggles for liberty so eloquently described by Mr. Motley, and the fierce conflict now raging on the continent of America. We may have occasion to dwell upon some peculiar and close analogies, but there are three all-important lessons that it will be our special endeavour to bring under the notice of our readers.

First, we learn from the Rise of the Dutch Republic, that it is impossible to crush a spirit of national independence. The Netherlands passed through a fiery ordeal—which, even at this distance of time, we cannot contemplate without a feeling of awe—victorious, purified, and unscathed. It was all the world to nothing against them, yet they triumphed. The voice of History is the voice of God, and it whispers comfort, courage, and enduring assurance to those who are contending for freedom and for civilization.

A liberty-loving people may be afflicted, tormented, desolated with fire and sword, even crushed for awhile under the iron heel of brute force despotism, but they cannot be subjugated.

Is there a Southerner who, though fully prepared to offer property and life on the altar of national freedom, yet in the dark hour of trial deems it possible that his country may pass under the dominion of its ruthless invaders? We bid him remember the struggle for Dutch Independence, and be of good cheer. We believe the triumph of the Confederate States is near at hand, but we will not indulge in boasting prophecy. Perhaps the deadly strife may be protracted, but the sacredness of the cause ensures a triumphant issue. Liberty will not be less precious because it is purchased with so much noble blood, and such great sufferings. It is impossible to conceive that the Confederate States can ever be reduced to the extremities of the embryo Dutch Republic. The pangs of national birth are as terrible as the throes of national dissolution, but in the case of the Dutch Republic they were unusually terrible and lasting. Success seemed hopeless. The European nations looked on coldly. Occasionally sympathetic admiration was excited by the heroic determination of the people. There was, for example, something irresistibly grand in the resolve rather to give the country to the ocean, than to permit it to become the patrimony of tyrants. As usual, fortune appeared to favour the strong and to oppress the weak; but in the end right became mighty and conquering.

And the story of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic," written by a Northerner, ought to teach the North a lesson. Do the Northerners imagine they can subdue the South, and keep in bondage 7,000,000 of people who are determined to be free? A people of another and a purer race? If so, they must despise or cannot interpret the past. Mr. Motley observes in his preface:—

To all who speak the English language, the history of the great agony through which the Republic of Holland was ushered into life must have peculiar interest, for it is a portion of the records of the Anglo-Saxon race—essentially the same, whether in Freisland, England, or Massachusetts.

This is essentially true; yet when Mr. Motley wrote it he could have had no conception that in a few years it would be so peculiarly applicable to his own countrymen. His testimony is additionally valuable, when we remember that he is a staunch opponent of Southern independence. Curiously enough he disregards the oracle of the past that he has so eloquently revealed. He discerns not "the great agony through which the Republic of Holland was ushered into life" should tell the South that if the national heart desires independence, the goal will be reached, though it may be through wearying tribulation; and simultaneously warn the North of the utter hopelessness of an attempt to domineer over a nation panting for independence.

Secondly, the history of the Netherlands is conclusive as to the impossibility of fusing naturally different races. Mr. Motley refers to this as the main cause of national troubles.

Thus, the population of the country was partly Celtic, partly German. Of these two elements, dissimilar in their tendencies and always difficult to blend, the Netherlands people has ever been compounded. A certain fatality of history has perpetually helped to separate still more widely these constituents, instead of detecting and stimulating the elective affinities which existed. Religion, too, upon all great historical occasions, has acted as the most powerful of dissolvents. Otherwise, had so many valuable and contrasted characteristics been early fused into a whole, it would be difficult to show a race more richly endowed by Nature for dominion and progress than the Belgio-Germanic people.

Physically the two races resembled each other. Both were of vast stature. The gigantic Gaul derided the Roman soldiers as a band of pygmies. The German excited astonishment by his huge body and muscular limbs. Both were fair, with fierce blue eyes, but the Celt had yellow hair floating over his shoulders, and the German long locks of fiery red, which he even dyed with woad to heighten the favourite colour, and wore twisted into a war knot upon the top of his head.

The polity of each race differed widely from that of the other. The government of both may be said to have been republican, but the Gallic tribes were aristocracies, in which the influence of clan-ship was a predominant feature; while the German system, although nominally regal, was in reality democratic. In Gaul were two orders, the nobility and the priesthood, while the people, says Caesar, were all slaves. The knights or nobles were all trained to arms. Each went forth to battle, followed by his dependents, while a chief of all the clans was appointed to take command during the war. The prince or chief governor was elected annually, but only by the nobles. The people had no rights at all, and were glad to assign themselves as slaves to any noble who was strong enough to protect them. In peace the Druids exercised the main functions of government. They decided all controversies, civil and criminal. To rebel against their decrees was punished by exclusion from the sacrifices—a most terrible excommunication, through which the criminal was cut off from all intercourse with his fellow creatures.

With the Germans the sovereignty resided in the great assembly of the people. There were slaves, indeed, but in small number, consisting either of prisoners of war or of those unfortunate who had forfeited their liberty in games of chance. Their chieftains, although called by the Romans princes and kings, were, in reality, generals chosen by universal suffrage. Elected in the great assembly to preside in war, they were raised on the shoulders of martial freemen, amid wild battle cries and the clash of spear and shield. The army consisted entirely of volunteers, and the soldier was for life infamous who deserted the field while his chief remained alive. The same great assembly elected the village magistrates and decided upon all important matters both of peace and war. At the fall of the moon it was usually convoked. The nobles and the popular delegates arrived at irregular intervals, for it was an inconvenience arising from their liberty, that two or three days were often lost in waiting for the delinquents. All state affairs were in the hands of this fierce democracy. The elected chieftains had rather authority to persuade than power to command.

In pursuits, in religion, in social habits, the differences were as great as in their political systems. There were urgent reasons for amalgamation, yet all the efforts to effect it were in vain. The Romans could not bring it to pass. It could not be achieved during the struggle for national independence. At length, all the Powers of Europe combined to unite the obstinately separate races; but it would not do, and in a few years the United Netherlands were disunited. Mr. Motley laments that Providence did not permit a fusion of the two races. We do not share that regret. We doubt not the distinction of race is an all-wise and divinely beneficent ordination. There is nothing inharmonious in the arrangement. Fire and water are antagonistic, but they work accordantly in the locomotive. Attempt to fuse them, and the one will be extinguished, the motive power of the other undeveloped.

Whether we like it or not, it is impossible to deny that some races are fit for government, others to be governed. We do not refer exclusively to that law of nature by which the superior settling race crushes out the inferior aboriginal race. We ask if any one doubts that the natives of India are better and happier by reason of Anglo-Saxon dominion? Have the ultra-abolitionists ever proposed to give the negro political privileges? Between independent races there may be a close alliance, but not a lasting governmental union. Such a union will cause a restless craving for supremacy, sure to eventuate in hostility. There is much comfort obtained from the post-mortem examination of the United States' Constitution. We see how it might have been doctored and preserved for awhile; but we also perceive that it was inherently unsound, and that no skill or devotion could have perpetuated its existence. We only marvel that a political connection between such diametrically opposite nations should have lasted so long. Our opinions we know are displeasing to those modest philosophers and those devout philanthropists who are confident of their ability to vastly improve creation and to reform the moral government of the world. The stone they offer to their dupes is the doctrine of equality. They consider ethnological differences as diabolical inventions. They contend but for man's wickedness there would be a fusion of races. Why not go a step further and advocate a fusion of sexes?

Our third point is, that no one can study the history of the Netherlands without being impressed with the inadequacy and danger of Federalism. We need not, however, go back very far to make this discovery. Germany has wonderfully small influence in the Councils of Europe. Why? Her system of Federation keeps her down. The proceedings of the German Diet would be amusing if, considering the mental greatness of Germany, they were not disgracefully puerile. And we have in the United States a very palpable instance of the evil results of Federalism.

We propose, then, to enlarge on these three things: the impossibility of destroying the independence of a nation of freemen; the infusibility of races; the imperfectness and impracticability of Federalism. Mr. Motley's works afford us ample materials for so doing.

Before discussing the Revolution it will be well to reflect on its essentially conservative character. The Netherlands were rather the tributaries than the subjects of their princes. To them belong the glory of originating municipal independence. They enjoyed a large amount of civil and social freedom, and whenever their hereditary rights were assailed they were prompt and bold in their defence. The municipal privileges of the Netherlands people, nearly equal to State rights, were the great bulwarks of their liberty. Doubtless many a tyrant wished that the Netherlands had but one neck. Mr. Motley thus concludes his summary of the period anterior to the abdication of Charles V., and it shows what priceless privileges the people had to contend for:

Thus in this rapid sketch of the course and development of the Netherlands nation during sixteen centuries, we have seen it ever marked by one prevailing characteristic, one master passion—the love of liberty, the instinct of self-government. Largely compounded of the bravest Teutonic elements, Batavian and Frisian, the race ever battles to the death with tyranny, organizes extensive revolts in the age of Vespasian, maintains a partial independence even against the sagacious dominion of Charlemagne, refuses in Friesland to accept the papal yoke or feudal chain, and, throughout the dark ages, struggles resolutely towards the light, wresting from a series of petty sovereigns a gradual and practical recognition of the claims of humanity. With the advent of the Burgundian family, the power of the commons has reached so high a point, that it is able to measure itself, undaunted, with the spirit of arbitrary rule, of which that engrossing and tyrannical house is the embodiment. For more than a century the struggle for freedom, for civic life, goes on; Philip the Good, Charles the Bold, Mary's husband Maximilian, Charles

* The Rise of the Dutch Republic. By JOHN LOCHROP MOTLEY. History of the United Netherlands. By JOHN LOCHROP MOTLEY. London: John Murray.

V., in turn, assailing or undermining the bulwarks raised, age after age, against the despotic principle. The combat is ever renewed. Liberty, often crushed, rises again and again from her native earth with redoubled energy. At last, in the sixteenth century, a new and more powerful spirit, the genius of religious freedom, comes to participate in the great conflict. Arbitrary power, incarnated in the second Charlemagne, assails the new combination with unscrupulous, unforgiving fierceness. Venerable civic magistrates, haltered, grovel in sackcloth and ashes; innocent, religious reformers burn in holocausts. By the middle of the century, the battle rages more fiercely than ever. In the little Netherlands territory, Humanity, bleeding but not killed, still stands at bay, and defies the hunters. The two great powers have been gathering strength for centuries. They are soon to be matched in a longer and more determined combat than the world had ever seen. The Emperor is about to leave the stage. The provinces, so passionate for nationality, for municipal freedom, for religious reformation, are to become the property of an utter stranger: a prince foreign to their blood, their tongue, their religion, their whole habits of life and thought.

The Revolt of the Netherlands was not brought about by any hawking for a change of government, or by ambitious conspirators, but was undertaken for the preservation of constitutional rights. The famous edict was inimical to the most cherished rights of the Netherlands. It was resisted firmly, but prudently. A mob-revolution Philip could have put down, but a popular conservative revolution, managed by the leading men of the nation, was irresistible. From first to last, there was a manifest desire to conciliate. William of Orange did all he could to avert the national convulsions. No sooner had he learnt the determination of the Emperor to afflict the Netherlands with the scourge of the Inquisition, than he set to work, not to overthrow the existing dynasty, but to avert the danger that threatened the liberties of his country. He succeeded in getting rid of the foreign soldiery; he procured the recall of the detested Granvelle, but he did not conspire against his sovereign.

The Prince was accused of ambition and intrigue. It was said that he was determined to concentrate all the powers of government in the state-council, which was thus to become an omnipotent and irresponsible senate, while the King would be reduced to the condition of a Venetian Doge. It was, of course, suggested that it was the aim of Orange to govern the new Tribunal of Ten. No doubt the Prince was ambitious. Birth, wealth, genius, and virtue could not have been bestowed in such eminent degree on any man without carrying with them the determination to assert their value. But he practised no arts to arrive at the supremacy which he felt must always belong to him, whatever might be his nominal position in the political hierarchy. He was already, although but just turned of thirty years, vastly changed from the brilliant and careless grandee, as he stood at the hour of the imperial abdication. He was becoming earnest in face, thin of figure, sleepless of habit. The wrongs of which he was the daily witness, the absolutism, the cruelty, the rottenness of the government, had marked his face with premature furrows. "They say that the Prince is very sad," wrote Morillon to Granvelle; "and 'tis easy to read as much in his face. They say he cannot sleep." Truly might the monarch have taken warning that here was a man who was dangerous, and who thought too much. "Steak-headed men, and such as slept o' nights," would have been more eligible functionaries, no doubt, in the royal estimation, but, for a brief period, the King was content to use, to watch, and to suspect the man who was one day to be his great and invincible antagonist.

So far from intriguing for the downfall of Philip, William resolved upon informing him of the whole truth, and if his plainspoken warning had been heeded, the revolt would have been stayed. In 1564, the decrees of the Council of Trent were ordered to be published and enforced. The Duchess Regent knew the danger, and hastened to obey the Royal command. It was determined to send a special mission to Spain, and Egmont was the chosen envoy. What was the conduct of William the Silent? He was remarkably farseeing, and therefore, if he desired the destruction of the monarchy, he would have done what he could to encourage Philip in his insane career. On the contrary, instead of concealing, he vehemently denounced the ruinous policy.

There was a stormy debate in council after Egmont had accepted the mission and immediately before his departure. Viglius had been ordered to prepare the Count's instructions. Having finished the rough draught, he laid it before the board. The paper was conceived in general terms, and might mean anything or nothing. No criticism upon its language was, however, offered until it came to the turn of Orange to vote upon the document. Then, however, William the Silent opened his lips, and poured forth a long and vehement discourse, such as he rarely pronounced, but such as few except himself could utter. There was no shuffling, no disguise, no timidity in his language. He took the ground boldly that the time had arrived for speaking out. The object of sending an envoy of high rank and European reputation, like the Count of Egmont, was to tell the King the truth. Let Philip know it now. Let him be unequivocally informed that this whole machinery of placards and scaffolds, of new bishops and old hangmen, of decrees, inquisitors, and informers, must once and for ever be abolished. Their day was over. The Netherlands were free provinces, they were surrounded by free countries, they were determined to vindicate their ancient privileges. Moreover, his Majesty was to be plainly informed of the frightful corruption which made the whole judicial and administrative system loathsome. The venality which notoriously existed everywhere, on the bench, in the council-chamber, in all public offices, where purity was most essential, was denounced by the Prince in scathing terms. He tore the mask from individual face, and openly charged the Chancellor of Brabant, Engelbert Maas, with luxury and corruption. He insisted that the King should be informed of the necessity of abolishing the two inferior councils, and of enlarging the council of state by the admission of ten or twelve new members, selected for their patriotism, purity, and capacity.

Above all, it was necessary plainly to inform his Majesty that the canons of Trent, spurned by the whole world, even by the Catholic princes of Germany, could never be enforced in the Netherlands, and that it would be ruinous to make the attempt. He proposed and insisted that the Count of Egmont should be instructed accordingly. He avowed, in conclusion, that he was a Catholic himself and intended to remain in the faith, but that he could not look on with pleasure when princes strove to govern the souls of men, and to take away their liberty in matters of conscience and religion.

The conservatism of the Netherlands Revolt is worthy of our hearty admiration. Men who disturb society for the sake of doubtful rights and governmental theories are to be unequivocally condemned. The only justification of revolution is when it is undertaken for the defence of existing rights, and for the maintenance of the Constitutional Government. Rights may be enlarged and the form of government changed by revolution, but these effects should not be the objects of revolution. Indeed, Philip, and not his subjects, was revolutionary; for he wished to violate rights, and they defended them. So in America. The Confederate States did not rebel, for sovereign states cannot rebel; nor did they effect a change of government, much less a revolution. They flew to arms to defend the Constitution which the Northerners have trampled under foot.

(To be continued.)

AMERICAN CIVILIZATION.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—It would be an endless, as well as unwelcome, task to notice and refute all the calumnies which Northern writers lavish on the institutions of the Confederate States. The slanderous comments on Southern affairs which are penned by Mr. Lincoln's officials, and printed by his obedient, humble servants, the editors of Northern newspapers, deserve only to be passed by with silent contempt. In the majority of cases they are so transparently false and malicious as to render it wholly superfluous to expose and denounce them. But when authors of repute publish statements ostensibly to disclose the true position of affairs, but really for the purpose of inducing those who do not know better to accept their prejudiced and partial views as gospel truth, it is both right and necessary to discuss the grounds on which those statements are based, and point out the objects for which they are advanced. Among those Americans whose writings and opinions have an audience and an influence in Europe, Mr. Emerson occupies a prominent place. Many in this country have been accustomed to give him credit for writing with philosophical calmness and philosophical depth. By professing to be a philosopher, he tacitly refuses to be a partisan. He may never have made good his profession, and may have as little real claim to originality as the mocking-bird; nevertheless, it is unquestionable that his countrymen have taken him at his own valuation, and that not a few Englishmen admire and believe in him. Whatever he writes is sure to meet with attentive readers; hence we think it incumbent on us to give a critical examination of an essay by him on "American Civilization," which appeared in the Atlantic Monthly for April.

The subject is one about which many interesting particulars might be furnished by an American possessing a talent for discerning the distinguishing characteristics of his countrymen, and the candour to give an unvarnished account of what he had perceived. In every country civilization is manifested under an aspect peculiar to that country. The civilization which prevails at Peking and Jeddo differs from that of Paris and Vienna as much as Chinamen and Japanese differ from Frenchmen and Germans in costume, manners, and disposition. Very different from either is the civilization of America, and whoever shall clearly point out wherein the difference consists will deserve and receive the thanks of all thinking men. Not only has Mr. Emerson failed to do this, but he has not even made the attempt in a way calculated to ensure success. The burden of his essay is, that the North is civilized, and the South barbarous. According to him, civilization "implies the evolution of a highly-organized man, brought to a supreme delicacy of sentiment, as in practical power, religion, liberty, sense of honour and taste." Now, unless this man be organized on more correct principles than those on which the foregoing phrase is constructed, he must be an incomprehensible personage. It is afterwards said by him, "I have thought it a sufficient definition of civilization to say, it is the influence of good women." While it is unquestionable that women must have some share in the "evolution" of highly-organized men, they cannot have an exclusive part in civilizing a community. Good women imply good men, and when both are in the majority a country may be called civilized. There are certain tests employed by Mr. Emerson for the purpose of determining the rank to which a country is entitled in the scale of civilization. One of these is the manner in which knowledge is diffused. The diffusion of knowledge is understood by him, man's "bringing the university to every poor man's door in the news-boy's basket." If the words "knowledge" and "news" are synonymous, then a man who can read a penny newspaper enjoys advantages similar to the one who receives a university education. We sincerely hope, for the sake of the Northern youth, that the Universities are not on a par with the news-papers of the North. The manifestation of a "tendency to combine antagonisms and utilize evil," is said to be an "index of high civilization." Examples of this are "the skill that pervades complex details; the man that maintains himself; the chimney taught to burn its own smoke; the farm made to produce all that is consumed on it; the very prison compelled to maintain itself and yield a revenue, and, better than that, made a reform school, and a manufactory of honest men out of rogues." That a man's maintaining himself by the labour of his hands should be gravely cited as a mark of high civilization, is truly marvellous. We had always fancied one distinction between the naked savage and the civilized man was, that while the former must do everything for himself the latter got others to work for him. More novel and puzzling still is the statement that "the chimney taught to burn its own smoke," is an example of the "tendency to combine antagonisms, and utilize evil, which is the index of high civilization." Without discussing the part which chimneys play in modern civilization, it must be owned that the conclusion which we draw from the phrase concerning a "chimney taught to burn its own smoke," is that Mr. Emerson regards it as an index of civilization for chimneys to be constantly on fire! Although good women have influence, poor men read penny newspapers, and the mechanical arts be perfected, yet unless a nation possess morality it will be imperfectly civilized. That indispensable requisite is thus enlarged on by the essayist: "There can be no high civilization without a deep morality, though it may not always call itself by that name, but sometimes the point of honour, as in the institution of chivalry; or patriotism, as in the Spartan and Roman republics; or the enthusiasm of some religious sect which imputes its virtue to its dogma; or the cabalism, or Esprit de corps, of a masonic or other association of friends." The difficulty we have is, what body of men have not possessed this "deep morality." It seems to be a protean thing existing under the most varied names and aspects. As here explained, it must have animated both the Crusaders who went forth to deliver the Holy Land from the Saracens, and the followers of Mahomet, who called upon their fellows to believe in the Koran or die; The buccannier, who lived by plunder; the Parisian mob, which slaughtered men, and worshipped a naked prostitute in honour of liberty; the American colonists, who battled for independence; the Mormons, who practise polygamy in order to fit themselves for heaven, might all lay an equally just claim to being inspired and actuated by a "deep morality." There is one body of men whom Mr. Emerson expressly excepts; the inhabitants of the Confederate States. Not only are they wholly destitute of what he styles morality; but their Northern foes are the living embodiments of it. This, then, is the object of the Northern philosopher's essay; to eulogize the North and libel the South. One of the passages in which the latter is characterized and defamed deserves both quotation and examination. "But if there be a country which cannot stand any one of these tests,—a country where knowledge cannot be diffused without perils of mob-law and statute-law,—where speech is not free,—where the post-office is violated, mail-bags opened, and letters tampered with,—where public debts and private debts outside of the State are repudiated,—where liberty is attacked in the primary institution of their social life,—where the position of the white woman is injuriously affected by the outlawry of the black woman,—where the arts, such as they have, are all imported, having no indigenous life,—where the labourer is not secured in the earnings of his own hands,—where the suffrage is not free or equal,—that country is, in all these respects, not civil, but barbarous, and no advantages of soil, climate, or coast, can resist these suicidal mischiefs." Granting, for the sake of argument, the tests adduced by Mr. Emerson to be valuable and conclusive in determining the degree of civilization enjoyed by a people, let us apply them to the nation at war with the Confederate States. We shall discuss the question aided by the light which recent and well-authenticated events have thrown upon it. In a country, then, where men are maltreated like Mr. Kimball for the sole crime of openly expressing sympathy with those who were his fellow-countrymen, though no longer his fellow-citizens, and where ninety-eight newspapers have been forcibly suppressed because advocating views distasteful to the Government, it may justly be said, "that knowledge cannot be diffused without perils of mob-law and statute-law," and that "speech is not free." In a country where letters are ostentatiously opened by Government officials, and lying despatches drawn up by a Secretary of State to serve Government ends, it may justly be said that "the post-office is violated, mail-bags opened, and letters tampered with." In a country where private persons and public companies are forbidden by the Government to pay dividends or interest on the shares and funds held by Southern citizens, it may justly be said that "public debts and private debts outside the State are repudiated." In a country where a century ago the arts were unknown, and where the only articles manufactured were bark canoes, moccasins, bows and arrows, and tomahawks, it must be said that "the arts, such as it has, are all imported, having no indigenous life." In a country where there is a professed equality between the white and black man, but in which there are States that the black is not permitted to enter, while in the others he dare not exercise his political rights, it may justly be said that the "suffrage is not free or equal." To sum up the whole, a country wherein there is neither freedom of speech, nor of the press, where the post-office is converted into an inquisition, where the property of men owning no allegiance to its rulers is rubricously confiscated, where the negro is nominally put on a level with the white man, and really treated worse than a dog, must, on the showing of Mr. Emerson, be regarded as "in all these respects, not civil, but barbarous, and no advantages of soil, climate, or coast, can resist the action of these suicidal mischiefs." This Northern philosopher would have acted more sensibly if, instead of wasting his ingenuity in vilifying the Southern people, he examined, with some attention, the "civilization" which now prevails among his immediate fellow-countrymen.

Candour obliges us to admit that, in Mr. Emerson's opinion, the North will not prove itself perfectly civilized until it shall have abolished slavery and subjugated the barbarous South. Into the question of slavery we shall not enter farther than it concerns the statements of the essayist. In common with the majority of our countrymen, we hold that the Federal States are fighting for empire, and the Confederate States for independence. Believing this, we cannot understand how Northern men fancy that what their armies and navies cannot accomplish an act of Congress will achieve. We are assured the following will be the result of abolishing slavery "by edict":—"The slaves near our armies will come to us; those in the interior will know in a week what their rights are, and will, when opportunity offers, prepare to take them. Instantly the armies that now confront you must run home to protect their estates, and must stay there, and your enemies will disappear." The later consummation must be devoutly wished by the majority of Northern men, were it only to exhibit to the world a spectacle the reverse of that displayed by their own army when, after taking three months to advance as far as Manassas Gap, it returned to Washington in two hours. Although Mr. Emerson calls upon Congress instantly to abolish slavery "by edict," yet he also thinks "if the duty of Congress to pay for such slaves as we ought to pay for." He thinks there would be no difficulty in awarding compensation to their owners, "as the parties injured are such a handful that they can very easily be indemnified." In other words, compensate the slave-owners who have remained loyal to the Union; but confiscate the property of the "rebels." The result would doubtless be most gratifying to Yankee minds, for, as no loyal slaveholders are to be found, there would be no occasion to compensate anybody. Were Congress to emancipate the slaves "by edict" to-morrow, the position of affairs would in no wise be altered. The war would go on. Indignant the South might be, but she would be undismayed, and would fight against those who had impotently tried to ruin her with redoubled ardour and animosity. Contenting as she does against fearful odds without flinching, without shrinking, and not without success, she gives proof of having in her the right stuff out of which great nations are formed, and that her people are too highly civilized to submit to the degradation of becoming the servants of men having narrow intellects and vulgar minds. Bonaparte's opinion was, that Providence always sided with large battalions, but his own history and the experience of all mankind conclusively demonstrate that the victors in the long run are those who strike for freedom.

That the Confederate States will ultimately attain what they are gallantly struggling for, we have no doubt. Supposing, however, that the Union were restored and slavery abolished, what would the exultant and victorious North do next? It would banish the negroes. Harsh and horrible as that act would be, yet it could not exceed, in iniquity the treatment which these miserable beings now receive at the hands of the Northern people. They call them men and brothers, and regard them as beasts. When Heinrich Heine was travelling in the Harz Mountains, he met a man who delighted in tracing the admirable adaptation of everything in Nature; how, for example, the trees were green, because of that colour being refreshing to the eyes. To which Heine added, that God had created oxen because ox-tail soup was strengthening for men, that he had created asses for the purposes of comparison, and had created man that he might enjoy ox-tail soup, and thereby show himself to be no ass. In like manner, it seems as if the negro had been created for the express advantage and recreation of the Northerners. They make of him a stalking-horse for the purpose of parading a hatred of slavery which they do not cherish, and profess a philanthropy which requires no self-denial; hating slavery because the South is benefited by it, and calling for its abolition, that the Southern planters may be ruined. Moreover, the occasional sight of a negro gives them occasion for thanking Heaven with pious fervour that they have been created with fallow skins and lank hair.

A REVIEWER.

DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS AT WASHINGTON.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—There seems to be no end to the mystery of M. Mercier's proceedings, or to the audacity of assertion and denial that his known actions have given rise to. On the other side of the Atlantic, a mission on tobacco business, an intimation from the Emperor to the Confederate Congress, that they must submit at once; that he would no longer recognize them as belligerents; and much of the same sort, has been positively asserted by the New York journals. Here, the "Press" has certain information, that he went to ascertain the means of resistance the South possesses, and was specially ordered by the august inhabitant of the Tuileries. The French papers positively deny that he had any instructions at all, and Mr. Layard, the Foreign Under Secretary, assures the House of Commons that he had no diplomatic mission whatever. And now, above all, comes the startling announcement of Monday night, by Mr. Disraeli, the leader of the Conservative Party, and the equally astonishing denial of Lord Palmerston, in answer to him. But we will leave them to speak for themselves. The report runs thus.

Mr. Disraeli said:—

I thought, at the same time, that if there were any place where France and England had a common object, and should have a common course of policy, it was America: notwithstanding which, I regretted to add, word had reached my ears that there was the same want of accord between the representatives of the two Governments there which we find in other places. I did not say much on the subject; it was a delicate one. But I said that there was a sort of constant management, an attempt to obtain rival influence, which, considering that they were accredited to the President of a Republic, and were in direct communication with the Minister of a Republic, seemed to me quite out of place, and more in keeping with the intrigues round the capricious tyrant of a Divan. I said that; I could have said a great deal more. The noble lord, when he replied, contradicted me on that head in terms which, allow me to say, were neither social nor parliamentary. The noble lord said the statement was false. Well, I did not interfere at the moment, because, to tell the exact truth, I really was so pleased to see the noble lord at the end of a long debate disporting himself with so much vigour (great laughter and cheering), that I could not bring myself to interrupt him by an interference, which would not have been angry, but which would have been serious. But I also thought probably this House would believe that one filling, however unworthy, the position which I now occupy, would not have made a random statement on such a subject. I knew the matter would keep, and, therefore, being here again, I must tell the noble lord that I believe the statement that I made was most accurate, and, although from its particular character it is not capable at this moment of mathematical proof, before very long, perhaps, there may be even on the table of this House, but certainly in a form scarcely less authentic, sufficient proof of that statement.

Lord Palmerston replied:—

I went on to say that the right hon. gentleman must have been deceived by some information which he had received, and I cautioned him not to trust to the same source in future, inasmuch as that information was totally devoid of foundation. He stated on a former evening that Washington was the scene of intrigue between the English Minister and the French Minister; that they were undermining each other by their intrigues. I denied that when the right hon. gentleman made the statement, and I repeat the denial now. Every one who knows Lord Lyons knows that a man like him, so honourable and straightforward in his dealings, would be incapable of intriguing and planning against his colleague. I have not the pleasure of knowing M. Mercier personally; but I have watched his progress through the many diplomatic missions which he has fulfilled, and I believe him to be a man as incapable as Lord Lyons himself of doing anything which he and his Government could not manfully avow. Therefore, I must again assure the right hon. gentleman that he has been totally misinformed with regard to the assertion which he has made. At the same time, there are persons who, by the extreme simplicity of their character, are led away—are induced to believe easily and hastily that which is told to them by individuals whom they suppose to be possessed of accurate information. Whatever the right hon. gentleman may think of former assertions, I again assure him that he is completely mistaken as regards our Mission and the French Mission at Washington. Lord Lyons and M. Mercier, I am happy to say, are in constant and friendly communication; neither of them has done anything without communication with the other. There has been no concealment; there has been what I may call joint action. The two Ministers have worked and co-operated almost as if representing the same Government; and they have exhibited the most perfect good faith towards each other in their negotiations with the Cabinet of Washington.

Now, what are we to believe of all this positive assertion and denial? Does the notorious insincerity of Napoleon III. pervade all his diplomatic residences? Are he and his ministers in league with Lincoln and Seward, or is he in accord with the country with whom we hear so much of the perfect cordiality he retains? Who is to tell us? and where can we find the key to the unhappy truth, which seems overwhelmed under all this mass of contradictory but still infallible assertion. One thing is certain, for Lord Palmerston does not venture to deny it, that Mr. Disraeli possesses means of information which his Government were not able to attain to, and I happen to know—as the phrase goes—that the occasion to which both he and Mr. Disraeli alluded was far stronger than either of them put it. When Mr. Disraeli alleged the existence of this secret guarantee of the Italian provinces to Austria, the knowledge of which Lord Palmerston totally repudiated, and which it took his Government more than a week to ascertain, Mr. Disraeli was asked how he knew of it, and he said, "I saw it." There is also another instance of his peculiar means of knowledge, which has not been promulgated, but which most forcibly illustrates his position, that he is little likely, on a grave and delicate subject, to err in a positive assertion; and that was the conversation between Nicholas of Russia and Sir Hamilton Seymour, on the projects of the former towards the "sick man" of Turkey. They were alone, and it was a very considerable time before anything transpired, and then only by Sir H. Seymour's own report. And yet, to my certain knowledge, within a few days of that conversation being held, the substance of it, and even some of the very words used, were in Mr. Disraeli's possession, and by him communicated in certain influential quarters. And he is very unlikely to be deceived in this; and if he is not in error—if there has been, as he asserts, a "sort of management," an "attempt to obtain rival influence" at Washington—what are we to think of the action of England and France in this momentous crisis? Is there to be any limit to the mendacity, the arrogant insolence, the reckless extravagance, and wholesale cheating of the Washington officials? Are the Envoys of England and France inoculated with the maula? Is the lobbyist of the Thurlow Woods, and such nation growths of the luxuriant tropical vegetation of unbridled Democracy, carried into the grave and decorous decency of diplomatic relations? Heaven help us in this mass of lying and cheating! The worst of it all is, that, as usual—

"Quidquid dolant reges plectuntur achi."

Yours, &c., M. P.

IS RE-UNION POSSIBLE?

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—“New Orleans has surrendered.” The question is, how much nearer are they towards accomplishing the subjugation of the South? Suppose the next mail should bring us news of the surrender or capture of Memphis, will it follow (the Union is thereby so far secured?)—or let us further suppose a victory gained at Corinth, will Secession be crushed then? Will the armies of the Confederate States be disbanded quietly and peacefully to return to milder occupations, and obediently uphold the Union? The answer I fear would leave to Federal sympathizers.

We have months ago been told a port or ports would be opened, from whence would flow plenty of cotton for our wants. Will our Northern friends favour us by saying how many bales they will ship between now and January 1863, and point out the localities where they will procure it so abundantly in an unburned State? I apprehend when the promise was made, it was unthinkingly—the ashes being meant, and not the fibre. There is little doubt all parties interested in the article would feel indebted to the Federal Government for giving a clear answer to these questions—but I am afraid in this case “Hope told a flattering tale.”

Just for pastime (for the idea is nothing more), let us arrive at the conclusion that the Federal power will be successful, and capture every point sought—how are they to be retained, and the Republican liberties of the people at the same time be preserved to them? Or in what manner could the civil process of the law courts be carried out among a subjugated and unwilling people, mourning over their desolated homes and the blood of their slain?

Is it, or is it not, in contemplation to enforce such at the sword's point against or among unwilling millions?

For the benefit of us unenlightened Europeans, will some kindly disposed Northern gentleman explain what Republican Union means—is it a unanimous and united we will? or does it signify a partial and domineering Federal you must? I cannot but hope some of those able writers who have ere now favoured us with praises of the North, and condemnation of the South, will condescend to answer even what to them may seem a silly and childish question. I have always thought union meant general unanimity and agreement, but from what I have been able to glean during the past year, in America it is typical of disagreement and coercion; perhaps I err; I seek enlightenment.

There has been a very general desire manifested by the Governments of Europe not in any way to become embroiled either with North or South, and for that reason they have been neutral, although suffering severely. It was often reported a strong Union sentiment prevailed within the Southern States, which, although silenced for the time, would find voice on the approach of the Federal army. Until the truth of such reports was ascertained, recognition of Southern independence could not be resolved on; therefore it might not be amiss for the people of the Confederate States to declare to European Powers whether or not they are willing to return to the Union,—let them now say (and thus remove all doubt), will they be ruled by Mr. Lincoln.

The Confederate Commissioners could not take a more effective step than to impress upon President Davis the importance of a general popular declaration throughout the Southern States as to whether the heart of the Southern people is with the cause for which they contend. If the millions within those States declare for independence, under what pretext can their recognition among the family of nations be longer delayed?

The present Ministry of England surely would not refuse, when we find Earl Russell to have said, at the late Newcastle banquet:—"If, after many years of civil conflict, those States should be subjugated, should we not then see those Southern men yielding to a force, and would not that very materially interfere with the liberty of nations?"

AN ENGLISHMAN.

One fact which has lately come to our knowledge speaks volumes. It is conveyed in a letter from Mr. Seward to a friend in Europe, in which he confesses himself now satisfied that there is no Union minority in the seceded States. We have frequently shown how improbable was the existence of any such; for if it had existed at all it would most assuredly have made itself heard and seen at the approach of friends.—The Daily Telegraph.

The United States' transport steamer Daniel Webster, Commander Blethen, arrived in the harbour, after a passage of thirty-six hours from Ship Point, having on board 187 soldiers, under the care of Drs. Cryer and Smith, of the United States' Sanitary Commission, Washington. These sick and dying soldiers were taken from about 3000 whom General McClellan was forced to leave behind on the occasion of his recent advance; 1000 of which large aggregate are supposed to belong to New York regiments. They are afflicted with typhoid fever, rheumatism, and other maladies contracted on the swamps of the Peninsula.—New York Times.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCIFORD, BROWN, AND CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specimen inquiries of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rinford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 50, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
Jos. T. Robinson,
8, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TRIDEGAR IRON WORKS.
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rilled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by B. G. BERSLEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Eyre's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commis-sions for books and books of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES:
Their origin and the remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: HODGKINS, New Bond-street.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most profitable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inactivity, but will converge its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bid their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful picture of the Southern business, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mightily lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRATULATORY DE BENEFACTION.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.

THE Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress International de Beneficence, will take place in London from the 5th to the 14th of June.

The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.
The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon, in Burlington House.
A series of Lectures will be given during the period
of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entitled to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to all the Meetings of the Association and Congress,
and to the Soirees, &c.

Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C.; and 12, Old Bond-street, W.

As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association
has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting
will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.
For every £5 subscribed to this Fund, subscribers
are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City
Office, Guildhall, E.C.; by Messrs. Ransom, Bouverie
and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Westminster Bank, Lombury, E.C.; the Union Bank,
Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kennard
and Co., 1, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George
Ledger, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.

GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.,
and Chairman of Executive Committee.

A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.

G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO AND BRITISH COLUMBIA, via Panama—Steamers from Southampton on the 2nd and 17th of each month.
THROUGH BILLS OF LADING for goods, &c., are
issued by the ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, in connexion with Messrs. Wells, Fargo, and Co., of San Francisco. Goods should be sent to Southampton, addressed to the care of a shipping agent there. Jewellery received in London.
For further particulars apply to Captain Vincent,
Superintendent; or to R. T. REEP, Sec.
Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 55, Moorgate-
street, E.C.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent mu-sic-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Langier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

WEST INDIES, Mexico, Colon, or Aspinwall, Panama, Central American, and
South Pacific Ports, San Francisco, and British Columbia.—The ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET
COMPANY'S STEAMERS leave Southampton, with
H.M.'s Mails, on the 2nd and 17th of every month,
conveying passengers and parcels, also specie and
goods, under through bill of lading for any of the places mentioned above. For particulars apply to Capt. Vincent, Superintendent, Southampton; or to
R. T. REEP, Sec.
Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 55, Moorgate-
street, London, E.C.

Parcels and specie are received at the Company's office, in London. Specie, goods, parcels, or baggage sent to Southampton, should be addressed to
a shipping agent there.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after the 1st
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Mittenberger.
J. Leary.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
J. Masson.
J. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cassius Oliver.
A. B. Smith.
Nina Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 232,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,333,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 600,623 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1860.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st July 1862.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANNIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS
Geo. Councilly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poutx.
C. Houild.
G. Mittenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. F. Voighier.
B. O. Vignard.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... $61,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,412,959 55
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI- CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and load Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PATENT PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made
up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight and duties.
Does not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to
carry therein, aquafortis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of a ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Ten-shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty-shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to IV. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little
had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a per-
plexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern
interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX" it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crown-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—May 22, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 5.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 29, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	53
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET	56
Liverpool Letter.. .. .	56
Manchester Letter	56
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Prices Current	57
Marriages and Deaths	67
Private Letters and Extracts	67
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Our Paris Correspondent	69
LEADERS—
What does Union Mean?	72
The Supply of American Cotton	73
The Seizure of the Bermuda	73
The State of Europe	74
Editorials	74
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—
Taking the Oath	75
Our First Camp	75
CRUISE OF THE SUMNER—
The Yankee Captain and his Dollars	76
Living in Clover	76
REVIEWS OF BOOKS—
A Historical Parallel, No. II.	76
Abel Drake's Wife	78
SOUTHERN PROSPECTS	78
THE CONFEDERATE GUNBOATS AT MISSISSIPPI	78
SOUTHERN PROSPECTS	78
EUROPEAN POLITICAL HERESIES	78
THE AMERICAN QUESTION	79
ADVERTISEMENTS	80

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE surrender of Norfolk, the blowing up of the Virginia, the destruction of the Gosport navy yard, and all public property, are events which will not surprise those who understand the Confederate policy of not sacrificing a single patriot by defending untenable positions, and of destroying that which might fall into the hands of the enemy. On the 10th, General Wool, with 5000 men, landed at Wiloughby Point. When the Federals had marched to within three miles of the city, they were saluted with a few shotted guns and forthwith fell back, made a long detour, and arrived at the entrenchments at five p.m. The Mayor and Civic Council of Norfolk proposed terms of surrender, to which General Wool assented. Satisfied with this victory, General Wool and his troops watched the destruction of the Virginia, and the Gosport Navy-yard. On the 11th, after ascertaining that the Confederates were really gone, a powerful Federal fleet steamed to Craney Island; and General Wool's troops gallantly took possession of the city. The operations were directed by President Lincoln, assisted by Mr. Secretary Chase. Mr. Stanton was also present, and had a long consultation with General Wool and General Viele—perhaps as to the disposition of the spiked guns. The Mayor avowed the loyalty of the citizens to the Confederate Government. The Federal soldiers could not restrain cheers for President Davis, and groans for President Lincoln. There are graphic accounts of the disgust showed by the women at the sight of the Yankees.

Speculations are rife as to why the Virginia was destroyed without fighting another battle. The destruction of the famous ironclad was imperative, since she could not be moved out of the reach of the enemy. The explanation of her inactivity is, perhaps, that she had no opportunity of punishing the enemy, and the Confederates do not bark unless they have a fair chance of biting.

The Confederates, by latest accounts, were still falling back on Richmond, having destroyed the railroad at West Point. The operations are conducted with the greatest order and success. The Northern telegram says:—"The Confederate retreat is reported to be admirably accomplished; they carry their waggons and provisions in the daytime, and their troops by night, covering their retreat by a line of skirmishers stretched across the country, and driving in their stragglers at the point of the bayonet."

The reports as to the position of McClellan's army are rather contradictory. On May 13th, we are told "General McClellan's forces have advanced beyond New Kent Courthouse, within twenty-two miles of Richmond." On the 15th, we are informed that "in the night of the 13th a skirmish occurred with the Confederates, who were in their immediate front," and that "General McClellan's forces were at Cumberland, Pamunky River, twenty-six miles from Richmond." Are we to assume that the report of the 13th, as to McClellan's being within twenty-two miles of Richmond was false, or that, in consequence of the skirmish in the night of the 13th, the Federals had to fall back? By the latest received accounts we learn nothing of McClellan's whereabouts, but that "the Confederate and Federal outposts are only 100 rods distant from each other."

The assertion that the Confederates will make a stand at Bottom's Bridge, is a Yankee "guess;" but of this we may be sure, that McClellan will not be able to alter the plans of the Confederate leaders, or induce them to give battle at an unnecessary disadvantage.

The Confederates can afford to wait, but not so the Federals. They are in an enemy's country, and the summer is at hand. Already, and as early as the 10th May, 800 invalided and wounded soldiers arrived at New York from Yorktown, by one steamer. Indeed, the invalids are coming in daily, and from all quarters.

Governor Sprague reports the Federal loss at Williamsburg at not less than 2000; but the loss is supposed to have been much heavier. The New Jersey Brigade alone had 565 killed and wounded.

The Battle at West Point was a most unmistakable Federal defeat. The Northerners confess to a loss of 500 prisoners, and that the arrival of the gunboats "saved Franklin from suffering severe disaster." The plain English of this is, that Franklin did "suffer severe disaster," was defeated, and but for the arrival of the gunboats, the whole of his troops would have been cut to pieces, or made prisoners.

There has been an engagement at Falmington, five miles north-west of Corinth. The Federal brigade, under General Pope, was attacked by a Confederate corps, and after considerable resistance defeated and driven back. We have not received accounts of the losses on either side, but Mr. Stanton condescends to inform Europe that "the loss of the Federals was considerable." When the truth oozes out, we shall find that Pope's brigade was roughly handled and completely routed.

According to General Halleck's estimate, General

Beauregard has under his command from 120,000 to 170,000 men. We quite understand the nervousness of the Federal Secretary of War in reference to the anticipated battle of Corinth, and give him credit for prudence and foresight, in ordering "that newspaper correspondents shall not be permitted to telegraph any account of the approaching battle at Corinth after it has taken place until the report is first revised by the military censor at Cairo."

On the 14th, General Halleck announced that he "would on that day move his camp four miles to the front. The Federal forces are at an average distance of two and-a-half to three miles from the Confederate entrenchments at Corinth." We presume, if the Federals are within three miles of the Confederate entrenchments, they cannot advance four miles without taking the said entrenchments. It would seem that the Federals think the only use of writing despatches is to produce a jumble and conceal truth.

General Pope's defeated troops have been joined to the division under General Mitchell.

The Federals complain, and we doubt not, with sufficient cause, of the badness of their ground. They cannot advance without meeting corduroy roads and bridges. The ground being in such a state not only impedes the progress of the forces, but is sure to engender a great deal of sickness.

The Charleston Mercury of May 5th, says:—

There is a feeling of perfect certainty of defeating Buell and Halleck in a signal manner. Corinth is far enough from the gunboats to give opportunity for capturing or destroying them. Hence, it has been selected as the battle-field. General and troops are alike confident.

There was a naval engagement on the 10th, above Fort Pillow, on the Mississippi. The first report was from Captain Davis, and stated, "that eight Confederate iron-clad gunboats attacked the Federal flotilla under Commander Foote. The action lasted one hour. Six Federal vessels were engaged. Two Confederate gunboats were blown up, and one sunk. The Confederates then retreated under the guns of Foote. One Federal vessel was injured." Two days later, we are informed that "Captain Pennock officially reports that, in a naval engagement near Fort Pillow, one Federal gunboat was sunk, and one disabled." It is not impossible, that as Captain Davis ignored the Federal losses, he exaggerated the Confederate losses; and there is every reason to suppose that the Confederates gained the day.

General Butler, despite the "Union sentiment," and the enthusiastic "Union meetings," finds it necessary to rule New Orleans with military despotism. The Mayor and Aldermen have been sent to prison for refusing to take the oath of allegiance. General Butler has proclaimed that:—

The violation of property or persons protected by the Federal army will be punishable with death.

All persons must treat the Federal flag with the utmost deference and respect, under penalty of severe punishment.

The keepers of all public property, whether State, national, or Confederate, must make a return to General Butler's headquarters.

All shops and places of amusement are to be kept open in the accustomed manner, and service is to be held in the churches as in times of profound peace.

The circulation of Confederate notes among the poorer classes will be permitted so long as inconsiderate persons will receive them.

Federal officers will be appointed to examine all editorial newspaper comments and correspondence before its publication will be allowed.

All assemblages in the streets, by day or by night, are forbidden.

The Federal General could not get any of the newspaper offices to print his proclamation, and was obliged to employ Northern printers, and to protect them while at work with a Federal guard. We are not likely to hear much more about "Union sentiment" in the South. Indeed, the North is throwing off the mask. The New York Herald observes:—

But, supposing that neither in New Orleans, nor in any of the other Southern cities that may fall into our hands, is a spark of Union feeling to be found, are we for that to forego our duties in the vindication of the authority of the Federal Government, and in the punishment of the traitors? By no means. The Union feeling that is wanting we can soon manufacture by promoting a military emigration from the North.

There is great distress in New Orleans on account of the short supply of provisions.

It appears that Commander Clouet, of the French steamer Milan, protested against the threatened bombardment of New Orleans. After observing that he had 30,000 French inhabitants to protect, and that only forty-eight hours had been allowed for evacuation, he continues:—

"This short delay is ridiculous. If you are resolved to bombard the city, you will have to account for this barbarous act to the French Government. In any event, I demand sixty days for the evacuation."

The Times calls attention to the fact that there was not an English vessel to protect English subjects from the contemplated Federal outrage.

President Lincoln has issued a proclamation, relaxing the blockade of New Orleans, Beaufort, and Port Royal, from 1st June, upon the following conditions:—

Vessels clearing from foreign ports destined for New Orleans, Beaufort, or Port Royal, must obtain licences from American Consuls abroad, which will be granted upon satisfactory evidence that such vessels will convey no person, property, or information contraband of war either to or from the above ports.

These licences must be exhibited on arrival to the collectors at the above ports.

When cleared outwards from the above ports such vessels must have the collector's clearance, showing that the above conditions have not been violated.

The violation of these conditions will involve the forfeiture and condemnation of vessel and cargo, and exclusion from the privilege of entering the United States during the war.

In all other respects the existing blockade remains in full force and effect, and is only relaxed in regard to the above ports.

In the first place, there is not the remotest chance of any trade with the ports named; and secondly, the Federal character for straining laws and facts in its own favour is too well known for merchants to risk their ships and cargoes on the above conditions.

Confiscation is the order of the day.

The Federal General Hunter, commanding the Military Department of Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina, has issued a proclamation declaring martial law in those States; and, as martial law and slavery are incompatible, all slaves in Georgia, Florida, and South Carolina are declared for ever free. Moreover, the House of Representatives has passed a Bill abolishing slavery in the territories of the United States by a vote of 85 to 50. Well may the South congratulate itself that it was not cajoled to trust to the honour of the Lincoln Government. We would, however, suggest, that it is wiser and more dignified to kill the lion before dividing his skin; and further, that the resolution of the South never to submit to the North does not require strengthening by any such exhibitions of Yankee lawlessness.

Even in the North respectable people are disgusted with these shameful proceedings. A large meeting of the Conservative members of Congress has been held at Washington, denouncing Abolitionists and Secessionists. A resolution was passed denouncing the confiscation measures. Unfortunately, the influence of the respectable classes in the North is "nil."

It is rumoured that General Hunter issued the proclamation without President Lincoln's authority.

Money is being voted with a profusion that must be highly gratifying to Northern contractors.

The House of Representatives has passed the Army Bill, appropriating 421,000,000 dollars for the year ending June, 1863. In addition to this 208,000,000 dollars have been voted during the present session for current army expenses and deficiencies for the present year. That is a total of £135,000,000 sterling. The Government paper-mills must not be idle. But though notes are printed and issued by thousands from day to day, the supply does not keep pace with the demand, for we hear of soldiers' wives rioting in New York because their husbands had not received pay for three or six months.

The Federals will not find much quiet in Kentucky. We learn by telegraph that "A Secession plot to hand over the town to the Confederates has been discovered at Paducah, Kentucky. The conspirators have been arrested." If it needs an army of 700,000 men to take a few Confederate towns, how many soldiers will it require to keep seven millions of rebels in order?

The Federal squadron had arrived off Fort Morgan, to attack Mobile. It is also reported that Federal gunboats have been reconnoitering before Savannah.

Mr. Edward Stanley, of San Francisco, has been appointed military governor of North Carolina. It must be remembered that North Carolina is the boasted stronghold of "Union sentiment," and yet a military governor is needed.

In the Federal Congress, Senator Trumbull has offered a resolution, that the President should, if it were consistent with public interests, communicate to the Senate any information he may have of any design on the part of any foreign Power to intervene in the contest now existing, and should also state whether any foreign nation had made any arrangements with the insurgents, or had contemplated to do so? If the resolution should be passed, it will be necessary to attach confessions to the United States' legations; and further, to induce foreign Governments to agree to confess their secret thoughts. If decorations were allowed in the United States, we would suggest that Senator Trumbull should forthwith be invested with "cap and bells."

The Mexican policy of France meets with general approval. Whether it accords with the Convention or not, it is called for by the urgency of the case. English interests in Mexico are larger than those of France, and yet they are left to the mercy of Juarez, or the intervention of our ally.

A very important note from M. Thouvenel has been communicated to Cardinal Antonelli, stating that France does not intend to effect any change in the present state of the Roman question, and recommending the Pope to place more confidence in the Emperor's Government.

The Hesse affair is settled, as far as the Diet is concerned. The Ministers of the Elector have sent in their resignation by the advice of the Austrian and Bavarian Ministers, who declared this course to be absolutely necessary to prevent the further intervention of Prussia.

A resolution in favour of introducing a Bill for voting by ballot was carried in the House of Commons on Tuesday by a majority of 83 to 50. The victory was gained by a trick. The House always empties when the ballot discussion comes on, and fills in time to vote against it. Mr. Berkeley saw his opportunity, said ditto to his former speeches, and, by pressing on the division, obtained a majority.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, May 28th, 1862.

Our last report closed upon a strong market under the North American's news at 3d. advance on the forced sales of the previous day, and with Middling Orleans worth 123.

On Thursday and Friday, the tone was quieter, holders began to offer their stocks more freely; buyers held back, and the full advance of Wednesday was scarcely maintained. On Saturday, the dullness became more marked; a telegram was published in the Times, purporting to come from good authority, to the effect that the Southern army was defeated and surrounded in Virginia. The news was generally discredited, but it influenced a few timid holders, who pressed sales at 3d., and in some cases 3d. decline. The business was restricted to 2000 bales, chiefly Surats. Middling Fair Dhollerahs were sold at 74d., and Middling Orleans at 124d., or even less.

On Monday, however, the tone of the market was entirely altered under the America's advices, which were keenly discussed on 'Change. The telegram of Saturday proved to be wholly groundless, but much fresh and interesting information was received. The evacuation of Norfolk and the destruction of the Merrimac were not looked upon as important, either in a commercial or political point of view. It was generally felt that these were necessary consequences of the naval superiority of the North, and of the prudent policy recently adopted by the Confederates of withdrawing from the seaboard, and the vicinity of navigable rivers, so as to meet the enemy on equal terms. The skilful and orderly retreat of the Southern army from Yorktown also excited attention, and further information was obtained about the combats at Williamsburg and West Point, from which it appeared that the Confederates had inflicted severe blows on the advancing columns of McClellan. The tendency of this news was to dispel any illusions that had formerly prevailed, regarding the weakness and disorganized state of the Southern forces, and to impress the commercial community with their ability to offer a protracted and effectual resistance. Much importance was also attached to the news from New Orleans; the stubborn resistance of the inhabitants to the Federal authority, as shown by the refusal of the local press to publish General Butler's proclamation and of the city officers to take the oath of allegiance, afforded additional proofs of the inveterate disaffection of the Southern people. It was argued that with martial law ruling in the city, and the inhabitants in a state of passive revolt, it was utterly improbable that trade could be resumed, or cotton come down from the interior.

Public attention was also recalled to the question of destroying cotton and other produce by the publication of a letter from J. P. Benjamin, the Confederate Secretary of State. In it he replied to questions addressed to him, that it was the settled determination of the Government to destroy all cotton, sugar, or tobacco that was likely to fall into Federal hands, wherever the ownership might reside, and that a foreign flag would afford no protection. Further advices were also received of the extensive destruction of cotton at Memphis, and other points along the Mississippi. To this intelligence was added the news of a repulse of General Pope's column, near Corinth, with an uneasy feeling at New York regarding the result of the great battle impending in that quarter between Beauregard and Halleck.

The general result of all these advices was to give a strong bias to public feeling in favour of cotton, and holders generally advanced their quotations 3d. per lb.; but the demand scarcely answered their expectations, spinners still held back, and the sales only reached 5000 bales, establishing a full ½ advance on Surats, and scarcely so much on American cotton. On Tuesday, with sales of 4000 bales, the market was firm, and in Manchester the tone was rather better, but to-day the demand has become more active under the Etna's advices. By her little of consequence is announced, but in the present state of our market, the absence of news is in favour of holders, and the sales reach 8000 bales, at extreme prices for both, American and Surats closing on the basis of 12d. for Middling Uplands, 12½d. for Mobies, and 12½d. for Orleans. Fair Dhollerahs are worth 83d. and middling fair, 73d. to 74d.

In looking at the cotton question, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that the prospects of future supply are becoming more and more gloomy; the struggle in America is daily becoming deadlier, and is drawing into its vortex all the fiercest passions of human nature. The evidence is multiplying fast that the Southern people will flinch from no extremity to dissolve the hated tie, and there seems no reasonable doubt that the great bulk of their cotton will be destroyed wherever the invaders approach. On the other hand, it is equally evident that a wild desire for conquest and revenge is fast hurrying away the Northern people from the conservative principles on which they commenced the war. There are ominous tokens that, as a last resort, they are preparing to try the fatal expedient of rousing the slaves and kindling the flames of a servile war. It is alleged that arrangements are being made for arming and equipping negro regiments to aid in the Federal occupation of the Southern ports, and to-day the astounding report seems to be confirmed that General Hunter has actually proclaimed the abolition of slavery in the Atlantic States. It is believed that his action (if truly stated) will be disavowed by the President; still it shows plainly the drift of Northern feelings, and the extreme danger that before long it will overleap all conservative barriers.

It need not be added to those acquainted with American affairs that if a servile insurrection is introduced into the arena of strife the consequences would be appalling; the whole framework of Southern society would be dislocated, and atrocities enacted at which humanity would shudder.

We must not, however, be understood to predict so disastrous an issue; still it would be wrong to conceal that the danger is hourly coming nearer, and it is one that is fraught with terrible consequences to the cotton trade of this country.

There is a rumour on 'Change to-day that Beauregard has gained another great victory, but it has not obtained much credence. News is also to hand from Bombay, reporting an important advance both in cotton and goods.

MANCHESTER, May 27th, 1862.

The day following my last report, the news per North American, reporting extensive burning of cotton in all parts of the Southern States, where Federal occupation had taken place, revived the drooping tendency of the Liverpool cotton market, and a great portion of the heavy decline in the raw material recovered on that day.

Our market here, however, had only been effected to a small extent by the quietness in Liverpool, and the influence in prices was only to create a little more firmness on the part of holders, who had on the previous day manifested a desire to sell; the aggregate business of the week is generally reported to be small. Shipowners were not able to obtain an advance in yarns equivalent to the rise in cotton, though they were able to improve their position a little by reducing stocks. The prices of yarns, such as are required by Blackburn manufacturers, and also of doubled yarns, were rather better, but the week closed with the same quiet, sluggish aspect as before. The chief business during the week for cloth has been in shirtings for India, but few sales have been made; in other descriptions of cloths sales have been very limited.

Our market to-day, owing to the firmness in Liverpool, has recovered slightly from the depression which prevailed on Saturday, and both spinners and manufacturers are very firm in price. Few transactions, however, have been entered into, as buyers still hold back from operating to any extent, and a quiet aspect consequently prevails. The exports of cloth to our Eastern markets are falling off rapidly, shipments for five months ending the 16th inst. to nine of our principal markets show a decrease of 163,161,822 yards, as compared with last year, and of 156,238,154 yards against 1859, the greatest falling off being to Bombay and Shanghai. The latter shows a deficiency of over 70 per cent., and the aggregate shipments exhibited a decrease of 40 per cent., as compared with 1861.

COTTON.—Cotton is the all-absorbing feature of the day. Everybody talks about it. It is associated with war, peace, and trade. Misery is referred to it; prosperity is hoped for it; and the price affects the operative speculators, merchants, and bankers. After all, the universal interest is their interest, and in the desire of peace is involved the universal interest. All must, therefore, hope for peace, and with it a plentiful supply of cotton, as an ultimate remedy to the present distress now unhappily increasing around us.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRICES CURRENT.

(From the latest received Confederate Papers.)

HEAVY SALE OF STOCKS, BONDS, &c.—The assets of the Freeman's Insurance Company were sold on April 17, at the Exchange, Charleston, by Mr. J. S. Riggs, with the following result:

58,000 dols. City of Charleston 6 per cent. Stock—par 100 dols.; sold at 90 dols. to 92 dols. 50 cents.
32,000 dols. City of Savannah 7 per cent. Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold at 98 dols. to 98 dols. 25 cents.
12,000 dols. City of Columbia 6 per cent. Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold at 96 dols. 50 cents to 98 cents.
5,000 dols. City of Memphis 6 per cent. Bonds, guaranteed by Railroads—par 100 dols.; sold at 90 dols. to 91 dols. 75 cents.
2,000 dols. City of Memphis 6 per cent. Bonds, not guaranteed—par 100 dols.; sold at 80 dols.
5,000 dols. State of South Carolina 6 per cent. Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold at 100 dols. to 100 dols. 25 cents.
23,000 dols. Memphis and Charleston 7 per cent. first mortgage Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold at 103 dols. to 103 dols. 25 cents.

20,000 dols. Memphis and Ohio Railroad Company 10 per cent. Bonds, payable in Charleston—par 100 dols.; sold at 71 dols. to 72 dols. 50 cents.

8,000 dols. North-Eastern Railroad Company 7 per cent. Bonds, first mortgage—par 100 dols.; sold at 101 dols. 25 cents to 101 dols. 50 cents.

2,000 dols. North-Eastern Railroad Company 7 per cent. Bonds, guaranteed by State—par 100 dols.; sold at 102 dols. 25 cents.

2,500 South Carolina Railroad Company 6 per cent. Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold at 100 dols. 25 cents.

500 dols. South Carolina Railroad Company 7 per cent. Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold at 102 dols. 25 cents.

5,000 dols. Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company 7 per cent. Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold at 46 dols.

2,500 Spartanburg and Union Railroad Company 7 per cent. Bonds, guaranteed by State—par 100 dols.; sold at 96 dols. 50 cents. to 97 dols.

2,000 Montgomery and West Point Railroad Company 8 per cent. Bonds, payable in Charleston—par 100 dols.; sold at 108 dols.

1,000 dols. Charleston and Liverpool Steamship Stock sold for par.

BANK STOCKS.

600 shares Farmers' and Exchange Bank Stock—par 25 dols.; sold at 23 dols. 37½ cents to 23 dols. 50 cents.

300 shares People's Bank Stock—par 25 dols.; sold for 25 dols. 75 cents.

217 shares Union Bank Stock—par 50 dols.; sold for 50 dols. 75 cents to 51 cents.

115 shares South Carolina Railroad and Bank Stock—par 125 dols.; sold for 112 dols. 75 cents to 113 dols. 50 cents.

118 shares Bank of Charleston Stock—par 100 dols.; sold for 102 dols.

34 half shares Bank of Charleston—par 50 dols.; sold for 52 dols.

92 shares Bank of South Carolina Stock—par 45 dols.; sold for 43 dols.

62 shares State Bank of South Carolina Stock—par 25 dols.; sold for par.

15 shares Bank of Chester (S. C.) Stock—par 25 dols.; sold for 32 dols.

ADDITIONAL SALES.

111 shares South Carolina Railroad and Bank Stock—par 125 dols.; sold for 112 dols. 62½ cents to 112 dols. 87½ cents.

111 half shares South Carolina Railroad Stock—par 50 dols.; sold for 42 dols.

42 shares State Bank Stock—par 25 dols.; sold for 24 dols. 75 cents.

2 Bonds of the City of Memphis, bearing 6 per cent. interest, sold for 80 dols. on the 100 dols.

27 first Mortgage North Eastern Railroad Company 7 per cent. Bonds, sold for par.

6500 dols. City of Savannah 7 per cent. Bonds—par 100 dols.; sold for 94 dols. 87½ cents to 95 dols.

MARRIAGES AND DEATHS.

MARRIED.

On the evening of the 10th April, at the residence of the bride's father, by the Rev. J. Mood, Mr. W. F. Hatch to Miss Melissa Hatch, all of Charleston.

DIED.

Died, in Charleston, April 12th, 1862, Mrs. E. M. Hanahan, wife of the late John Hanahan, of Edisto Island, aged 55 years, 1 month, and 4 days.

On April 23, of consumption, at the dwelling of his mother, 199, Biddle-street, near Ross, Baltimore, Dr. Charles Walter, aged 28 years, nine months and two days.

On Tuesday morning, April 22nd, at Baltimore, George Watchman, aged 56 years.

On Friday, April 18th, at Fort Delaware, private Edward H. Hanks, of Company K, 23d Regiment Va. Volunteers.

On Saturday, April 19th, at Fort Delaware, private E. L. Horne, of Company F, 37th Regiment Va. Volunteers.

The deceased were both Virginians, and, at the time of their death, were prisoners of war, having been captured in the late battle at Winchester. The exposure incident to army life in the winter, had implanted in the physical constitutions of these young men the seeds of disease, which, in both cases, rapidly assumed symptoms of a typhoid nature, baffling the efforts of medical skill and attention.

On April 21st, at Baltimore, of typhoid fever, Caroline C. Bryer, aged 28 years.

On April 21st, at Baltimore, Mary Feudrich, aged 18 years and 5 months.

On April 21st, at Baltimore, Benjamin F. Stanton, in the 30th year of his age.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

LIVERPOOL, May 28th.

By an arrival from Nassau we have dates from Charleston to 27th ult., and we send you herewith some late newspapers.

We hand you for publication an extract from a letter written to us by W. H. Young, Esq., President of the Bank of Columbus, Ga., a gentleman of high standing and position, and in correspondence with a large portion of the cotton region. Without giving other extracts, we may say that the whole of our private letters breathe but one spirit of determined and uncompromising resistance. At Charleston an attack was expected and prepared for.

I would remark that our planting time is at hand, but the necessities of our Confederacy, and prudence for our wants, have determined our planters to put the land in corn for support of ourselves and our army. A very large majority of planters will not plant any cotton; a few will plant a few acres for fresh seed. My opinion (based on daily intercourse with planters, and letters from various sections) is, that not one-eighth of a planting will be made this year; and as the torch is ready to burn any that may probably fall in the hands of our detested enemies, you may safely say, our present stocks will not be materially added to by this planting. Our country is aroused and determined to be free.

The following is from a merchant of New York, dated:—

NEW YORK, May 16th.

Things look dark for the South, but the end is not yet. They will not, they cannot, be subdued, and as for another reunion, it is impossible; the Federalists were awfully defeated at Shiloh, though it is differently represented here; but in truth, the Government despatches and the newspapers are nothing but lies; there is no truth in official statements or newspaper reports. No one dares to tell the truth, nor express any adverse opinions; as odious a tyranny exists here as ever did in Naples. Loyalty has become servility, and my opinion is, the result of the contest will be utter confusion at the North, and, perhaps, destruction of the South. The report to-day is, that Richmond is occupied by the Federalists; this may be, for the Confederates will scarcely risk a battle. They will do all they can to save their army, will continue to retreat into the interior, and will ultimately, I believe, be successful. They acted wisely to leave Yorktown. Business is dead here, except with those connected with the Government: all thus favoured are getting rich, more by fraud than work.

The six extracts which follow are from the private and business correspondence of a prominent City firm, by whom they are courteously placed at our disposal. We invite special attention to those written from Tennessee and Kentucky, under the eyes, as it were, of the Federal soldiery that holds a temporary possession of those States.

NEW YORK, May 13th.

We believe that the destruction of cotton, tobacco, and sugar, at New Orleans, was enormous. We wish we could write to you more satisfactorily about business than we do. To us, everything looks black. There are wisacres who do give opinions as to the future, and, in most instances, it takes about a week to upset their theories; so we venture none.

BALTIMORE, May 5th.

We hear this morning that Yorktown has been evacuated by the Confederates. We might give you the reason, but you will hear in due time. We think Washington is now in more danger than Richmond. The South will not be in fighting condition till she has lost her entire seaboard.

CLARKSVILLE, TENNESSEE, April 29th.

Production in the Border States will be much less than usual. Virginia is now in a most deplorable and critical state. All her energies are devoted to her defence. She may be overrun, but carnage and destruction will mark her fall. The scenes of war are being removed farther and farther South of us. Much blood has already flowed, many thousand lives sacrificed, and tens of thousands maimed and disabled in battles near the Mississippi and Alabama lines lately, and I fear this is only the initiative of the horrible carnage that this cruel and most unnecessary war is causing. Ruin and destruction to every section is inevitable. Peace and reconstruction impossible; and when generations have passed away, the same embittered and relentless feeling will exist. Pecuniary and material losses, beggaring enumeration as they will, can only be as an atom in creation compared with the moral effects, when the foundations of society are broken up, and all social relations rent asunder, and the children taught, as they are and will be, to curse the authors of the terrible calamities of their ancestors.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, April 14th.

In my last I told you I received in January the dividends in your Virginia State Stock, and have deposited the amount in bank. You must endeavour to tell me what to do with this money, for if I don't hear from you when July comes round, I may think it best not to collect the interest, because the owners might think the State safer to be trusted than a bank.

The preparations to defend this city and vicinity are quite equal to anything that has existed during the war; the enemy seems to threaten us from the mouths of the rivers, rather than from towards Washington, therefore Manassas has been evacuated, and the troops brought nearer. There are some 100,000 of as good soldiers as are to be found in America, and they will fight desperately before they will allow the city to be occupied. The tobacco warehouses are filled, and the destruction will be very great, rather than allow the people of the United States to get such a quantity of what they want so much. The tobacco would be very valuable to them, though not so necessary as cotton. Exchange has gone up regularly. Sterling realized 75 per cent. premium a few days ago.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, April 14th.

The last year's crop of tobacco is said to be very inferior, and but little over half a crop. None brought to market, nor will it be until the blockade is raised, or we have peace. All tobacco and cotton will be burnt if any apprehension is entertained that they may fall into the hands of the enemy. Richmond is the object of the enemy, and we will not consent for them to have it.

HENDERSON, KENTUCKY, April 16th.

The continuance of the war, the end of which no man can foresee; its presence in the immediate sections east and west in which tobacco is chiefly grown; the great amount of labour which is necessarily drawn off from its culture—the white men to do the fighting (and they do it in earnest, too), and the negroes to take care of their teams, build fortifications, &c., &c.; the determination of the people of the South being, as I know it is, to sacrifice their time, their labour, and their all in defence of their homes and their firesides, added to the fact that many are so much depressed by the weight of cares which these great and unparalleled troubles have thrown around them, they are indifferent to everything,—all these causes, it would seem to me, must affect trade of every kind, and, perhaps, none more than that of the two great staples of the South—cotton and tobacco. As to the burning of any portion of those crops, or, indeed, all within reach of which the Northern army may approach, or which may be in danger of being confiscated, I have very little doubt but that in such a case it would be done, for I believe I speak the feeling of ninety-nine of every hundred of the Southern people, when I say they would prefer to apply the torch with their own hands, and burn or destroy in any way every dollar's worth of property they own, rather than that any portion of it should go, directly or indirectly, towards adding to the means which the North has of waging this unholy war against them; but we are in no such danger. You are right in supposing that the conquest of the South proper is as far off as ever; and I here tell you that it never will be done. Our old friend —, of New York, though, I daresay has advised you that its end is near. The people of the North are being deceived themselves, and wishing to deceive others, they do not know what they are about. The taking of Fort Donelson, which they think was a great victory, was a very small affair; the surrender since of Nashville, which followed of course, amounted to nothing in comparison with what it cost them, and had only induced them to follow on, and give the Confederates a fair fight in open field, and if the reports which are reaching us now from every quarter, are but half true, the bloodiest fight upon record has recently taken place near Corinth, a small town in the extreme north-eastern part of Mississippi, in which the South has, indeed, achieved a victory, thrashed them soundly, killing and disabling many thousands; but of this I cannot speak with any confidence, except that, judging from the tone of the leading journals of the North in this quarter, they do not claim a victory. No, my dear sir, your people must not believe the one-half of what they hear. Sad, though, as our own people are, I do not despair, though the sound of the cannon reaches my ears so often; our best men have been arrested and thrown into prison for the mere expression of their opinions; our homes have been invaded, our wives and children insulted by their soldiery, our property taken and destroyed or appropriated to their use, and some good men even have died of broken hearts; but, thank God, I do not hang my head. I will not bow my neck, except in submission to His will; before that is bowed to the will of a tyrant, my head will be under ground. As I have already said, I do not despair of the ultimate and complete success of the South, nor will they give up one foot of territory south of the Ohio River, from the point at which the Virginia line first strikes it, to its mouth, except, perhaps, a very small strip of that State running north of the Northern boundary of Maryland. All the States which naturally belong to us must come in. We did not wish to separate; we sought every compromise to avoid it, but none would do, save unconditional surrender to their views, the giving up of all our interests into their unholy hands; and now the South will fight it out until their independence is acknowledged, or the last man of them will perish in their attempt.

No man's heart can fail to admire the spirit of cheerful self-devotion and noble courage which the following letter breathes, written from a devastated home—stead by a young Virginia lady to a near relative in Europe:—

WINCHESTER, May 5th, 1862.

MY DEAR —,

I wish I could give you favourable accounts of dear old Scotia; how often have I regretted that I had not taken the responsibility of applying a torch when I paid my last visit there, that it might have been preserved from desecration. The Yankees have injured your property as much as they could; all the woodwork has been pulled down, and portions sent North as trophies; Seward came up to see the battle-field, and it is said he took away half of one of the Selma mantles; I do not know whether this is true. The fences are all down, but the trees are still uninjured.

I am in an embarras des richesses (if such a term can be applied to such tilings), to know what to tell you, what to leave untold I will make my letter alternate shadow and sunshine, and tell you now of our glorious little battle of Winchester, as an antidote to my sad accounts of Selma; we have all been taught the lesson, that private must be sacrificed to public good, and I am proud to say, how cheerfully we yield to the necessity. I sent a full account of the occupation of Winchester, and of the battle, to the Inquirer, but I do not know whether you see our papers. I will give you the numbers, and you can decide which side was victorious. Jackson had not a man over 3000; the Yankees had 12,000. Jackson's loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, was 415; the Yankees certainly over 2000. The battle was fought near Neal's Dam. Shields had been wounded the evening before the battle, in a skirmish with Ashby's cavalry; but he directed the battle by despatches.

Banks was in town; but he ordered a hasty cup of tea, and went to Harper's Ferry as soon as the fighting commenced. Jackson had been misinformed as to the numbers here, and expected to be able to drive the Yankees away — Burwell, Randolph Barton, and Walter Barton are among the prisoners; they are at Fort Delaware, near Philadelphia. Since the battle, the Yankees have been largely reinforced, and have about 30,000 men. Jackson has been gradually drawing them up the valley, and with not half the number of men, kept them in check till now, when we hear he has been reinforced, and is coming down nearer Winchester. Banks is in command, and it is said he will not fight. There is evidently some panic to-day; officers and couriers are dashing about, and we hear rumours that the commander here is to be sent away. We expect every day to hear of a battle in the valley. Turner Ashby has become a terror to the Yankees, and he has performed prodigies of valour. He has been made General.

You will ask how we have borne our captivity—bravely. We have not yielded an inch, and the Yankees say they have never been treated with such scorn and contempt as by the Winchester women; not one has been secured as a visitor in a single house except at —, whose husband is with McClellan; in consequence of her recognizing them not a lady has called on her. They have made various efforts to get in my house, but not one has crossed the threshold of the door. . . . They came to search the house, and when I told them to bring a superior officer, with his authority for such an act, a dashing young dandy, with all his finery, came to address me "as a gentleman" to give it up. I kept him standing on the porch steps, and talked to him through the window. He argued, but to no purpose, and it would have been difficult to say which of us was in the greatest rage. He at being foiled in his attempt, and treated like a menial, and I at having to tolerate his presence, even for a few moments. Captain — called to bring a message from friends in Western Virginia, but he was not received, and I have managed to keep them at bay up to the present time. I cannot tolerate their presence, and will starve sooner than take them in. Starving is not a figure of speech, it is becoming a stern reality. We have no market, the market-house is converted into a stable; almost every horse in the country has been stolen, and the country people do not come to town with supplies but at intervals. So you see starvation is at hand. Still, we are cheerful and hopeful, and work in the garden, and anticipate living on its products till Jackson comes to liberate us. I expect him on the 1st of June.

The fences have been destroyed for miles round in every direction, and all the way up the valley they have been burnt for firewood. I could write volumes were I to tell you all they have done. The Court-house, hotel, warehouses, and every empty house in town have been taken possession of. Dr. —'s house is headquarters. At first the Yankees tried to conciliate, and made very fair promises, but as only two or three of the gentlemen of the town would meet their advances, they are becoming every day more insolent and overbearing.

I know you will be glad to hear of the high stand your old friend, Dr. — has taken; he scorns the Yankees, and does not hesitate to avow it on all occasions; he refuses to prescribe for them, and was arrested for it, but — interceded, and he was released. Mr. — is also one of our warmest sympathisers; he has been unflinching in his resistance to the encroachments of the enemy; he told Banks that if a Yankee came on his premises he would shoot him. Messrs. — and some few others adopt the temporising policy, and say it is best to be polite and not to irritate them. But I find these wretches have more respect for the fearless Secessionists than for the temporisers.

A large number of Germans have been brought over to this country to fight our boys. Blenker's division has been in this neighbourhood, and our streets resound with a confusion of tongues; one regiment called the Garibaldi's Guard, is composed of Spaniards, Italians, and other foreigners. They have been most barbarous in their depredations. At Mr. —, they took every article of furniture, and even wearing apparel out of the house, and snatched the rings off Mr. —'s fingers. Their servants were faithful, and not one could be induced to leave them. The poor deluded creatures are cheated by promises of entire freedom, exemption from labour, &c. I have just heard from one of Bank's officers; he says that Banks will not fight; his only object is to run off the negroes.

You would feel sorry for us if you knew the thousand rumours to which we are the prey; we only see the Northern papers and hear the stories that come through their army. Yorktown, according to their accounts, has been captured several times. They are all the time circulating reports of great victories, but I have become a perfect sceptic, believing nothing except the Bible. Yorktown and Corinth are the grand objects of interest now. If we defeat them at these two places, and the yellow fever raises its black flag at New Orleans, we may make our own terms. Why is England so slow? why did she not come boldly forward and take the initiative instead of waiting for France? Mercier has been to Richmond and got the ultimatum of our Government, about burning the cotton on hand and raising only a very limited supply for the future. We are to hear by the 15th. The English papers are rather more favourable than they have been — le bon temps viendra.

Our task-masters are grinding us down, but we are not a bit subjugated. When they led the prisoners past our door for the cars, en route to Fort Delaware, I cheered them and hurraed for Jefferson Davis, in the hearing of the officers guarding them. The Provost Marshal is very much enraged at the constant communication we keep up with the army, but he cannot detect our emissaries. He has some of the detective police here to find out our underground, but this threat of being arrested only adds to the pleasure of writing. We are dreadfully demoralized, and I fear we will never be refined, gentle, retiring women again. We have had too many dangers, to place ourselves in such unexpected positions, that I fear we are sadly deteriorated. Mild epithets are too feeble to express the feelings which are perpetually nursed, and we unconsciously adopt the Billingsgate style. For two weeks after the battle we went daily to the Yankee hospitals to nurse our own wounded men, and had to share our delicacies with the poor miserable Yankees, and to be civil to their surgeons and officials, to ensure their being kind to our men. The horrible sights, and sounds of that period will haunt me through life.

I have written you a gossiping letter, and still find that much remains unsaid. Grannie covered herself with honour and glory last winter, while she clothed the Confederates in homespun. I am sure this mantle will be far more durable than theirs, for it is composed of the heartfelt gratitude of a hundred of our soldiers. Miss Grannie was their guardian angel, and she well deserved the praises they bestowed; for she was indefatigable, in originating and helping into active operation several societies formed for their benefit. I worked under her, as a humble assistant, though my home duties and attendance at the hospitals engrossed a large share of my time.

You will be glad to hear that Winchester has come out bravely. There is far less Union feeling here now than before the Yankees came; and the two or three who venture to sympathize with our enemies are treated with the utmost scorn, even by those who, a few months since, were of the same opinion. It is delightful to see how the Yankees are working their new men; they have abandoned the false pretence of fighting for the "Glorious Union" the "Stars and Stripes," under which Washington did (not) fight, and have shown the cloven foot; "emancipation," is now their war cry, and they are arming the slaves in the South to keep down the rebellion during the summer, when they are afraid of disease. The consequence is, the breach is widening between the two parties, and the representatives, still in Congress, from the Border States, are threatening to withdraw. Everything is working for us. Georgia and South Carolina are pouring their troops into Virginia. They say Savannah and Charleston may be taken, but that Richmond must be defended Virginia must be free. I never felt so hopeful as at this very moment. I was out this evening and found they are excited and eager, all feeling the great struggle was at hand. Those who were discouraged yesterday at the rumour of the evacuation of Yorktown, knew to-day that if true, it was a great strategic movement to get out of the way of the gunboats, and to draw McClellan beyond the fortifications on which such an amount of money and labour has been bestowed. Davis, Johnson, and Lee, were on the spot, and decided it was best and I do not doubt it. I believe Yorktown, or its vicinity, will be the scene of another triumph, far surpassing that which made the spot memorable in our first revolution. I never regretted, till now, that I am a woman; but it is hard to sit quiet and do nothing for my country when my nerves thrill with excitement at the remembrance of our gallant little armies—small, compared with the hordes of hirelings brought to oppose them.

I am charged with innumerable messages from every member of my family. They all unite in words of love and tenderness to dear —. — says, I must tell you she is the best kind of a rebel, and that she is not a whit subjugated. The Yankees are very much insulted because we never call them by any other name, while we are proud of being called rebels and Secessionists. They consider the term Yankee one of reproach, and the veriest down-Easter resents the epithet. The officers also complain about the dress of the ladies, who have laid aside all but their oldest and shabbiest dresses, and go out in old fashioned sun-bonnets, such as children wear to protect their complexion: the double veils also aggravate them. The Reverend Mr. Meredith, our former pastor, is captain of —'s company; — has married a rich wife, and retired from the army, being disabled for life by the wound he received at Manassas.

We have glorious news this evening of Jackson; he has received reinforcements which makes his army number 40,000. We shall soon be free. Good bye, God bless you dear —.

The intelligence contained in the subjoined letter, if correct, is of peculiar significance. Who is to be threatened by the wholesale conversion of an immense merchant marine into fleets of privateers? The Confederates, who have not a ship on the ocean, or England, whose sails whiten every sea, and whom it is the darling hope of every thorough-bred Federalist to humble when the great rebellion shall be crushed and quenched out?

BALTIMORE, April 22nd, 1862.

DEAR MR. —.

I wrote a very long letter to my old and valued friend, Colonel —, and sent it by private hand from Washington early last December, giving much information it imported him to know, and truths he could not get from other sources in this age and region of lies. I asked him to point out how I could write frequently and safely; wishing to make myself useful by photographing from day to day the marvellous events that are hourly transpiring in our free and happy country; but no answer has been received yet by me. I wrote another very long letter to the Colonel after I got here, which I have tried in vain to get sent to Europe. Mrs. — attempted to send it and failed also. It is still in her hands. Another lady here says she will make an effort to send a line to you from me, if I will write briefly, and not put too much treason in it. It is impossible for me to write in any other dialect, if I write at all.

You will see how abolition, which has been for thirty years undermining our poor country, is now rapidly destroying itself and all who sustained or connived at it. It has already justified and vindicated the South, and a terrible retribution is nigh. The "Young Napoleon" is in a trap. Before this reaches you (if it ever does), you will hear he and the grand army are cut to pieces, or have passed "under the Caudine forks" of Old Virginia. Another such victory as that of Shiloh, or Pittsburg Landing, and the Mississippi will be clear, and Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee free; and the time will come when poor Maryland also will be liberated from the galling despotism which now tramples her down. It is mockery to talk of Union feeling at the South. What little existed at the beginning of the war has long since utterly disappeared. Certain reverses have been a blessing to the South, which is now at last in earnest. There will be no mistakes in future!

I have much to tell you, if I only had a safe channel through which to send it. As it is, I can only say, "Be of good cheer. Let not your heart be troubled."

This is Sunday, the day when, generally, rumours fly about like bats in twilight. I give you a specimen:—"That the Yankees are about to abandon, as hopeless, the attack on Yorktown, to make one elsewhere, and that the Confederates are evacuating their works to counteract the movement menacing Fredericksburg." Again,—"That an important movement has been made by the Yankee gunboats on York River." Again,—"That the Southern Confederacy is to be acknowledged at once, and that Baltimore will be to-morrow placed under strictest martial law, to stifle any attempt to break the Northern claims and unite with successful rebellion, &c., &c." A circular has just emanated from a Congress Committee to all newspapers, requesting earnestly a publication and commendating notices. It proposes to convert all sea-going merchant vessels into a war marine, with commissioned officers on board, and guns, to be paid for by Congress, thus creating a gigantic privateer navy for Government. The circular bears date of M. Mercier's late visit to Richmond, which has been discussed; threaded in and out of the public journals. It forms a sort of political puzzle for grown-up children.

A few years since, eighty millions of dollars of national debt was looked on as a national calamity. If "honest old Abe" runs his four years, we shall have, at least, four thousand millions of indebtedness. This is a trifle, now money can be coined from rags. Chase has found Aladdin's Lamp, and discovered Monte Christo's Cave. Salmon P. beats Llewellyn of Mississippi Bubble memory, all hollow. Assignats and Continental cash revive. Shin bangles are ballion. Great is Allah, and Ahs Lincoln is his prophet!

The proceedings of the Yankee Congress, I take it, must be looked on by Englishmen of sense in very much the same light as their progenitors regarded the doings and sayings of the National Convention of France, in the worst paroxysms of their Revolution. What would De Tocqueville say of Yankee democracy now? What would Burke's "Reflections" be on our "Revolution?" The Puritans will soon abolish the Almighty. They combine the malignities of Thucydide's pestilence of Athens, and Boccaccio's and De Foe's plagues of Florence and London—the yellow fever and the cholera.

I hope you have seen W. B. Reed's critique on Seward's diplomatic correspondence; it is caustic, but not half as much as it might have been made.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAINE, May 25th, 1862.

MR. EDITOR,—Being in receipt of letters and papers from Texas up to the 19th March, I herewith do myself the pleasure of sending such as I think may be of service to the good cause in this country, and will assure the few Texans scattered over Europe, that the "Lone Star" State is true to her antecedents, and worthy of those men who, at the Alamo, at Goliad, and at San Jacinto, shed their blood in defence of liberty, and the sacred right of self-government. The Telegraph is edited by a gentleman from New England, and you may judge, by the copy which I send, of the amount of "Union sentiment" entertained by the Southern citizens of Northern birth in Texas. The Captain McGregor alluded to as the inventor of a new bayonet, is a native of Scotland, but has lived in Texas many years, and was the first to hoist a "Secession Flag"—which flag was nothing else than the old Texas flag—in Houston.

You will see that Southerners, at least, do not look upon the Battle of Pea Ridge as unimportant, or of doubtful result, as the first report in the Herald had it.

The enclosed letter has been too long on the way to contain news; but it contains what is better, evidences of the feeling which animates our people, not in Texas alone, but in every State of the Confederacy.

Perhaps my father's letter may be better appreciated when I tell you that he is an old man, not given to "new-fangled notions" of any kind, and a man peculiarly unbiased by the opinions of other people. Heart and soul a democrat, as we in the Confederacy understand democracy, a devoted partizan of liberty, when consistent with, and accompanied by, order and law; the man who, when all was chaos and speculation in Mississippi, in 1837 or 1839 introduced into the House of Representatives of that State, the law making a woman's property her own, and not liable to seizure for her husband's debts,—the enthusiasm of such a man for our cause, his hopefulness of its result, and determination never to yield till our cause is won, must have its weight.

I received, Saturday last, the fourth number of THE INDEX. Wishing you every success in your new enterprise, and thanking you for the words of good cheer, which are, indeed, balm to a lonely woman whose very heart bleeds for her country in her dark-bour,

I remain, Z.

HOUSTON, TEXAS, March 17, 1862.

MY DEAR CHILDREN,—I wrote to you a few days since, giving you some account of our reverses, and we all wrote about home, and I sent you four copies of the Telegraph. I hope you got them. Your last received was from the 20th December. I enclose you the Telegraph Extra, which gives an account of a glorious naval victory on the Potomac, and a hard-earned victory in Arkansas. We have an account by land of the latter victory. Poor Ben McCulloch is killed, and is universally mourned. Our reports say we killed and wounded from 10,000 to 12,000, and, as they were retreating, a large number of prisoners, &c., were taken. Before that fight we had cut off and taken 250 waggons, teams, provisions, &c. The clouds are breaking, and behind them is the face of a smiling Providence. The Southern Confederacy has become a praying people, and tens of thousands of prayers are daily ascending to the ruler and governor of nations for His favour. And the country is all in a blaze of excitement and enthusiasm. None will be left in Texas but the women, children, and old and infirm men, to defend her soil. We have about 20,000 in the field, and 20,000 more are preparing to go.

Our reverses have had a magic effect in arousing the people, but we are to have a dreadful war. Our enemy are now fighting to make us pay their immense debt of one thousand million of dollars. Their existence as a people depends upon the result. So does ours. We trust in God and the justice of our cause. The defeat at Fort Donnellson was owing to our generals. If Pillow had telegraphed Johnson for reinforcements, we would have got the victory. As it was, we killed between 6000 and 8000; our own loss was heavy, without counting the 6000 with whom Buckner had to surrender when all further defence became hopeless. If we can defend the Mississippi valley, all will be right. Beauregard and Bragg are in that region. The Federals took Nashville without resistance, another faux pas of Johnson, I think; but the citizens are with us, and we are raising an army sufficient to retake it. The people have lost confidence in Johnson. But the most glorious of all is our naval victory on the Potomac. I think all will end well, but as Jacob's prayer was heard, and his sins nevertheless punished by the withering of his thigh, so I expect we will be punished for our sins as a people; that our pride and idolatry may be subdued. So S — and D — are gone to Missouri, also Major H — R —, F — and J — are at the Island now. I expect F — will be ordered off in a few days. So the old trunk will be stripped of its branches, for awhile at least. Captain K — is General of the militia. Everything but negro hire is at war prices. Lubbock, as I told you, has declined to send the State bonds abroad. We have not been attacked. Property is still very high. Coffee is 65 cents. per lb., flour 7 dollars and 50 cents per hundred, bacon 20 cents. per lb., salt from 5 to 9 cents. New buildings are going up. Skin plasters in abundance.

T. W. House is our Mayor; George Erving and J. Massie, tax collectors; Matthews, Marshall, N. Taylor, H. Fisher, S. Thomas Loyd, Flock, Anders, and Fleish, our aldermen.

Houston, owing to the number of soldiers camped near, has been a brisk place all winter. I have not seen T, though he has been once or twice. We have had one of the mildest and pleasantest winters I ever saw. Be of good cheer. God will, in his own time, give us peace, and I trust we will all meet again at our old home. If not, let us endeavour to meet where there is no wars, no sin, and no parting. I write in haste, and send by Vera Cruz. We have ceased to look to Foreign Powers for recognition. Very little cotton will be planted, as we have nowhere to sell it, and must depend on ourselves for food and raiment.

May God bless you both affectionately. Your father,
T. B. J. H. —.

Foreign Correspondence.

Paris, May 27, 1862.

The extraordinary warmth with which the Mexican question is now being discussed by the Paris organs of the press goes a great way to confirm the floating rumours of last week. The Moniteur has kept silent upon the subject; but while the opposition journals, such as the Opinion Nationale, the Temps, and the Journal des Débats violently attack the course pursued by the French officers and Minister in Mexico, the Imperial organs unanimously approve their policy, as being the only one in accordance with the true spirit of the agreement entered into by the three allied Powers.

The reasons which have prompted England and Spain to stand by the Soledad convention, and to abandon France at the critical moment, are considered here as very unsatisfactory. Evidently the expedition had been combined with the sole view of exacting from the unscrupulous Government of Mexico the performance of its often violated pledges, to redress the wrongs inflicted upon inoffensive citizens of England, Spain, and France, and certainly not for the mere purpose of obtaining other sham promises, as soon to be broken as the last French soldier would have left Mexico.

Be this as it may, the war declaration of Juarez, and the murder perpetrated upon several of the French soldiers, have excited a strong sentiment of indignation, and roused the national pride to its acme. It was reported yesterday, that the Emperor had been informed of the existence of a secret treaty lately entered into by Mexico and the United States, by virtue of which Lincoln is to provide Juarez with 20,000 men, and 50,000,000 francs, upon a pledge to the United States of all the Government lands of Mexico. It was further asserted that this information had decided the Emperor to send at once a reinforcement corps of 30,000 men to Vera Cruz.

The anti-national clamours of the opposition journals above named against this measure will prove vain and powerless, for the simple reason that their peculiar positions, and motives for combating it, are fully known to the public.

Ever since the outbreak of the American war, the Opinion Nationale is considered by all the persons connected with the Parisian press as the regular organ of the United States' Government. It is said to draw all its information from the United States' Minister to France. And, indeed, this assertion needs no great demonstration, for anyone who will take the trouble to read it will easily recognize in its columns the same mischievous influence which has transformed the Washington Cabinet into a wholesale fabric of impostures, and its agents, both home and abroad, into imbecile servants of a mendacious despotism.

Now to the subject-matter. The Temps is nothing more than a branch of the Journal des Débats. It works in the same cause and fights the same battles.

This general outline suffices, I believe, to show how little these newspapers can bear upon the policy of the Imperial Government, especially when they are detected so wantonly sacrificing the safety of their own countrymen and the national honour of France to their own interests and selfish political purposes.

One thing is certain, however, they will nobly continue to clamour against the Mexican expedition, with the hope of paralyzing the action of the Government, and of checking the progress of the military preparations which are reported as being made to reinforce the French army of Mexico. They feel conscious, as everyone else does here, that it is almost an impossibility for France to avoid a collision with the United States on the Mexican ground; they know that one of the first moves of the Emperor will probably be to recognize the Confederate States of America, so as to make them a bulwark against the everlasting grasping ambition of the North for political and geographical aggrandizement. They know that France is never stronger, more powerful, and better able to carry out her purposes, as when disenthralled from the slow and unreliable movements of unsteady allies; they are aware that the recognition of the Southern States by France would, in dealing a mortal blow to the North, crush the aspirations of its royal lieutenants: Inde Ite.

The American and Mexican questions are clearly linked together in the mind of the Emperor, for at the same time that some of the semi-official sheets urgently appeal to the Government to protect the property, the life and honour of the French citizens actually residing in Mexico, others, among which figure the Constitutionnel, are engaged in a staunch editorial campaign in favour of the Southern States. A few days more will, undoubtedly bring to light the final determination of the Emperor.

For one, I shall be very much astonished if its character does not realize the worst apprehensions of the North.

The ferocious and wilful destruction of property all along the banks of the Mississippi has done more to advance the cause of the South in Europe than twenty victories gained. The glare of the bonfires lighted by undaunted patriotism has thrown a vivid light upon the unanimous resolution of the South to die or maintain the independence bequeathed to them by their fathers.

The whole American question now resolves itself into such narrow limits, that its solution can hardly be delayed much longer.

Can France and England, the two great leading nations of civilization, permit this wholesale destruction of property, which forms an important part of the common wealth of Europe, to proceed without making an effort to check it?

Will France and England continue to remain cool and indifferent spectators of the wholesale murder of millions of their own grandsons, without attempting to arrest the evil at its source?

I honestly think not.

The seizure of the English steamer Bermuda, sailing under English colours, in English waters, and the impudent declaration of Captain Stilwage, to the effect that the English port of Nassau was actually blockaded by the Federal navy, produced but little or no excitement in Paris. This new feature of the American war is looked upon as the natural consequence of the magnanimous forbearance with which the British Cabinet has so heroically sacrificed, up to this time, the most interesting portion of their own population, both to their aristocratic India cotton schemes, and to the hollow rules of an imaginary neutrality. Nevertheless, French curiosity watches closely the movements of the English Foreign Secretary; but I am sorry to say that, though the French people does the English nation the justice to believe it disposed, willing, and anxious to avenge the already too many insults of Uncle Sam—cost what it may—they hesitate not to assert that Lord John Russell will protest against this new outrage offered to the English flag, and then declare himself satisfied with another of Seward's Trent crank-sided apologies. As for myself, I love England, that bright gem of the ocean so dearly, that I cannot help fostering the fond hope that her national sentiment will, in this instance, overrule the timorous policy of her Government, respond to the urgent appeals of the Emperor Napoleon, and sail together to bridle these modern barbarians, who, regardless of all laws, human and divine, seem determined to set the whole civilized world at defiance.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I have seen a letter from the War Department, dated as far back as the 26th of March last, to an officer of the Confederate States' Army, in Europe, stating that the whole plan of the campaign was based upon the hypothesis that all the water-courses and navigable streams would have to be abandoned, and all the coast and ports would have to fall into the hands of the enemy, with the possible exceptions of Savannah and Charleston, and that then only would the troops be concentrated in the interior, and the war brought on its proper and true basis.

It may, therefore, be safely asserted that the American war, far from being near its end, as assumed by the Northern press, is just about commencing.

From another Correspondent.

Paris, May 27, 1862.

The Emperor has opened the week with the nomination of three new senators. The first one elevated to this high dignity is the Commander-in-Chief of the French occupation corps d'armée, of Rome. "The General De Goyon," says the Imperial decree, "deserves this testimonial of our high satisfaction."

The second on the list is the Comte Chasseloup Laubat, the ephemeral Minister of Algeria and now Minister of the Navy. Inasmuch as your readers will be no doubt puzzled to discover the reasons which have induced the Emperor to confer upon him this mark of distinction, I may as well, to avoid them the trouble of a fruitless research, say that he was made a senator because his Excellency was the only one of the Emperor's Ministers who had, so far, been kept out of this honour.

The last one is Mr. Ingres, the celebrated painter. Born at Montauban on the 15th day of September, 1781, he began his pictorial studies at the age of fifteen years; at nineteen the second first prize, and at twenty the first prize, at the General Painting Concourse of Rome. This illustrious artist, now in his eighty-first year, has just produced a masterpiece of painting, representing Jesus before the Doctors, which draws the admiration of all artistic Paris. This beautiful painting is exposed at the private gallery of the Boulevard des Italiens.

Last Friday, the presence of the carriage of M. Thiers in the courtyard of the Tuileries, created quite a sensation among the politicians. Commentaries of all sorts rapidly spread over the good city of Paris, which was about getting into a fit, when it was found that the old Minister of King Louis Philippe, the national and illustrious historian, as he was publicly designated by the Emperor himself, on a certain occasion, had simply gone to the Chateau to return to the Vice-King Said-Pacha the visit which his Egyptian Majesty had honoured the historian with at his Hotel, Rue St. George.

Said-Pacha continues to be a great subject of astonishment for all those who approach him. He is said to be a profound statesman, a learned scholar, and a man of wit. He speaks very fluently the French language, and possesses all its finesses. Being asked by M. Thiers whether he had made a pleasant trip, "So-so," replied the Pacha; "we coaled at Naples and at Civita-Vecchia; the consequence was that our progress was much retarded; for these two combustibles, Italian and Roman, could not be made to burn together, notwithstanding all the coaxing of the firemen."

After the Japanese Ambassadors, after the Vice-King of Egypt, and before the Bey of Tunis, whose visit to England and France is now considered certain, here come other travellers, whose presence in Paris will, by no means, be the least curiosity of the season. These strangers are the Cheik Othman and two other Marabouts of the Saharian tribe of Touaregs, which extends, as you know, all over the Desert as far as the Tropics. This tribe commands the road to Sudan, and it protects, or plunders, as the case may be, the caravans going to or returning from the country of the Blacks. These dark personages have arrived at Marseilles; they wear over their faces a black veil, to keep off their eyes the powerful rays of the torrid sun.

The space overrun by the Touaregs forms about one-half the distance which separates the Equator from the Pole. This fact sufficiently explains their suffering from cold at this season of the year, and asking for thick overcoats, such as we use in full winter season. The Touaregs have, however, evident signs of great intelligence. It is said they have been particularly struck with the agglomeration of the European populations, and more especially so with the great care with which every parcel of land is cultivated. The sight of Paris, where they are daily expected, will, no doubt, considerably amaze our new guests, and make upon their minds such an impression as will excite their desire of facilitating the French trade with the dark regions of Equatorial Africa.

En attendant, other commercial treaties are now negotiating with England, Belgium, and the Zollverein. These new treaties, which are destined to give an additional development to French industry, will soon be perfected. This is not all; France seems determined to complete the commercial reform she has undertaken. She is now engaged in the study of her maritime laws. On the 2nd day of June next, the committee upon whom is devolved the duty to inquire into the actual condition of the French merchant marine, is to meet before the superior Commercial Council, under the presidency of his Excellency the Minister of Commerce. The questions of salvage and of flag surcharge are to be minutely examined and discussed, and such modifications as will be considered desirable suggested to the Emperor. M. Rouker's intelligent administration, his unremitting and yet unsuccessful efforts to place the French commercial and shipping interests on a par with those of the most favoured nations, have already finally linked his name to the glorious reign of Napoleon III. Indeed, he is one of its strongest pillars, for better than any of the friends of the Emperor he knows that the power of a nation progresses directly in the same proportion with its commercial extension. M. Rouker's name belongs now to French posterity, for it has become synonymous with commercial liberty. The importance which French commerce would derive from free trade is so well known to him, that he has, from the early stage of the American events, been a warm friend to the South.

The Empress, whose health has never been so good as it is now, has given up the idea of visiting the springs this year. She intends to take her abode at Fontainebleau during the Emperor's stay at Vichy. No general invitations are to be issued by the Empress, who has decided, it is said, to spend her time en petit comité. The Prince and Princess of Montenucci are mentioned as being among the very few guests who are to partake of the Imperial hospitality.

Letters from Italy state that the Italian Senate is about being constituted into a High Court of Justice to try the parties concerned at Lombard and Brescia. It is such the case, what is to become of Garibaldi? It will hardly be possible for the Government to make an exception in his favour, for he only persists in assuming the whole responsibility of this political movement.

From all that transpires about the visit of Prince Napoleon to his Royal father-in-law, it seems that, far from having been sent to Italy for the purpose of favouring the hopes of the people, his mission was, on the contrary, to check the too ardent demonstrations of the Italian Government with regard to Rome. The Prince's return to Paris is soon expected, and the early departure of General de Goyon for Rome has been announced to him by the Marechal Randon at a dinner party given in his honour. The Pope will, therefore, remain at the Vatican for some time to come. Thus end all the numberless rumours which the Prince Napoleon's trip had originated.

The last steamer from America has brought apparently unfavourable news for the South; but the items are so numerous, so apparently exaggerated, and so ingeniously contrived to carry the combined idea that the conquest of the South is a fait accompli, and the ports actually opened to European commerce, that the general impression prevails here that they were issued by the Washington Cabinet, in the form it comes to us, with the avowed purpose of checking the friendly feelings of France to the South.

P. B.

THE COTTON TRADE.

CIRCULAR OF MESSRS. NEILL BROTHERS.

MANCHESTER, May 23.

GENTLEMEN.—The real gravity of the American civil war has come at last to be generally understood, and we had hoped that we should not find it necessary to enter again into the political aspects of the cotton question.

For the first ten months of the war the prevailing ideas, against which we contended in order to awaken our friends to a true estimate of the critical position of the cotton trade, and the necessity of procuring supplies elsewhere than from America—were, as regards one party, that the Northern people were not in earnest, that they had no military strength, that their system of finance would speedily break down, and that they would then cry out for peace; and, as regards the other party, that the resources of the North were so enormous, when compared with those of the South, that the war could not last more than a very few months. Differing on every other point, the partisans of both sides in the contest agreed in this—that the war would be speedily over. Thirty to sixty days were generally assigned to its termination, and the longest term granted was ninety days. Especially was it demonstrated to be entirely impossible that the North could support an expenditure of two, three, or four million of dollars per day for a longer term, or make paper currency a legal tender, without driving gold to a fabulous premium, and the Government bonds to a proportionate discount; and "practical men," who combated these views, relying upon the vast material resources, ingenuity, and force of will of twenty millions of Anglo-Saxons, were commiserated for their ignorance of the true principles of finance.

But a great deal has been learned during the past three months. It has at last been discovered that the North is really in earnest. That the nation is staking its all upon the issue of this contest, and that "its all" means larger resources than have ever before been actively employed in war by any Power. It has also been found that there was room in the country for the increase of paper circulation authorized, and that the perfect unanimity and confidence of the people defeated those who speculated on a financial crisis, and even carried United States' stocks to a premium. Considerable as was our own faith in the national resources, we confess that, if we may judge by present appearances, we under-estimated them.

At the same time, it must be said for the Southerners, that, considering the enormous force brought against them, they have maintained their ground better than could have been anticipated. Had it been believed at the beginning of this struggle that they would have to contend against a force of 700,000 men, and an expenditure on the part of their enemies of two hundred millions sterling per annum, it could not have been supposed that thirteen months after the commencement of the war they would still be encamped within eighty miles of the Federal capital.

Those who at the beginning of this struggle looked for a long contest, relied not upon a presumed equality of the combatants in men, money, ships, or war material—not upon any presumption that the Southern leaders would be able to make a protracted stand at any point upon which the attacking power of the North might be concentrated, but solely upon the physical difficulties in the way of overrunning, subduing, and governing when subdued, a country of 800,000 square miles, occupied by a determined, bitterly hostile, and scattered population. Large as the Federal army is, it would not give an average of one man per square mile of the country which it is proposed to occupy. This fact is well known to the Confederate leaders; and upon this, doubtless, is their ultimate reliance based. Their half-dozen ports therefore may, and very probably will, be occupied, including Richmond itself; and some 300,000 of their people, chiefly consisting of women, children, and old men, be thus transferred from a condition of active to one of passive resistance to Federal authority, and their ability to keep large armies supplied with munitions of war may be restricted within narrower limits than heretofore.

All this may happen without affording the slightest prospect of the people laying down their arms, and either returning into a partnership they detest, or placing their country in the position of a conquered province.

We fear that the Federal occupation of the ports, though it may lead to a petty trade in the import of articles wanted in those markets, and possibly to the export of some small quantity of cotton held in the towns, or in the immediate neighbourhood thereof, will only the more hermetically seal the mass of the nation from intercourse with the outer world, and the more effectually tend to that disorganization of trade in the interior which has already decided the planters to reduce to a bagatelle their production of cotton. It is not probable that the men who have ordered the burning of the cotton already at New Orleans will allow further supplies to be sent there; that the men who have destroyed their steamers to prevent their falling into the hands of their enemies will send down others loaded with cotton, trusting to the tender mercies of the sea enemies. Nor, on the other hand, that the Federals will so have sufficient faith in the friendly and pacific tendencies of the inhabitants of the interior towns, villages, and river landings, to trust trading steamers sailing under the Stars and Stripes to their hospitable protection when seeking cargoes of cotton. Until the Federal Government not only holds the ports by military force, but converts the people to a contented acquiescence in that arrangement, and in the payment of duties according to the Morrill Tariff, for the benefit of the Northern exchequer, it is not very easy to see how a healthy exchange of commodities can spring up. Should steamers be found to carry their cotton, who will ensure it against war risks on the rivers? What factor will receive the cotton and compromise himself with the Confederate Government by entering into what they stigmatize as a traitorous trade? What articles or commodities will the Federal authorities allow to be sent into the interior to pay for cotton, while clothing and provisions of all kinds would probably be carried immediately to the rebel armies in the field? If the Federal authorities enable the "rebels" to exchange their cotton, which they do not want, for those articles so essential to the support of their armies, they may protract the war indefinitely. On every side the question is beset with unattractive difficulties, and it is to be hoped that those who are engaged in procuring cotton from other countries will not relax their efforts in consequence of recent events in America.

The downward progress of the stocks of American cotton since the highest point of last year is illustrated roughly by the following quarterly table, to which we append the Liverpool quotation for middling New Orleans cotton at the respective dates:—

	Mar. 1861.	June.	Sept.	Dec.	Mar. 1862.	May.
In American Ports . . .	750,000	100,000	50,000	50,000	50,000	20,000
Afloat and at Liverpool	915,000	971,000	487,000	210,000	160,000	103,000
	1,665,000	1,071,000	537,000	270,000	190,000	123,000
Price of Middling 74d.	sd.	9d.	11d.	12½d.	12d.

There is, moreover, as large a decrease proportionately in the stocks held in the Continental ports and by spinners everywhere. The vacuum caused by the non-receipt of the last crop is thus at last showing itself seriously, in spite of the great reduction in consumption which has occurred here and elsewhere. At Have the present stock is 42,000 bales, against 290,000 last year.

For so far it is to be regretted that the high scale of prices which has prevailed this season has failed to attract an increase of supplies from other quarters. India seems to have been cleared out by the large shipments of last year, and the shipments to Europe from the 1st of January till latest dates show a decrease of 100,000 bales, the figures being 251,000 bales against 351,000 last year. Hence, and from the large proportionate consumption of Surat cotton, the stock at Liverpool of this description, which on the 1st of January last stood at 295,000 bales against 120,000 last year, is now reduced to 170,000 against 133,000 last year, while in the quantity afloat the figures are still more unfavourable, viz., 184,000 bales against 258,000.

From Egypt, Brazil, &c., there is a large percentage of increase in the import for so far this year; but the positive increase is not sufficient to be seriously felt in the trade. The figures are 159,000 bales against 97,000 last year.

In looking to the future, it would be in vain to attempt predictions of the course of prices. In the present state of stocks, any considerable demand, such as the indications from the Indian and other markets would seem to point to, might seriously force up prices. On the other hand, further Federal successes, such as there is every reason to anticipate, or the arrival of even a very few bales of cotton from the South, would, with equal certainty, at least temporarily depress them. Upon a broad view, however, of the enormous difficulties which stand in the way of any satisfactory reopening of the American sources of supply, and the long delays which must occur before the complicated machinery of the trade is again readjusted, even if the terms of peace were already agreed upon, the present price of cotton cannot be considered unreasonably high.

We are very respectfully yours,
NEILL BROTHERS.

[The following article is reprinted from the New York Herald.]

THE SECRET POLICY OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE AGAINST THE UNITED STATES DEFEATED.

On the 8th of November last, the traitors, Mason and Slidell, were taken from on board the British mail steamer Trent by Captain Wilkes. From that time until the 28th of January, when they were surrendered to Great Britain, the chances of war between this country and England were imminent, and were averted only by the prudence of the President and his Cabinet.

The settlement of the Trent affair did not, however, tranquilize the mind of our public in regard to the danger of foreign intervention. Though we never at any time doubted our power to put down the rebellion, we had met with too many evidences of hostility on the part of both England and France, from the outbreak of the war, not to feel conscious that it would require but a slight pretext to induce them, separately or conjointly, to pick another quarrel with us, so as to afford them a pretext for breaking the blockade. There was but one certain way of avoiding this contingency, and that was to hurry on the operations of the campaign as fast as possible. Under the influence of this conviction, General McClellan's plans were pressed into execution at all points. From the 19th of January, when the Battle of Mill Spring, or Somerset was fought, we won successively by land and water, the following important victories:—Fort Henry, Fort Donelson, Columbus, Bowling Green, Runoke, Newbern, Port Royal, Fernandina, Beaufort, Cedar Keys, Apalachicola, Jacksonville, New Madrid, Island No. 10, Pittsburg Landing, Hunt'sville, Bridgeport, New Orleans, Fort Macon, Farmington, Fort St. Philip, and Fort Jackson—all in a period of little more than three months. As the result of this series of extraordinary efforts, unparalleled in the history of ancient or modern warfare, the President is now about to issue a proclamation, opening the principal ports of the South to the commerce of the world.

We can imagine the feelings of chagrin, mortification, and disappointment with which this news will be received by the two Governments, whose clandestine intrigues and schemes to break up the great American Republic imposed this tremendous strain upon the energies of our people. Whatever may be now asserted to the contrary, there can be no doubt of the truth of the averments that both Governments were eagerly desirous to witness the complete alienation of the Northern and Southern States, and with this view lent all the assistance that was possible, without violating their own code of international law, to the rebels. Even before the proclamations recognizing the belligerent rights of the latter were issued, the leading men in both countries, with but few exceptions, did not hesitate to express openly their belief that it would be to their interest that a final separation should take place between them, seeing the rapid pace at which the United States were outgrowing the European nations in commercial and political importance. It is very well known that the Trent affair was regarded in England and France as a most fortunate occurrence, in the expectation that it would afford the two Governments a pretext for a violent interference with the blockade. Their hopes in this respect were, as we have said, defeated by the caution and moderation of the President and his Cabinet. The settlement of the difficulty, however, had no effect upon English and French policy in our regard; for, as is now known, our Cabinet had secret intelligence from London and Paris to the effect that, if by the 1st of May, we did not show that it was in our power to put down the rebellion, the two Governments intended to make a case for themselves, by which, without infringing their own principles of international law, they would be justified in breaking the blockade. To this determination they were no doubt led by the long inaction of our army after the Battle of Manassas; and the Mexican expedition was undertaken in the same conviction of our being powerless to prevent or avenge it. It was not the intention of General McClellan to open the campaign in Virginia until the beginning of April; but in consequence of the information to which we refer, he hurried up his plans, and began early in March the brilliant series of operations which are now rapidly approaching the consummation of their object—the close of the war; which may be confidently looked for by the 1st of June next. In the meanwhile, the proclamation of the President, opening the principal cotton ports, will at once put an extinguisher upon the policy of the two Governments which are engaged in this, the most nefarious conspiracy that has ever entered into against the constitutional rights and power of a friendly nation. No parallel can, in fact, be found for it in history, with the exception of the coalition of the monarchs and despots of Europe against France under the Convention. [Nor can any other example be recalled of a voluntary uprising of a whole people to defend their Government, such as has been witnessed here, save that furnished by France at the same period, when a million of her sons rushed to arms to resist the invader.

In a few days, as we have already stated, the proclamation of the President, opening the cotton ports, will relieve us from any further apprehensions of foreign interference. No excuse, legal or otherwise, will then be left for it. Though we may open these ports to foreigners, however, we cannot promise them that they will get cotton and tobacco. The rebels may continue to keep them back from them, and there is no law to compel us to aid them in obtaining them. Like us, they must wait until the termination of the war restores trade to its usual channels; and when that comes they will, perhaps, find that the events out of which they hoped to gain so much have only weakened them, whilst they have contributed to render us greater and more powerful than ever. From our troubles have resulted discoveries that have revolutionized the whole system of naval warfare, demonstrated the worthlessness of coast fortifications, and equalized the strength of maritime nations. They will leave us with an army of nearly a million of men—the finest and best equipped soldiers in the world. In this altered condition of things, England may well shrink from risking her North American and West Indian possessions, and Spain, her rich colony of Cuba, by provoking a quarrel with us. Louis Napoleon, from the recent accounts that reach us, seems to be pursuing an ambitious course in Mexico.

ASTOUNDING DEVELOPMENTS—WHOLESALE LARCENY OF GOVERNMENT STORES.

(From the Cincinnati Inquirer.)

The Government authorities of this city, on yesterday, received the developments of a wholesale larceny operation, the parallel of which surpasses in atrocity and villainy any other that has come to light for many months, exhibiting, as they do, that an organized gang of plunderers are at work within the Federal lines, disgracefully appropriating supplies and Government stores sent by willing and benevolent hands to comfort and aid the sick and wounded soldiers in the hospitals, and the volunteer who, on the battle-field, is exposed to privations and suffering and fighting for his country, the Union, and the Constitution. The particulars of this latest villainy are in substance as follows:—For many weeks detectives and police have been advised that an unusual number of packages of different kinds have passed through this city en route for sundry towns in the North, and, taken in connection with other information, that supplies sent forward had never reached their destination, the utmost vigilance was at once instituted, and the co-operation of officers in various parts of the State was solicited in unravelling the apparent mystery.

Within a day or two the officers have succeeded in unravelling a series of most outrageous frauds. Their suspicions were aroused at Toledo, on Wednesday last, by a large quantity coming through the Express office from Lebanon, Ky., which was believed to be property unlawfully obtained. The person to whom the boxes, trunks, and parcels were directed, and who had previously received large consignments, was permitted to take one of these boxes from the Express office to his store-house in another portion of the city. There the police seized this box and other packages, and found them to contain clothing, hospital stores, provisions, &c., plainly indicated to have been obtained in the hospitals of the army. At the Express office the remaining boxes and packages were opened, and found to contain blankets, drawers, stockings, &c. Upon pursuing the investigation further, four boxes and two trunks, directed to certain parties in Toledo, were found in the Dayton and Michigan freight depot.

A man named Alfred W. Hinds, who went from Toledo to Lebanon, as a nurse and hospital steward, and soon after returned with a largely accumulated quantity of "extras," has been arrested. Hinds alleges that he purchased his property of Dr. Daniels, Surgeon of the 14th Ohio Regiment, and on this statement and other evidence, a despatch has been forwarded, and Daniels was arrested at Pittsburg yesterday. Hinds is in jail in Toledo, in default of 2000 dollars bail. He will have an examination before the Mayor of Toledo on Monday.

At Lima, about sixty-five miles from Toledo, the officers have secured ten tons of a similar kind of property, upon which there are railroad charges of 500 dollars. The authorities in this city are also in possession of similar packages, but as the arrests, based upon the discoveries here, have not yet transpired, we forbear going into particulars, except to say that the evidence is positive that a grand (stealing) combination has been in successful operation for many months, and it is very evident that the country and the soldiers have been defrauded out of a vast amount, and that a large portion of the contributions of the benevolent societies throughout the country have served no other purpose than to fill the pockets of certain individuals, without ever reaching the soldiers for whom they were intended.

The officers of the Government will take immediate cognizance of the matter, and warrants will be issued for the arrest of any person having any and every connection with the affair.

DEMOCRATIC MERCIES TOWARDS BLACKS.

From the John Bull.

We know at this moment few modes of employing literary abilities in England more deserving of reprobation than the attempt of certain writers to get up sympathy or friendly feelings on the part of the English nation towards that armed Democratic mob who are now carrying war and desolation into the peaceful plantations of the Southern States of America. If words have a meaning, and history be true, the United States was a union of Sovereign States only, and their constitution, in its origin, expressly repudiated the notion of coercing a State. The right of nullification and secession has been asserted frequently both in the North and the South, and has been practically admitted by the Central Government, from the Peace of Ghent, in 1814, which was caused by the Secession Resolution of Massachusetts, down to the Tariff of 1832, which was occasioned by the nullification resolutions of South Carolina. But of all the ignorant and wicked delusions which the English sympathizers with the Northern Democrats desire to palm off upon Englishmen for truths—the greatest is certainly that which pretends that the Northerners now sympathize with the poor blacks and are fighting on the side of liberty.

Let us follow these Northern Democrats home, and examine what laws they have there established, where the will of the Northern mob is absolute and unquestioned. By the laws of most of the Northern States all negroes and coloured persons are forbidden to settle in the State, and may be imprisoned if they do not depart when ordered by the authorities. "All their contracts are declared void;" and "any person giving them employment may be fined and imprisoned." This is the law in the great States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, containing nearly five millions of inhabitants. Even in the sordid and intellectual New England States, in Massachusetts herself, the nurse of the simpering Pharisees, who, reclining in the peaceful security of their homes, declare that they "welcome emancipation by war," the marriage of any white with any coloured person is by law absolutely void, and any person celebrating such a marriage may be fined and imprisoned, and persons so married may not only be fined and imprisoned, but whipped into the bargain, by the laws of these democratic sympathizers with the coloured race. And not only are the contracts of all coloured persons settling in most of the Northern States absolutely void, but in many of the largest and most populous States, such as Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, no negro, mulatto, or person whose grandfather or grand father was a negro, can be sworn in any court or be a witness in any cause, no matter in which a white is interested. Let us cite the very words of the statute of 1841 in the great State of Ohio, containing now two millions and a half of people:—"No black or mulatto person shall be sworn or give evidence in any court of record or elsewhere in this State in any cause or matter where either party is a white person, or in any prosecution against any white person." Such are the tender mercies of these Democratic tyrants in those States of the North where their power is absolute for good or evil towards their black and coloured fellow-beings.

The truth is, if the North could succeed in this war, they would drive every coloured person back to Africa from Democratic jealousy of black workmen underselling themselves, and the real or probable object of this Northern crusade is the desire to appropriate the fertile lands of the Southern States, and to expel their present owners, and to divide their plantations among the so-called soldiers of Lincoln, Seward, and Company. The laws of nature forbid, we trust, the possible success of such a scheme just as strongly as the laws of God forbid the murderous invasion of our peaceful neighbour's territory. But atrocious as are the laws enacted by these Northern worshippers of equality against the coloured race, the social tyranny of the North is far greater and more atrocious even than their legal tyranny. Of course in most of the Northern States blacks have no political rights whatever, and in the few where the law does not forbid a black to vote, Judge Lynch effectually interposes his veto. But the remarkable fact deserves notice that in the South, where black slavery exists, no such antipathy between the white and black races is to be found. Mr. Olmsted, in his "Cotton Kingdom," written to prove the stationary and unprogressive and powerless condition of the South, rendering it, as Lincoln and Seward thought, an easy prey to their greedy North soldiery,—this very Mr. Olmsted, with severely concealed disgust, himself records the fact. He tells us that within a few miles of Washington, going South by rail, he was greatly astonished to find in the same car with himself a family of first-class white children affectionately playing and sharing their games and sweets with their little black servants, on terms of perfect childish equality and love, mutually fondling and being fondled, without a thought of the curse of black slavery to interfere with the most kindly Christian feelings and sentiments.

In fact, the success of the North means not only death and ruin to the white planter, but a fate a thousand times worse than the existing slavery to all the blacks, who would be forced then to emigrate to Africa, or might probably be sold to Cuba or Brazil, until it might please this reckless white Democracy to try a new irruption upon the settlements of their neighbours. But in spite of their present success, we believe and trust that the final success of the North is utterly impossible. And we think that every Englishman who loves justice and liberty should call upon the Government of his nation forthwith to interpose her power to prevent and put a stop to the horrors which the progress of the Northern arms is inflicting on humanity itself.

A SOUND ENGLISH VIEW OF THE AMERICAN CRISIS.

We quote the following sensible observations from a leader published in the Standard of yesterday:—

While the war is waged in this fashion, and with these pretensions—of its objects neither we nor those who wage it are competent to speak—it is quite clear that it must be protracted until the North is wearied out, which is not likely to happen soon—or until the South is conquered, which is not likely to happen at all, or until France and England grow tired of starving for the gratification of American malignity, and determine to interfere peremptorily, and put an end to the struggle, by which they suffer nearly as severely as the invaded country. Of the right to intervene there can be no doubt whatever; of the policy of so doing not much doubt, except in the minds of those who value the passions of the Northerners more than the interests of Europe, and had rather see the people of England starved than the rabble of New York and Boston thwarted or humbled. We cannot do without the Southern States. We allowed war to be waged for their restoration to the Union; we would have allowed it to be waged within reasonable limits, for a frontier suitable to Northern interests; we cannot allow a war of destruction and devastation against a country on whose produce depends the subsistence of hundreds of thousands of English families. The war cannot be ended by a decisive blow until next spring, if it could ever be so ended; for the invasion of the planting states in June by a Northern army would be simply impossible. If the war continues for six months longer we shall have little or no cotton from America—that is to say, we shall have starvation in Lancashire—till the end of 1864; for in that case the greater part of the existing stock will be destroyed, and there will be little or no planting in the coming autumn. Our mill-owners will be ruined, our manufacturing districts almost annihilated, our national prosperity seriously and permanently damaged, in order that a Government which has shown itself hostile to us, regardless of law, and unworthy of respect, may have the opportunity of injuring to the utmost of its power, a gallant and kindred people, fighting for everything that brave men hold dear. This is more than England should, or can, endure, and it is time to announce that the limit of her endurance has been reached.

THE BATTLE OF WILLIAMSBURG.

The following, in reference to the engagement near Williamsburgh, is taken from the Richmond Inquirer of May 8:—

Among the killed on our side in this engagement, we regret to learn, were Colonel Ward, of Florida, and Major Wm. H. Palmer, of the First Regiment Virginia Volunteers; Captain A. J. Humphreys, Seventeenth Virginia Regiment. Among the wounded were Colonel Carland, of Lynchburg; Colonel Kemper, of the Seventh Virginia (Speaker of the House of Delegates); Colonel Corse, Seventeenth Virginia Regiment.

The following additional are reported to us as among the sad casualties of the late engagements:—

In the cavalry engagement on Sunday, Major W. H. Payne, Fourth Virginia Regiment, it is found, was mortally wounded—shot through the neck.

In Monday's fight, Colonel L. E. Williams, First Virginia Regiment, mortally wounded.

KILLED.—Lieutenant John G. Addison, Alexandria; Lieutenant Winston Carter, Prince William; private Jos. H. McVeigh, Jr., Alexandria; private Eugene Fairfax, private Frank Ballenger, Alexandria.

WOUNDED.—Lieutenant John A. Addison; private Henry Bradley; private Willie McKnight, Alexandria.

The Richmond Examiner says the report of Colonel Ward's death is contradicted.

DEFENCE OF THE WEST BANK OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

From the Richmond Dispatch, April 10th.

The Mobile Register of the 30th ult., has the following important intelligence:—As Curtis has displayed no further stomach for the fray since the battle of Elkhorn, the indefatigable Van Dorn has pushed forward to the Mississippi with all rapidity. His army is in good condition, much reinforced, and is concentrating at Jacksonport and Pochontas. General Jeff. Thompson is operating closely in connection with Van Dorn's army, and it is thought that some Federals in the neighbourhood of New Madrid may be hurt before long. Thus both sides are concentrating all their power for the great and desperate struggle for the mastership of the Mississippi River and Valley.

This movement of Van Dorn was executed with great celerity and secrecy. He was doubtless enabled to accomplish it by the facilities of water transportation. Jacksonport is on White River, and Pochontas about fifty miles north of it, on the Big Black fork of White River. It is to be presumed that the gallant General Van Dorn withdrew his forces to the Arkansas river after the battle of Elkhorn, dropped down the river, and ascended the White in steamers. What force is still with Price and Pike is not known; but doubtless enough to keep Curtis uneasy. Pochontas is about sixty or seventy miles from New Madrid, in a direction a little south of west, and Jacksonport about the same distance west of Fort Pillow, on the Mississippi. Both of these places are about two hundred miles eastward of the late battle-field of Elkhorn, in an air-line. It is gratifying to know that vigorous operations for the defence of the west bank of the Mississippi are thus initiated.

GENERAL LEE CONFIDENT.—The Richmond correspondent of the Charleston Courier mentions the following conversation between our Commander-in-Chief and himself:—"I said, 'General, are you hopeful?' 'No, sir,' he replied, 'I am confident.' 'That is cheering,' I observed. 'In the face of our disasters and defeats.' 'These,' he said, 'have been the Bunker Hill victories of our enemy, and the providential mystery is how they have been so few. But the day of terrible retribution is nigh; he will be ruined; the North will be beggared and bankrupt, and the South will press out of the ordeal respected by the nations of the world, and with an imperishable name in history.'"

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MAY 29, 1862.

What does Union mean?

It cannot be denied that the North, in the later stages of the war, has displayed a Herculean strength and a tenacity of purpose, contrasting marvellously with the apparent want of real earnestness at an earlier period. The world has witnessed with amazement an army, greater than any employed in modern warfare, spring up in a country where heretofore skirmishes were considered battles, and the manœuvres of large masses of troops unknown. The same country, with vast natural resources, it is true, but with little or no accumulated wealth, has rushed into expenditure, on a scale beyond the capacity of the richest nation of the Old World, without any present perceptible loss of credit or derangement of its finances. Every prediction deduced from past experience, every calculation founded upon the laws of finance and political economy, has been falsified by the current history of this people, which boasts of being above human and Divine laws, and measurable by no standard except its own. Are these the evidences of a solid, massive power? We believe not. A madman, in his delirious ravings, defies the strength of many strong men. He heeds not the self-inflicted wounds. The ordinary laws of the human organism apply not to him for the time, and the fiercer the paroxysm of his frenzy, the higher rises his preternatural might. When the fury has spent itself, he sinks back an inert mass, over which death and life hold along and doubtful contest.

So it is with the North. Setting aside its own laws, as well as those of humanity and justice, it rushed into an enterprise, of which its self-conceit prevented it from seeing the true dimensions. Stung to madness by repeated disgrace and failure, it sold itself to the demons of avarice and ambition, and by these it is now possessed. To the poor hireling, whose wages are cut off by the war, the monthly pay is a god-send; the South to him is the El Dorado, the land of gold and milk and honey out of whose fertile fields he is to carve his promised bounty. Not a counter-jumper adorned with a pair of epaulets but dreams of vast plantations, stately family mansions, horses, and hounds. The capitalist finds in the millions daily lavished among greedy contractors, gigantic fortunes ready-made. The merchant and the manufacturer look to closed markets and prohibitive tariffs for the reimbursement of their losses, and upon their present outlays as an investment to secure to them a monopoly over an inexhaustible India at their very doors. Each tax-payer, small or large, expects, in the conquest of the South, the relief from the impending burden, and the more fearfully the national debt swells, the more imperious becomes the necessity that others than those by whom it is created should pay it.

This is what is meant by the word "Union," which is the war-cry of the invaders of the South. To the farmer and "farm-hand" of the North, the hungry emigrant from Germany and Ireland, the military adventurers from every clime who officer these armies, it means what the empire of the Incas and the Caziques meant to the followers of Cortez and Pizarro—what Gaul meant to the Helvetians, when, as a nation, they left their rugged mountains to seek more genial homes. The word "Union" means not only the conquest, but the colonization of the South. Wholesale confiscations, wholesale banishments—the despair of the lawful owners—would make lands cheap. The bounty land-warrants to the value of £20 each, to which each of the 750,000 Northern soldiers is entitled by law at the expiration of the war, would be "located"—to borrow the American phrase—not in the Western wilderness, but in the rich bottoms of the Mississippi and Alabama, the blooming savannahs of Georgia, or the virgin prairies of Texas. Nor would these new settlers till that soil which it is death to the white man to till. The poor negroes might, indeed, be "emancipated" in name; but on the pretext of a necessary tutelage or apprenticeship to freedom, their labour for life, or for a long term of years, would be let out by law to the highest bidder, and thus the helpless wretches would be transferred from the indulgent care of their natural protectors, in whose households they were born, between whom and them exists an innate mutual attachment and a life-long acquaintance of each other's virtues and failings, to the harsh rule of mercenary strangers who hate them from instinct, and whose sole interest in them would be estimated in dollars and cents. The name of slavery might thus indeed disappear; but those horrible enormities associated with the name, which now exist only in the imagination of slanderous novelists, would then have their beginning without any possible end. And these outrages would be committed in the name and with the forms of law. The talent and intelligence of the country once excited, the mass of its native citizens excluded from the polls by an oath of allegiance which they would deem it a sacrilege to take, the callous, calculating mind of Mr. Seward already foresees, in the future, Northern Legislatures seated in the halls of the State capitals of Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina, obsequiously carrying out his edicts in the name of these once sovereign States.

This is what "Union" means to the Northerner; and this, also, is what it means to the Southerner. He knows that it means to him, not only such utter political annihilation as few conquests have ever brought with them, but a personal serfdom more galling than ever a proud nation endured. He fights, not only for national independence, but for his personal political rights, nay, for his civil rights as a citizen; for his homestead, that it may not pass into the hands of the stranger; for his wife and his children, that the former should not bear slaves, and that the latter may grow up freemen. Nor has the North, in its assumed success, the choice between clemency and severity. There is no possible compromise, no possible machinery that political engineers can devise, by which the two nations can co-exist under the same governmental organization. That they have co-existed for the last thirty years preceding the war, is due to their division into distinct State organizations, each of which exercised the essential rights of sovereignty over its own citizens, and which States, in their federative concerns, have for thirty years past stood solidly arrayed into two contending camps—the North and the South. The whole of American statecraft consisted in, and depended on, preserving a balance, and keeping the peace between these two great rival Powers. The internal, and even the foreign, politics of the United States had no other motive spring. When quarrels were sought with other nations, it was to divert the attention of both peoples from their own strife. The chief recommendation of, at least, one prominent Presidential candidate was, that "he will get us into a good hearty war with somebody, and so prevent civil war at home." Was a President to be elected, the question was not, "Is he a man to do equal justice to all sections of the Republic?" but "is he for the North or the South?" Was a new State to be admitted into this ill-named "sisterhood," fierce feuds were waged to drag its weight into one or the other scale of the balance. Was a railway to be built to the Pacific, admitted to be a "national" work of unquestionable necessity, it was not as to where would be its most judicious location, but through whose territory it should go, and which of the two would derive the most advantage from its construction. The Council Chamber at Washington has long been nothing more than an arena whither North and South sent their champions to contend in violent diatribes and often with more vulgar weapons. The Northern representative would denounce, in open Senate, the entire people of the South as a people whose men had no courage, and whose women no virtue. If the representative of the insulted section condescended to a reply other than that of the fist, he would describe the bulk of the Northern population as "the mudsills of society." And these disgraceful exhibitions were not the exception, but the rule, of any and every Session of Congress. If there was often little to choose between the combatants on the score of dignity or decorum, any volume of Congressional "debates," so-called, will prove the fact that the North was always the aggressor. Nor were these the forensic foils of barristers, who drown their disputes in a good bottle of wine when the case is argued. The broil of the Senate Chamber was carried into the street and the drawing-room. The representative man of the South held no social intercourse with him of the North, nor did their wives or daughters. A catalogue of political sins might be forgotten and forgiven by the constituents of either, but not the capital offence of sitting at each other's dinner table. What of hatred and abuse could not be condensed into Congressional speeches, the press of both countries took care to distil into inflammable gas evaporating from ponderous volumes or dainty magazines, or ephemeral news-sheets. And there again the North was the aggressor, and the South, as dependent upon the North for literature, or rather reading matter, as it was for shoe-pegs and sewing-machines, made much worse show of defence than on the floor of Congress. Northern literature delighted in caricatures of Southern life. Northern newspapers paraded in flaming capitals Arrowsmith horrors perpetrated in the South. At the very moment when the delegates of the seceding States were assembling at the seat of Government of the State of Alabama, to take measures for making the secession more perfect and irrevocable, the New York Illustrated Weekly, of the largest circulation, selected for its principal subject the tarring and feathering of a beautiful young white girl (of course, Northern) by a crowd of white and black ruffians, and the locality selected for this pictorial lie, for which, we need not add, there was not even the shadow of a foundation, was in the immediate vicinity of the place where the Southern delegates were then deliberating. The abusive letter-press which accompanied this choice drawing was further adorned with a vignette scene of the banks of the Alabama river, representing men suffering a horrible death by being stuck headforemost into tar barrels, and then rolled over the banks into the stream. Any Northern vagabond, eluding the ends of justice in some Southern State, would earn both money and notoriety, if he had the invention of writing or dictating some story of martyrdom, which was greedily swallowed by credulous audiences and unscrupulous sensation newspapers. For a series of years has the Northern press teemed with such things, and even Europe has believed them.

The marvel is not that the two people have separated at last, but that the tie which bound them did not snap years ago. Both Northern and Southern writers long since compared it to the chain which fetters two galley slaves into unwilling companionship. But once snapped, who shall rivet it again? The North may wade in blood until its foot is on the neck of the prostrate South, but it must keep it there. The North knows this, and the South knows it. Hence the stern resolve, that if Providence has decreed its annihilation, it will die by its own hands rather than by those of the self-appointed hangman. If such be God's decree, the South will not repent the step of separation; but she will bitterly repent the supineness which caused her to delay so long the inevitable hour, which caused her to wait until the enemy had grown too strong; that supineness by which she has lost her individuality in the eyes of foreign nations, until they had almost forgotten her existence, and looked upon her as a mere appendage to the North, much like the tail of the comet, which, indeed, gives the erratic star all its splendour, but which must follow whithersoever the head directs its eccentric career.

This, then, is the "Union feeling" which can be read in the sullen faces of the populations of Nashville, of New Orleans, of Norfolk, and it may be, ere long, of Richmond, of Mobile, and of Savannah. Is it not a striking fact, that in those cities which have already heard the tread of Northern soldiery, not a man has been yet found to sell his conscience for his purse, and do homage to the invader—not in Nashville, which had never been regarded as an ultra-Southern town, having interests and affinities equally with the West and South—not in New Orleans, that great market-place whither seekers of gain were wont to congregate from all the civilized world—not in Norfolk, which lived by its proximity to the magnificent docks and navy-yards just blown into the air, or reduced, to ashes: that not a bale of cotton could be bought in Nashville; that not a printer could be found in New Orleans to set up Butler's barbarous proclamation; not a cheer for Jefferson Davis could be stifled in Norfolk, even by the presence of Northern bayonets?

With such a population in their rear wherever they advance, what becomes of a Northern army defeated? The chances of war are uncertain. The North has staked its fortune on a single die. Whether the Confederates evacuate Richmond or defend it, we may be assured that they will make their stand at the point most advantageous to themselves. They have heretofore defeated their enemy in every pitched battle when his naval force could not turn the odds against them. They have now drawn him far from his base of operations. He has drained his own country of men and military stores. He has dragged his heavy material into the interior of an invaded territory. His gunboats and mortar-boats are in distant waters, in the Gulf of Mexico, in the Western rivers, along the Atlantic seaboard. Suppose that the same fortune which has so far attended the land contests of the Confederates has not deserted them; suppose McClellan or Halleck beaten;—what can then prevent the South from assuming the offensive? What shall arrest its armies from entering in their turn upon a career of invasion, and dictating a treaty of peace at Washington itself? This is no wild fancy. A single victory on the part of the Confederates may suffice, in the present crisis of the war, to change its whole character. A dozen defeats of the Confederates will not change it in favour of the North.

The Supply of American Cotton.

ENGLISHMEN are usually quick in appreciating the practical bearings of any question that touches their material interests, or the political prestige on which these interests, to so great an extent, depend. It is strange, therefore, but not the less true, that there should have been manifested in this country an apparently irremediable incompetency of appreciating the real character of the American war, and more especially the intentions and determination of the people of the Southern States. There are many ways of accounting for this anomaly. We content ourselves with one. Cotton, ever since it became one of the staples of the world's commerce, has continued to pour in so steadily and regularly, the supply increasing as the demand increased, and sometimes a little in advance of the demand, that what might at first have been surrounded with doubts has grown into a conviction that the cotton supply would continue thus for ever. Cotton famines were threatened before, but something always "turned up" to avert them. The cry of wolf has been often heard, but somehow the wolf never came. Immense fortunes have been built upon the sides of a volcano, and a countless population has learnt to draw its sustenance from those fortunes. But the volcano has been so long quiescent, and the dwellers on it lulled into such security that even when the mountain totters in the violence of the eruption, they cannot bring themselves to believe that the lava streams are about to engulf them, their fortunes, and all. As well convince a veteran spinner that the Chinese rebellion will shortly deprive him of his favourite beverage at breakfast, as that the American rebellion will make his mills a rusting mass of old machinery.

And yet the wolf has come to the door; the lava streams are lighting the heavens with conflagration of the great staple. A whole year's crop is waiting for the torch, which will surely be applied if the world continues to look on with listless scepticism. And what the fortune of war may save from the flames must supply the necessities of two full twelve-months, for the next year's crop is destroyed in advance. Wait for Federal victories, and you wait for smoking piles of ashes; wait for Confederate successes, and you wait for what the soil cannot produce until revolving seasons fertilize it again. Come what may, the alternative is no longer between abundance and scantiness, but between scantiness and utter want.

Few men in England appear to have understood the real condition of the cotton question, few appear to understand it now. Among the few are Messrs. Neill Brothers, of Manchester, whose admirably written and well reasoned circular we print elsewhere. These gentlemen have a right to speak on this subject, and a right to be heard and pondered. None better than they understand the issues involved in this disastrous war. They have had, and still have, interests in both the North and the South, and withal are impartial witnesses to the truth. Branches of their house are established in New York, as well as in Mobile and New Orleans, but the parent stock is firmly rooted in British soil. They, moreover, deserve to be heard, because, among so many falsified predictions, theirs alone have thus far come true. Their arguments were not less sound, nor less clearly worded in former instances. But if they are heeded more now than they were then, it will be because the bonfires along the Mississippi and its tributaries are stronger arguments than words. We shall not attempt to repeat what these gentlemen have so well said, but we may add a few practical suggestions in supplement to their unanswerable logic. Whatever of the crop of 1861 can be preserved from wholesale burnings must be by the triumph of the Confederate cause, or by the interference of foreign Powers, which is probably the only possible termination of the war. Whatever is thus saved must answer the purposes of two consecutive years, for the produce of 1862 will scarcely compensate for the destruction which has already taken place and must further ensue under all contingencies. India has already disappointed expectations. Even if she could supply the precise quality required, railways must be improvised, capital, skilled labour, the experience of many years, provided, before she can be relied upon for the needed quantity. Admit the task to be feasible, which is not free from grave doubts, it is the task of years, nay, decades of years. Suppose, on the other hand, that the Stars and Stripes wave triumphantly over the cotton-fields of the South. The South's monopoly, both as to quality and to quantity of the staple, is owing not merely to the peculiar adaptation of climate and soil, but still more to the perfect organization of her system of labour. The supposed conquerors are not likely to free the slaves, for we see that Hunter's somewhat premature decree of emancipation in States of which his armies have not even possession of the threshold, has already received the disapprobation of his superiors.

The four and a half millions of blacks turned adrift as nominal freemen, the most sanguine philanthropist cannot doubt that the South, for a generation at least, would become a Jamaica on a larger scale. No cotton, therefore, any more than there is sugar from Jamaica. If, what is more likely and more in consistence with antecedents, the slaves, under the supposed Northern conquest, only change masters for the worse, what of the supply of cotton then? The North needs not Morrill's tariff only, and the monopoly of the Southern market, to pay its enormous debt; it must compel Europe, as well as the South, to bear a large portion of the burden. So sure as Yankees shall take the place of Southerners in the cultivation of cotton, so sure will an export duty be levied on every pound that is shipped to European spinners, and not a nominal export duty for revenue purposes merely, but an export duty that shall enable the American manufacturer to undersell all competitors in every market of the world. Short-sighted policy of Lancashire! short-sighted policy of Lombard-street! taking a paltry bribe for digging its own grave. The cause of the South is the cause of British industry and British commerce; the success of the North, the success of England's most dangerous rival and bitterest foe.

The Seizure of the Bermuda.

THE blockade of the coasts of the Confederate States is likely, effective or non-effective, to give plenty of employment to diplomatic as well as legal authorities; and, as England has by far the largest share in the commerce that floats on those seas, upon her devolves the duty of making the law of nations respected, as regards the property of neutrals. We have recently had the case of the schooner, Jane Campbell, which was taken by the United States' war steamer State of Georgia, and sent into Brooklyn, with the English flag flying below the American. Lord Lyons promptly demanded an explanation, and Mr. Seward as promptly apologized. The judge who tried that case, and referred it to assessors to award damages to the owner for the illegal capture, and other misconduct of the officers of the United States navy, made so able an exposition of the law applicable to such cases, that in considering what is likely to be the point raised in that of the Bermuda, we shall do well to quote them. Judge Betts said—"Prize Law, as administered in English, American, and French tribunals, exhibits, under the disallowance of the right of prize to captors, and the positive infliction of punishment by penalties and costs adjudged against them, any irregularities against the property seized, especially as regards neutrals (Wheatston, R. App. pp. 5, 6, 7) and by mutual acquiescence of maritime nations, they supply the restraints which accompany the exercise of belligerent rights under the improved administration of prize laws; and again, "a prior question to the design of a vessel to violate the blockade, and whether the blockade at the time was an effective one, arises whether the conduct of the captors was of a character to destroy the legality of the arrest, and subject them to punishment for the infringement of the laws of maritime warfare." And on that ground the Court adjudged the Jane Campbell free from arrest. Now, taking this judgment as a true statement of the law as affecting neutral vessels captured off the coasts of belligerents, what has been the conduct of the captain of the Mercedita towards the captain and cargo of the Bermuda? War is an awful evil, but it is indispensable that all acts be done in strict conformity to the rules of maritime law; if not, that all the amenities of which they are susceptible should be scrupulously attended to, and all offence avoided. At present, we have only the statement of Captain Westendorf to guide us. He says that on his taking his papers on board the ship which had just sent a shot whistling between the mainmast and smokestack, and these being found regular, the mere fact of his loading at Liverpool, was deemed sufficient to warrant a search. The Bermuda was taken possession of by three boats filled with armed men, and her course altered by the captors.

Now, this mode of proceeding is strictly illegal, according to the authorities, and would, if the ruling of Judge Betts be correct (and there is not a shadow of a doubt of its being so), subject the Mercedita's captain to pay damages for the illegal arrest. But it is not worth while to argue this minor point, when there is behind the one real and serious issue—whether England can allow the blockade to extend to her colonies, whose harbours are now besieged by armed steamers. The Bermuda was, undoubtedly, an English vessel, bound on her course for an English colony, with her papers regular. She was boarded and captured on that course, and in the waters of the colony where also four other United States' men-of-war were guarding the approaches to Nassau!—to Nassau, not the coast of America.

Probably Lord Lyons may again demand an explanation, and Mr. Seward again apologize. But how long is this to last? There seems, after all, to be but one thing certain—that Lord Russell is determined to treat the Northerners as Cœur de Lion is reported to have said to his brother—“I wonder which of us will be tired first—you of treason against me, or I of forgiving you;” and the crescendo of the United States navy insolence is likely to solve the problem.

The State of Europe.

THERE are many and sufficient reasons for the absorbing attention with which Europe watches the great drama being enacted on the continent of America. The War of Independence in the New World has paralyzed the manufacturing industry and seriously interfered with the commerce of the Old World. The long continuance or speedy termination of the conflict will exercise an immense influence upon the material prosperity of Europe. If the war is protracted England and France will have to solve the difficult problem of providing for communities of paupers, and with diminished resources. We have, too, a vast stake in the successful issue of the contest. When the South establishes its independence there will be a free and important market for our manufactures, and our merchants will have a fair share of Southern wealth, which, before Secession, was monopolized by the North. On Monday, The Times, in its American leader, remarked that the South is not only contending against the United States, but against the whole world. This proposition is indisputable; and it is not less true that the unaided South, in fighting for its independence is contending for that which will largely benefit every manufacturing and commercial nation. And there is another point that gives rise to anxious speculation. When the war is over, what will become of the United States' army? Will the war-spirit be laid as readily as it was invoked? Is it not probable Yankee arrogance may force us to accept the challenge we have so often and so forbearingly and, perhaps, unwisely declined? Will the Government of the United States dare to disband its army when, owing to the prostration of trade, the discharged soldiers will not find any means of peacefully earning a livelihood?

But whilst these grave considerations are naturally uppermost in our minds, we cannot disregard the current history of Europe, which presents some remarkable features, and is well worthy of our meditation. We propose to notice, rather than discuss, some of the leading questions that now engage the attention of European statesmen.

The extent and supremacy of French influence must startle those who have not heeded its rapid and uninterrupted growth since the foundation of the Empire. Whether it be for good or evil, whether it is due to the supineness of the English Government, or is the result of uncontrollable circumstances, are matters that do not affect our survey of the state of affairs. We have to deal with a fact of which the existence is proved by superabundant evidence. By boldly undertaking to put an end to the anarchical Government of Juarez, France has become the arbiter of Mexico. Both at Washington and at Richmond the diplomacy of France is watched with more anxiety than the diplomacy of England, though England has the greater interest in the contest. The prompt action of France in putting a stop to the massacre of the Christians, and restoring order, has given her a marked predominance in Syria. Rome is openly, and the kingdom of Italy virtually, under French protection. The attitude of France is very imposing, and we may expect the further development of her preponderating influence.

What is the aspect of Italy? Rome and Venetia are still open questions, and we do not see any indication of the Emperor Napoleon permitting the occupation of the one, or the conquest and annexation of the other. If the kingdom of Italy be thoroughly established, there is a prospect of her ultimately obtaining possession of the Papal territory, and of that which is now under the dominion of Austria. We are not very much impressed with the boasted stability of Victor Emmanuel's throne. He received Lombardy as a gift from France, and Naples as a present from Garibaldi. Without foreign intervention, Victor Emmanuel's Neapolitan possessions would be lost even more rapidly than they were acquired, if Garibaldi raised the standard of revolt. But putting aside the possibility of the darling of the Italian Democracy preferring Republicanism to the rule of the House of Savoy, there is another and potent reason for our doubts as to the permanence of the kingdom of Italy. We yield to no one in a hearty desire to see Italy free and prosperous. We are not enamoured of brigandage, and although we cannot excuse, we can somewhat palliate, the severity of the Government measures for its suppression. Nevertheless, we should remember that this brigandage is not an affair of plunder, and that it is sanctioned by distinguished Neapolitans. We have been taught to regard the Italians as one people; whereas, the Southerners are totally different to the Northerners, and they mutually dislike each other. A thorough, cordial union between the two peoples is, in our opinion, impossible; and though the inherent disunion may not precipitate the breaking up of the kingdom of Italy, it is a source of weakness and danger. With Victor Emmanuel dependent on the friendship of France for the moral strength of his Government; with Garibaldi—whose bravery and political inconsistency are equal—the absolute master of the Italian Democracy; with the chronic agitation for Rome and Venetia, which cannot be gratified without fresh offence to France, or repressed without engendering internal discord; and with the mutual distrust of the North and South, and the bitterness with which many Neapolitans view the kingdom reduced to a province, we cannot, we say, looking to such a state of affairs, have much faith in the durability of the present pacification and settlement of Italy.

What Austria lost in prestige during the campaign which was concluded at Villafranca she has gained in the strength that arises from her being relieved of the costly guardianship of Lombardy. There are no grounds for supposing that Hungary is ripe for revolt, but we do know that the further dismantling of the Austrian empire would be regretted by Europe. England is the natural ally of Austria. Napoleon has no wish to see the German rival of Prussia further shorn of her importance and influence. It has been the fashion to laugh at Mr. Roebuck for saying a good word for Austria. His sneering critics may be forced to acknowledge that the hon. member for Sheffield was right, and they were utterly wrong.

The dispute between the King of Prussia and his Chambers will end in a compromise, that is, the King will promise a little, and the people will get nothing. The rumoured ambition of King William to make himself the absolute monarch of Prussia, and for Prussia to rule the Federation, may be true, and if true is pretty sure to prove troublesome. Any political crime is sanctioned by Federalism, which is, indeed, a system of the strong preying upon the weak. Or a kind of scramble, in which it is lawful for one State to deprive another of its rights and property, if it can invent an excuse—no matter how flimsy for so doing. Prussia wants a navy, and a navy necessitates seaboard and a port. There is a wistful glance to the North. The absorption of the Danish Duchies would just supply the requirements. Unfortunately for Scandinavia, German Federalism has managed to get in the thin end of the wedge. The most peculiar case has been made out against Denmark. She has discouraged the cultivation of the German language in Schleswig and Holstein, and so she ought to lose these places. The German element in Schleswig and Holstein is so strong, as proved by the prevalence of the language, that they ought to belong to Germany and not to Denmark. That “wherever the German language is spoken is the German Fatherland” is a pretty sentiment, but not a fact. All Europe pronounced against the pretensions of the German Diet, or rather of Prussia, and Denmark made a gallant and successful stand for her coveted territories. Yet Federal agitation and Federal plotting is as active as ever in the Duchies, and will eventuate in an outbreak. The Hesse difficulty has been settled, but the settlement may serve as a precedent to unsettle any of the German Federal States. Whether the Elector was right or wrong, or whether Prussia was so resolute from a dread of the example of a revolution in Hesse, it is quite certain that the Elector has been compelled to openly abdicate his Electoral independence, by submitting to the dictation of his subjects, at the instigation of Prussia. There is a bushel of apples of discord in Federal Germany; and so it is far from impossible that King William may have an opportunity of fleshing his maiden sword.

Russia is busy at home. Poland is again stirring, but Europe will not go to war for the sake of resuscitating Polish nationality. The emancipation of the serfs is a very uncertain experiment. If it leads to any serious complications, it may become necessary for the Emperor to divert the attention of his subjects to foreign affairs, by returning to the aggressive policy of Catharine.

The political horizon of Europe is studded with clouds, some no bigger than a man's hand, but the least of them may suddenly assume direful proportions and darken the prospect. Whilst it is desirable that the nations of Europe should sedulously cultivate the arts of Peace, it is evident that the art of War cannot be neglected. We are not seeking to justify an extravagant military and naval expenditure on the part of England; on the contrary, we hold that defences on a war footing in time of peace, weaken a nation; and that the best preparation for future wars is to husband present resources.

WHAT a frightful set of barbarians those Confederates must be! They not only systematically abandon their wounded and slain—to believe the truthful accounts of certain disinterested parties—and leave the body of one of their chief commanders on a battle-field of which they are the victorious possessors; but they delight in all sorts of cannibalistic orgies over the corpses of their enemies. Their manufacturing ingenuity in this respect is something marvellous; as we can state upon the authority of a respectable London daily. Let it not be supposed that what follows is a caricature of editorial credulity, or that the facts themselves are the offspring of a diseased imagination. We know, personally, that the story is an old one, often repeated, often laughed at, and never seriously believed. Its reappearance, therefore, at this late day is sufficient guarantee of its truth.

It is necessary to speak plainly, here and now, glad as we should be to avoid the duty. It is necessary to inform society of the results of inquiries—inquiries careful, ample, and trustworthy—into the truth of certain impressions which existed as to the way in which the Confederate soldiery made war. To put the matter in the briefest way, it is proved, in course of traversing the ground hitherto held by the Confederate army in Virginia, that the ruffian soldiery of the South have been in the habit of boning the bodies of the Northern slain. The statement is made by Southern citizens and their wives; and it is confirmed by the state of the remains which have been dug up, for the purpose of an authorized inquiry. “Yankee skulls” have been a common article of sale for drinking cups, at ten dollars each; jawbones are found serving as spurs; leg and arm bones as whip-handles; and vertebrae as castanets, or as toys for children, or tent or hut ornaments in camp.

It is to be regretted that the writer who is so conversant with the minutest details did not favour the lovers of the horrible with some further particulars. We are informed, from sources as reliable and authentic as those he can cite, that the carcasses of Northern soldiers are made into jelly for the Confederate hospitals. The deficiency of shoe-leather is supplied by human skins; and it is also stated, though there is some doubt overhauling the assertion, that the Confederate knapsacks and cartridge-boxes are made of the same material. The next time this exploded story is revamped, we trust these particulars will be added, for the sake of historical accuracy.

DURING the memorable engagement of the Virginia with the Federal squadron in Hampton Roads, a white flag was hoisted at the Federal frigate Congress in token of surrender, on beholding the fate of her companion, the Cumberland. On the Confederates coming on board of the surrendered frigate, a deadly fire was poured in upon them from the batteries on shore. The same barbarous abuse of the white flag is generally believed in the South to have been practised at the battle of Bull's Run, and in other engagements. It appears now that it has become a recognized ruse de guerre among the Federal invaders, for in a recent account of the Federal defeat at Williamsburg, we find the following, the accuracy of which we have no reason to doubt. We give it without comment:—

During the battle of Williamsburg, a small party of the enemy approached bearing a white flag. By this means they were permitted to come within a few paces of her lines. Suddenly they, and some of their comrades concealed in the woods, poured a murderous fire into our ranks.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.

TAKING THE OATH.

Lynchburg, Virginia, May 2, 1861.

From this day we are, not in theory only, but in sober fact, common soldiers—"enlisted men" for the term of twelve months, under the Rules and Articles of War of the Confederate States, which are identical, bating the change of an adjective, with those for the regular army of the United States. This morning a Confederate officer arrived at Lynchburg, authorized to muster us into the service and administer the oath. The ceremony was an imposing one, and there was not, I truly believe, a man in all the ten companies that did not feel the solemnity of the occasion, and of the obligations he was assuming. Had any one regretted, or even hesitated, it was yet time to withdraw before taking the final step, for up to that moment the authority of our officers rested solely upon our own voluntary consent, and we were private gentlemen in military clothes, subject to no law, beyond our own wills, which did not apply to all other citizens alike. Now, in the discharge of the highest duty of citizenship, that of defending our country, we have abjured all its rights and privileges, nay, even the slightest claim to personal freedom of thought or action. Surely it is a hard sacrifice for gentlemen to make, but it has been cheerfully and unreservedly made.

It had often occurred to me how harsh are the military regulations of the United States' standing army; how much more like a transcript from mediæval days than like the military code of a modern nation. The death penalty occurs in them more frequently than in either the French or English regulations, and corporeal punishment, once abolished, has been reinstituted within the last few years by an Act of Congress. The gulf between officer and private is wider than in any other army, excepting, perhaps, the Austrian; and instead of aiming to elevate the self-respect of the man, these regulations systematically and intentionally tend to degrade him in his own estimation. There is a strange anomaly in this, when it is considered that these are the military institutions of a country whose political institutions are based upon universal equality, universal suffrage, and an assumed universal capacity for collective and individual self-government. But the reason was plain, and, perhaps, sufficient. In other countries the regular army, in whatsoever manner raised, whether by voluntary enlistment, or by conscription, consists of the natives of the country. Not so with the small regular army of the United States, which is composed, without exception, of foreign mercenaries, principally Irish and Germans, the only native element in it being the commissioned officers. Between these, educated at one of the best military schools in the world, and representing, as a class, the most genuine social respectability of the land, and the wretched soldiers, there does not even exist the tie of a common country, nor, in a majority of instances, a common language. This little army, moreover, at no period exceeding 13,000 men, was designed for the protection of a remote and illimitable frontier, scattered into little posts and detachments, far from the region of civilized life, amid the Red Indians, and white men scarcely less savage. No wonder, then, that a stern, and even cruel, code should be devised for such an army, so composed and so circumstanced.

But it would be difficult to imagine a system of legislation less adapted to our necessities, and more directly opposed to all common sense deductions from existing facts. Instead of being the scum of every foreign clime, idle vagabonds unable to obtain the wages of labour in a country where labour is wealth, we are the representatives of the best families in the land, many of our number men of vast wealth, all possessed of some means, and none devoid of the essentials of a superior education. Instead of seeking a miserable livelihood, we all are sacrificing private interests to what we cherish as a sacred cause and a bounden duty. While among the "regulars" of the United States' services, not an instance is on record of a man having risen from the ranks to a commission, the right of election, which, with such strange inconsistency, is thrust upon us, may convert the private soldier of to-day into the commander of a regiment to-morrow. Instead of being broken up into small frontier posts, thousands of miles away from civilization, we are about being massed into huge armies, and our battles will, for the most part, no doubt, be on our own soil and under the eyes of those whose approbation and praise we value.

This is not grumbling. I write it to one of the leading journals of the South, in the hope that it may direct the eyes of the authorities to the absurdities and glaring inconsistencies of a system which, in the progress of the war now commencing, might work serious mischief. The habit of command is acquired by the Southerner from his earliest childhood; the habit of obedience to lawful authority is the correlative of the habit of command. I believe there is no people more easily ruled than ours, no people that has, to the same extent, the instinct of discipline. But the rule must be one which their reason approves, and its discipline must be free from arbitrary and useless annoyances. No troops will bear hardships and privations more cheerfully than ours, and they will not even inquire the cause, so long as they believe that there is a good cause for them; but no troops, also, will sooner rebel indignantly against wanton exactions or imbecile commands. Now, these army regulations, no doubt admirably adapted to the purposes for which they were devised, are so strangely unsuited to the volunteer system that if they are enforced they will be felt as a cruel and wanton injustice; if they are not enforced, then it will leave us without any systematic discipline whatever. Thus we shall combine the worst features of a regular army with those of loosely-organized volunteer troops.

Among other things we have lost this day are our high-sounding company names. Henceforth the Mobile Cadets will simply be "Co. A 3rd Reg. Ala. Vol." The more usual style will be to call each company by the name of its captain. When Company A was mustered in this morning, it was found to contain three men more than the military laws of the Confederate States allow. Each company is entitled to four company officers, viz: captain, one first and two second lieutenants, four sergeants, four corporals, one drummer, and 160 privates; a total of 109, or an aggregate of 113. While the company retained its right of balloting for members, several urgent applicants, who had overtaken us on our way, had been added without a very close inspection of the muster roll. Some awkward disputes might have arisen from its redundancy, which, however, was wisely obviated by our captain, who at once ordered three of the oldest members to the rear, whereupon the remainder mustered in without them. The three rejected ones will not, however, return home. They are to follow us as supernumeraries, without pay or rations, but subject to all the duties and penalties of privates, and will take their places in the ranks again, so soon as vacancies occur either by death or promotion. This is not exactly regular; in fact, it is decidedly irregular. But the mustering officer knows nothing of it, and we shall take good care not to obtrude our excess of numbers on the knowledge of the Confederate authorities. A less difficulty is presented by our fifth sergeant. He will still be respected and obeyed as a non-commissioned officer, but reported on the books as a private, and draw pay as such; that is, if any of us ever draw pay at all.

THE FIRST CAMP.

Lynchburg, Virginia, May 3, 1861.

Our first quarters at Lynchburg were on the Fair Grounds, and the stalls used for the annual cattle show served us as barracks. On the evening of the 1st, however, we pitched our tents in a beautiful oak forest, wholly free from undergrowth, on the brow of a lofty hill, in full view of the majestic Blue Ridge. To many in the regiment the sight of a vast range of mountains is a novel one, and as interesting as would be our boundless plains and low swamps to the inhabitants of a mountainous region.

The rapidity with which this lively canvas town rose seemed the work of magic. It would have done credit to the oldest veterans of any European army. Within little more than an hour from the word of command every tent was pitched, and not carelessly or slovenly, but with geometrical accuracy of lines, and according to the minutest requirements of the books. Two-thirds of the companies are old-established volunteer companies, and the other third have seen some service in the occupation of Pensacola before the war broke out. A fair majority of the members of each are, therefore, not altogether novices in camp life, and have now an opportunity of practising in earnest the lessons learned, more for amusement than instruction, in the gay annual encampments of the happy days of peace.

To me it is a strangely new experience. Being unskilled in the art and science of pitching tents, I, with others equally in the way, have been set to a task more ignoble, but not less useful. A layer of dead leaves, several inches thick, covers the ground, and this we set resolutely to work to remove. In default of proper instruments, we raked it together with our hands and feet, and then swept the earth with branches of trees. The next day the work was resumed on a grander scale, to clean up our company parade ground, and our share of the regimental parade. On that occasion we managed to procure some garden tools, but hands and feet still remained the only substitutes most of us had for them. The absurdity of our respective postures, and the novelty of the occupation, in a measure compensated for the fatigue, but there are several concomitants of this sort of work which are decidedly disagreeable. The dirt is the slightest of them, for water and soap can remove that. But this layer of dead leaves is inhabited by millions of little creatures, familiarly called the "red bug"—I do not know its scientific name—a small insect, almost invisible to the naked eye, which buries itself in the skin and causes painful inflammations, and sometimes serious sores. The ingenuity of our volunteers has already discovered a specific against these vicious vermin, viz:—bathing the afflicted limbs in whiskey, but this precious beverage is too scarce to be thus wasted, as it has to be smuggled into camp surreptitiously, and experiments are now on foot, on an extensive scale, to discover whether its internal application might not prove equally efficacious.

Yesterday a large lot of lumber arrived, which we had sent to the city to purchase at our individual expense. This we are still busily converting into tables, benches, and gun-racks, and already the camp begins to wear an aspect of comparative comfort. It is wonderful how quickly all of us are adapting ourselves to the requirements of this al fresco existence; the city companies apparently more quickly than those from the rural districts, but their readiness of invention serves as example to the others. A number of coarse cheap carpets have been bought to spread on our tent floors, to protect us from the moisture and cold which we, accustomed to a milder climate, feel severely.

On the day after we took the oath, we had our first regimental parade, with half the female population of Lynchburg as admiring spectators. The impression we produced must have been highly favourable, for ever since our camp has been thronged with lady visitors every evening. At first they scarcely ventured a glimpse into the interior of the tents, but they have already become so far familiar with our soldiers' ways that they now accept our gallant invitations to partake of our fare, admire our "carpets," and rest as comfortably upon the unplanned benches of our own rude construction as upon their own sofas. Hams and tongues, hot rolls and buckwheat cakes, roast turkeys, loaves of fresh bread, and similar welcome donations pour in upon us with delightful profusion; and some of the messes have had whole breakfasts sent out to them served on fine china and plate. Invitations to dinner are not wanting either, only the officers are less liberal of furlongs than they were in Montgomery.

This is the great centre of the tobacco region, and the chief emporium of that great staple. So bountifully has the generosity of the citizens supplied us with the choicest brands of the narcotic weed, that, a fair division among the whole regiment, would give every man at least ten pounds of tobacco, which a prince need not disdain to smoke.

Lynchburg, May 4, 1861.

Just as we are becoming quite comfortable at Lynchburg, and making acquaintance both with the picturesque town and its hospitable inhabitants, we are ordered off again. To-morrow, at daylight, we are to strike our tents, and proceed by special train to Norfolk. The navy-yard has been precipitately abandoned by Prendergast, after a vain attempt to blow up the dry-dock. The Merrimac has been partly burnt and sunk, the old States, and Pennsylvania, of glorious memory, destroyed. The Yankees are expected to return in force, as they can never abandon without a desperate struggle a place so important to them and to us. So we are to have a brush with them as soon as we expected, though in a different quarter. We are proud of being selected for the post of honour, as Norfolk, unquestionably, will be the scene of the first great battle.

The Cruise of the Sumter.

FROM NOTES TAKEN ON BOARD BY ONE OF HER OFFICERS.

THE YANKEE CAPTAIN AND HIS DOLLARS.

WE soon found the calm belt; let the steam go down, uncoupled the screw, made sail, and commenced cruising in the track of vessels bound from the Brazils and Pacific to the United States. We cruised in this way more than two weeks, without seeing a single sail. We encountered here, every day, those remarkable tidal waves that navigators mention. The sea would be perfectly calm; when, in the distance, a few white caps could be seen approaching the ship, and in less than a quarter of an hour the whole surface of the ocean would be lashed into the wildest fury, tossing the ship about as if she was a mere cockleshell upon the water, her sails and rudder useless, owing to the absence of wind. The water would remain in this disturbed state for half an hour or more, and then, almost as suddenly as it rose, the sea would resume its mirror-like appearance. The white waves in the distance dashing on to the eastward with fearful rapidity.

At daylight, on the morning of the 5th of October, discovered the first sail since leaving Maranhau, gave chase, and at nine o'clock came up with her. Hoisted United States' colours, and fired a gun to bring her to. She, also, showed the United States' flag. Sent an officer on board to take charge of the vessel, and bring the captain of her to our ship. The officer who boarded the stranger (which proved to be the Joseph Park, of Boston) asked the captain if he had cargo? Answer, No. "Have you any specie?" "No, not a dollar." "Then, Captain, you must get into the boat, and go with me on board the Sumter." "What are you going to do with me when I go on board?" The officer told him it would depend entirely upon circumstances, that if he behaved himself, and did not try to conceal anything, he would receive kind treatment; but it all depended upon himself. "Well," says he, "Captain (he called the officer who boarded him Captain) I have got a thousand dollars down below, and, I guess, I had better give it to you." So he went below, and from out of some little hole took the bag containing the gold. The officer asked him why he had hid his money, seeing we had United States' colours up? He said he thought it was the Sumter, and wanted to be on the safe side. The whole scene between the officer and the captain of the Joseph Park was ludicrous in the extreme. The answers to questions with that Yankee nasal twang and Yankee cunning, the officer seeing through it and enjoying it all the while, made many jokes in our mess afterwards. The vessel had no cargo, and was returning from Pernambuco to Boston. In order to have a wider range of vision across the track we were cruising along, an officer and crew were sent on board of her, with orders to keep in sight of us, and make signal if a sail hove in sight. The Joseph Park's crew were transferred to our ship. We cruised in this way for a number of days, but there appeared to be no vessels on the ocean, or, at least, we could not find them. At length we made signal to the Joseph Park to come near us, took our men from her, practiced upon her a short time with shell, set her on fire, and stood to the westward. We kept in the usual track of vessels, seeing only two or three in as many weeks, and they all proved to be not vessels of the United States.

LIVING IN CLOVER.

On the 25th of October, on Sunday morning, about sunrise, made a sail to the westward, gave chase; at once the sail suspected us and kept off before the wind, putting on all sail; she was very fast, and the chase was a long one; however, about two o'clock we got within shooting distance, and brought her to. She proved to be the United States' schooner, Daniel Trowbridge, from New York bound to Demerara, with just such a cargo as we wished to get hold of. She had a large number of sheep, pigs, geese, chickens, ducks, &c., on deck; and below, all kinds of salt provisions that we wished, cheese, tongues, hams, beef, pork, and, in fact, everything that the most delicate palate would fancy. She was a prize indeed, to men who had been at sea nearly fifty days living on salt provisions. The transition from salt to fresh was so unexpected and so sudden, that we could hardly realize it.

A corps of butchers was at once organized, and sent on board to kill some sheep and geese, for the officers and crew of our vessel. The crew of the Trowbridge was transferred to us, and a prize crew put on board of her. She was the most tangible prize we had taken since leaving the Confederate States. All the rest had no cargoes, or such as would have to be destroyed; but, on board of her, was everything most wanted by hungry hunters. We laid by her for a number of days, receiving fresh supplies every morning, and, during the day, transporting her cargo to our vessel—that is, her beef, pork, potatoes, &c. Of course there was a large portion of it of which we could make no use. After living in clover about a week, took the live stock to the Sumter, brought our men from the prize, and set fire to her. The captain of the Joseph Park seemed very much pleased that we had taken another prize, as he said he did not wish to be the only one we would take into port.

We left the Trowbridge, and continued our cru-

ing, speaking and boarding a number of vessels, but could find no more Yankees. Once we stood down on a steamer, supposing her to be a man-of-war on the look-out for us, but she proved to be a British man-of-war. We approached the islands, but our luck was no better. All the Yankee vessels had been driven by us from the West Indies. Our exploits on the coast of Cuba frightened them all away; we could catch none. We even went among the islands, where we were almost certain of finding men-of-war double our size; but, still, we could take no prizes.

By this time our supply of water was exhausted, and we were compelled to go into port; so, on the 9th of November, we steamed into the harbour of Fort de France, Island of Martinique, after being fifty-seven days at sea.

Reviews.

A HISTORICAL PARALLEL. *

No. II.

TYRANTS are never without an excuse for their tyranny. Kings and Governments do wrong in the name of right, virtue, or religion; and we may be sure that if the wrong-doing is particularly unjustifiable and atrocious, religion will be the favourite pretence. The Inquisition was the immediate cause of the revolt in the Netherlands; but we cannot agree with Mr. Motley that "it is almost puerile to look further or deeper, when such a source of convulsion lies at the very outset of any investigation." To call Philip the Second a relentless, savage fanatic, is to flatter the memory of a monster, who cared no more for the honour of God, or the welfare of the Church, than he did for the ruthless slaughter of his subjects. He was the constitutional ruler of the Netherlands, and if the country had been poor he might have been contented with his limited sovereignty. But the Netherlands teemed with riches, and therefore Philip determined to rule despotically, so that he might, without let or hindrance, tax the resources of the country. He plundered and killed under the plea of hereditary right and of religious duty. Insatiable cupidity impelled him to attempt the conquest of the freedom of the Netherlands, just as the ravenous greed of the Northern States of America has incited them to attempt the subjugation of the independence of the Southern States. If the Confederate States had been poor instead of a mine of wealth, Secession would have been treated by the North as a thoroughly constitutional proceeding.

At the outset of the revolt, William the Silent was a sincere Catholic, as well as a sincere Royalist. He was not the champion of Calvinism or Lutheranism, but of the civil and municipal rights of the Netherlands. He opposed the introduction of the Inquisition because it was an invasion of constitutional freedom, and for no other reason. His Catholicism was as unquestionable as that of Count Horn or Count Egmont; but he was too far-seeing to be imposed upon by the hypocrisy of Philip. When, in 1566, he resolved to employ force to prevent the conquest and desolation of his country, he was bent upon the defence of ancient rights, and did not contemplate a revolution or favouring the cause of Protestantism.

He despatched a private envoy to Egmont, representing the grave suspicions manifested by the Duchess in sending Duke Eric into Holland, and proposing that means should be taken into consideration for obviating the dangers with which the country was menaced. Catholics as well as Protestants, he intimated, were to be crushed in one universal conquest as soon as Philip had completed the formidable preparations which he was making for invading the provinces. For himself, he said, he would not remain in the land to witness the utter dereliction of the people, nor to fall an unresisting victim to the vengeance which he foresaw. If, however, he might rely upon the co-operation of Egmont and Horn, he was willing, with the advice of the States-General, to risk preparations against the armed invasion of Spaniards by which the country was to be reduced to slavery. It was incumbent, however, upon men placed as they were, "not to let the grass grow under their feet;" and the moment for action was fast approaching.

This was the scheme which Orange was willing to attempt. To make use of his own influence and that of his friends, to interpose between a sovereign insane with bigotry, and a people in a state of religious frenzy, to resist brutal violence if need should be by force, and to compel the sovereign to respect the charters which he had sworn to maintain, and which were far more ancient than his sovereignty; so much of treason did William of Orange already contemplate, for in no other way could he be loyal to his country and his own honour.

William could not inspire his friends with resolution, or convince them of the treachery of Philip. Egmont and Horn confided in the professions of the King, who having formally decreed their deaths, wrote them with the same pen friendly and cordial letters. The people were awed by force. The leaders of the Confederacy were divided and won over by duplicity that might have deceived the astute William, had he not kept such a watch upon the arch-hypocrite that even the secret despatches kept under lock and key in the royal cabinet were read by the agent of the Prince, and their contents communicated to him. The Duchess might well protest, when she knew of the advent of the Duke of Alva, that under her administration the provinces had been pacified. Agitation was succeeded by calm. Egmont had used his influence in Flanders and Artois to introduce a sufficient force to maintain the royal authority. Tournay had been unresistently garrisoned. The brave Thoulouse and his little army had been defeated and slain by De Beauvoir. Antwerp had with difficulty been saved from intestine warfare and destruction, by the prudence and courage of William. After a heroic defence, Valenciennes was surrendered to Noircarmes by the citizens who, seeing their hopes of succour destroyed, were suddenly panic-stricken; and it is hardly necessary to add that the stipulation "that the city should not be sacked, and that the lives of the inhabitants should be spared," was practically disregarded by the conquerors, and that the blood of the citizens was shed remorselessly, and their property confiscated upon the most flimsy pretexts, or often without any pretext.

* The Rise of the Dutch Republic. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. History of the United Netherlands. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. London: John Murray.

Upon the fate of Valenciennes had depended, as if by common agreement, the whole destiny of the anti-Catholic party. "People had learned at last," says another Walloon, "that the King had long arms, and that he had not been enlisting soldiers to string beads. So they drew in their horns and their evil tempers, meaning to put them forth again, should the Government not succeed at the siege of Valenciennes." The Government had succeeded, however, and the consternation was extreme, the general submission immediate and even abject. "The capture of Valenciennes," wrote Noircarmes to Granvelle, "has worked a miracle. The other cities all come forth to meet me, putting the rope around their own necks." No opposition was offered anywhere. Tournay had been crushed; Valenciennes, Bois le Duc, and all other important places, accepted their garrisons without a murmur. Even Antwerp had made its last struggle, and as soon as the back of Orange was turned, knelt down in the dust to receive its bridle. The Prince had been able, by his courage and wisdom, to avert a sanguinary conflict within its walls, but his personal presence alone could guarantee anything like religious liberty for the inhabitants, now that the rest of the country was subdued. On the 26th April, sixteen companies of infantry, under Count Mansfield, entered the gates. On the 28th, the Duchess made a visit to the city, where she was received with respect, but where her eyes were shocked by that which she termed the "abominable, sad, and hideous spectacle of the desolated churches."

To the eyes of all who loved their fatherland and their race, the sight of a desolate country, with its ancient charters superseded by brute force, its industrious population swarming from the land in droves, as if the pestilence were raging, with gibbets and scaffolds erected in every village, and with a sickening and universal apprehension of still darker disasters to follow, was a spectacle still more sad, hideous, and abominable.

At length, William, who was largely endowed with that firmness of mind which rises superior to reverses, and is more valuable in statesmanship than any other quality, saw that nothing could, for awhile, be done to rescue the Netherlands. Happily for the cause of freedom and civilization, he retired to Germany, and so escaped the doom of his former associates, who trusted to the royal word, and were recompensed for their credulity and services by mock trials and shameful deaths.

With the departure of Orange, a total eclipse seemed to come over the Netherlands. The country was absolutely helpless, the popular heart cold with apprehension. All persons at all implicated in the late troubles, or suspected of heresy, fled from their homes. Fugitive soldiers were hunted into rivers, cut to pieces in the fields, hanged, burned, or drowned, like dogs, without quarter, and without remorse. The most industrious and valuable part of the population left the land in droves. The tide swept onwards with such rapidity that the Netherlands seemed fast becoming the desolate waste which they had been before the Christian era. Throughout the country, those Reformers who were unable to effect their escape betook themselves to their old lurking-places. The new religion was banished from all the cities, every conventicle was broken up by armed men, the preachers and leading members were hanged, their disciples beaten with rods, reduced to beggary, or imprisoned, even if they sometimes escaped the scaffold. An incredible number, however, were executed for religious causes. Hardly a village so small, says the Antwerp chronicler, but that it could furnish one, two, or three hundred victims to the executioner. The new churches were levelled to the ground, and out of their timber galleys were constructed. It was thought an ingenious ploy to hang the Reformers upon the beams under which they had hoped to worship God. The property of the fugitives was confiscated. The beggars in name became beggars in reality. Many who felt obliged to remain, and who loved their possessions better than their creed, were suddenly converted into the most zealous of Catholics. Persons who had for years not gone to mass never omitted now their daily and nightly visits to the churches. Persons who had never spoken to an ecclesiastic but with contumely, now could not eat their dinners without one at their table. Many who were suspected of having participated in Calvinistic rites were foremost and loudest in puffing down and denouncing all forms and shows of the Reformation. "The country was as completely 'pacified,' to use the conqueror's expression, as Gaul had been by Cæsar."

And now, if Philip had been prudent, he might have exercised despotic sway over the Netherlands. If he had been contented with moderate extortion and moderate slaughter, it is probable that scarcely any effort to excite the people to revolt would have been unsuccessful. He might, after a few years, have made the Inquisition an established institution of the country. But he was not satisfied with his triumph. He determined that not a vestige of liberty should remain. It was not enough that the nation was prostrate. He must make his absolute power apparent to the world. Besides, his work was not complete until the best blood of the citizens had been spilt, and all the wealth of the country was at his disposal. So he entered upon such a course that made resistance to his authority imperative. He trod upon the worm until it turned.

The ready subjugation of the Netherlands by the measures of the Regent Duchess is curious and instructive. How was it a people so brave and so determined—who afterwards for two generations waged a terribly unequal war against tyranny—should at the commencement have submitted to the loss of independence? In 1566, the power of Philip in the Netherlands was so comparatively moderate, that if the people had rallied round William it might have been kept in check. It was an extraordinary blunder not to resist until the means of resistance had been crippled and the Spanish troops were in possession of the cities and strongholds. The impolicy, though startling, is not unaccountable. Owing to the differences of race, the Netherlands were not, and never could be, thoroughly united. Every national league was weakened by distrust, jealousy, and faction. Moreover, the people fell into the too common error of believing in the possibility of a compromise of rights. They thought that by conceding much they might preserve a few of their privileges and some of their property. They did not know that there is no resting-place for a nation between absolute independence and absolute dependence. It was not so well understood in the sixteenth century as it is at present, that the only valid security for the rights and riches of a nation is national independence.

Notwithstanding the indignant and pathetic remonstrances of the Duchess, the Duke of Alva was despatched by Philip to trample on the people—to grind the bruised reed of revolt into dust; and to quench the smoking flax of liberty, if all thought of independence was not already extinguished. Philip selected a very fitting instrument to carry out his cruel edicts. The Duke of Alva was, perhaps, the first general of his day, and placed at the head of a well-equipped army, he would have been a formidable foe under any circumstances; to the depressed Netherlands, he seemed a crushing and irresistible fate. Next to Philip, he was the most heartless hypocrite then living. He could fuddle the man warily, affectionately, whom he determined to kill at the earliest opportunity. His usefulness as the agent of the morose Spanish despot was not curtailed by any pity for his victims. To order the torture and execution of one or a score of innocent persons produced no other excitement than a little pleasant hilarity.

Alva came to a conquered country, took possession, and deliberately set to work to squeeze out the revenue he had promised his master, and to which promise he probably owed his appointment. His method, certainly, had the merit of simplicity. He did not trouble himself with the complex machinery of taxation. He made wealth a crime, slaughtered rich citizens by wholesale, and confiscated their property. The Council of Blood did not take the trouble to inquire whether the accused persons were guilty or not of being rich. If a poor person was despatched, so much the better, for there was one Netherlander the less; and if the unfortunate wretch was rich, it was well to have got rid of him by a summary and facile process.

Thus the whole country became a charnel-house; the death-bell tolled hourly in every village; not a family but was called to mourn for its dearest relatives, while the survivors stalked listlessly about, the ghosts of their former selves, among the wrecks of their former homes. The spirit of the nation, within a few months after the arrival of Alva, seemed hopelessly broken. The blood of its best and bravest had already stained the scaffold; the men to whom it had been accustomed to look for guidance and protection were dead, in prison, or in exile. Submission had ceased to be of any avail, flight was impossible, and the spirit of vengeance had alighted at every fireside. The mourners went daily about the streets, for there was hardly a house which had not been made desolate. The scaffolds, the gallows, the funeral piles, which had been sufficient in ordinary times, furnished now an entirely inadequate machinery for the incessant executions. Columns and stakes in every street, the door-posts of private houses, the fences in the fields, were laden with human carcasses, strangled, burned, beheaded. The orchards in this country bore on many a tree the hideous fruit of human bodies.

Thus the Netherlands were crushed, and but for the stringency of the tyranny which had now closed their gates, would have been depopulated. The grass began to grow in the streets of those cities which had recently nourished so many artisans. In all these great manufacturing and industrial marts, where the tide of human life had thrashed so vigorously, there now reigned the silence and darkness of midnight.

The Prince of Orange, though abroad, was not unmindful of the wrongs of his country. Philip seemed determined to do what he could to spur the illustrious exile into active resistance to his tyranny, in case patriotism should prove too weak an incentive. He was outlawed, despoiled of his property, and his eldest son was taken from him. At the darkest hour, he resolved to wage war against Philip. The Duke of Alva might well regret he had not secured William. Cardinal Granvelle asked if the Taciturn had been taken? "Receiving a negative reply, he expressed extreme disappointment, adding, that if Orange had escaped, they had taken nobody, and that his capture would have been more valuable than that of any man in the Netherlands." The Cardinal was a shrewd man, and for once, perhaps for the only time in his life, he spoke the truth.

Yet William's prospects were not encouraging. Strange to say, when he applied for foreign assistance, he obtained little more than promises. It was the interest of Europe that the power of Spain should not be increased. It was the interest of commerce that the Netherlands should remain independent. It was the interest of Protestantism that the reformed religion should not be rooted out of the Netherlands by fire and sword. If these motives were not sufficient to call into existence an avowed international league against Philip, one would have supposed that in secret William would have been warmly supported; but, on the contrary, his undertaking was hindered and crippled by want of money.

In 1568, the Prince began to enlist troops, and on the 6th of April granted a commission to the dashing Louis of Nassau. The indispensable funds were raised by subscription, William contributing 50,000 florins, being enabled to do so by the sale of his plate, jewels, and other personal effects. These preparations must have seemed ludicrously inadequate to the friends of the cause, and, doubtless, amused the arrogant Spaniards. In order to further discourage the insurgents, their first efforts were signally defeated. A force, under de Cocqueville, was cut to pieces by the Governor of Picardy. A force under Seigneur de Villas was completely routed. We are not then surprised at the Spaniards feeling supreme contempt for the army led by Louis of Nassau; though this contempt cost them dearly.

Louis selected an admirable battle field. The Spanish troops were impatient for the onslaught, and Aremberg, their commander, unable to resist the impetuosity of his officers, gave battle, even without waiting for a reinforcement on its way to his camp, which was daily, almost hourly, expected, and which would have turned the scale. His imprudence met with its meet reward; his troops being completely defeated.

The victory of Louis was followed by a season of inactivity, during which Alva prepared to revenge the defeat of his lieutenant. The opposing forces met at Groningen, and the patriots were panic stricken and routed. Louis took refuge at Jemmingen, a small town on the Ems. Completely hemmed in by the Spaniards on one side and the river on the other, he had only one chance of arresting the progress of the enemy.

Meantime, a work which had been too long neglected, was then, if possible, to be performed. In that watery territory, the sea was only held in check by artificial means. In a very short time, by the demolition of a few dykes, and the opening of a few sluices, the whole country through which the Spaniards had to pass could be laid under water. Believing it yet possible to enlist the ocean in his defence, Louis, having partially reduced his soldiers to obedience, ordered a strong detachment upon this important service. Seizing a spade, he commenced the work himself, and then returned to set his army in battle array. Two or three tide-gates had been opened, two or three bridges had been demolished, when Alva, riding in advance of his army, appeared within a mile or two of Jemmingen. It was then eight o'clock in the morning. The patriots redoubled their efforts. By ten o'clock the waters were already knee high, and in some places as deep as to the waist. At that hour, the advanced guard of the Spaniards arrived. Fifteen hundred musketeers were immediately ordered forward by the Duke. They were preceded by a company of mounted carabineers, attended by a small band of volunteers of distinction. This little band threw themselves at once upon the troops engaged in destroying the dykes. The rebels fled at the first onset, and the Spaniards closed the gates. Feeling the full importance of the moment, Count Louis ordered a large force of musketeers to recover the position, and to complete the work of inundation. It was too late. The little band of Spaniards held the post with consummate tenacity. Charge after charge, volley after volley, from the overwhelming force brought against them, failed to loosen the fierce grip with which they held this key to the whole situation. Before they could be driven from the dykes, their comrades arrived, when all their antagonists at once made a hurried retreat to their camp.

A little more promptness, and an impassable swamp would have separated Louis from his antagonist. As it was, his followers were butchered, literally butchered. "It was not a battle, but a massacre. Those who escaped the sword were hurled into the river. Seven Spaniards were killed, and seven thousand rebels." It is worthy of notice how those who were warring against constitutional rights persistently designated the defenders of those rights as rebels. In this respect also the Federals have closely followed the example of the Spanish tyrant.

Louis escaped the carnage by swimming across the Ems, and took refuge in Germany.

The Spanish army, two days afterwards, marched back to Groningeo. The page which records their victorious campaign is foul with outrage and red with blood. None of the horrors which accompany the passage of hostile troops through a defenceless country were omitted. Maids and matrons were ravished in multitudes; old men butchered in cold blood. As Alva returned, with the rear-guard of his army, the whole sky was red with a constant conflagration; the very earth seemed changed to ashes. Every peasant's hovel, every farm-house, every village upon the road, had been burned to the ground. So gross and so extensive had been the outrage, that the commander-in-chief felt it due to his dignity to hang some of his own soldiers who had most distinguished themselves in this work. Thus ended the campaign of Count Louis in Friesland. Thus signally and terribly had the Duke of Alva vindicated the supremacy of Spanish discipline and of his own military skill.

There was everywhere hopeless consternation. William only kept a stout heart, and refusing to despair of the liberty of his country, prepared to strike another blow for the sacred cause. In vain his friends advised him to remain quiet; he had a duty to fulfil, and he was not daunted by the dangers and the sacrifices. On the eve of his departure he wrote to Anna of Savoy:—"I see well enough that I am destined to pass this life in misery and labour, with which I am well content, since it thus pleases the Omnipotent, for I know that I have merited still greater chastisement. I only implore Him, graciously, to send me strength to endure with patience." A man so resolute, and full of such noble sentiments was altogether superior to the smiles and frowns of fickle fortune, and was eminently suited to fight the battle of national independence.

(To be continued.)

Abel Drake's Wife. A Novel. By JOHN SAUNDERS: London: Lockwood & Co.

THE proprietor of a cheap serial for the million, which the million ungratefully refused to purchase, confessed his ill-luck to the proprietor of the most successful story-telling journal ever published. The latter, commiserating the misfortune of his would-be rival, very magnanimously enlightened him as to the cause of his failure. "What you want, sir, is more blood. I have looked over some of your numbers, and find in them only one murder. Now, I never allow a number of my journal to appear without, at least, three violent deaths. What the public require is, plenty of blood for their pence." There is a great deal of shrewdness in the advice, but it is a mistake to suppose, that the taste for horrors is confined to the lower ten millions. The authoress of "Adam Bede," with her undoubted literary power, would not have become so rapidly popular, if she had not treated her readers to sensation horrors. Mr. Charles Dickens, who was formerly so pleasant and genial, never indulges in his later novels in a cheerful passage or a cheerful character, unless to intensify the terrors of the tale by contrast. Sir E. B. Lytton has, by the publication of "A Strange Story," eclipsed the already great reputation he enjoyed as a literary terrorist, by the authorship of "Lucretia." Passing by the legion of novelists who devote their energies to piling up horrors, we must, from a sense of justice, make special mention of Mr. Wilkie Collins, whose imagination seems to be affected with morbid melancholy. We happened to read a few chapters of "No Name." At first we thought it impossible that Mr. Wilkie Collins could have written anything so free from gloom. The idea of the author of "The Woman in White" writing so that a young lady could read without exclaiming, "Oh, how beautifully shocking!" was extremely funny. But a few pages convinced us that Mr. Wilkie Collins had not been unmindful of his duty as literary terrorist. The happiness of the Vanstone family was only set up to be incontinently knocked down. The kind father is killed by a railway accident, the distracted wife forthwith deceases, and the daughters are orphans, and find themselves bastards. The orphanage and bastardy are necessary ingredients of the story, but it would have been far more artistic to have introduced the chief personages of the fiction without bringing father and mother on the scene to kill them off in half a dozen chapters. But we must remember that if Mr. Wilkie Collins had been artistic he would have missed a fine opportunity of being "beautifully shocking."

Lately the public taste has slightly altered. There is still a craving for horrors, but, however tragic the story, it must end well. Mr. Saunders has hit the fashion of the hour in the novel before us; and, therefore, we are not surprised that it has gone into a second edition.

Abel Drake is an ambitious artizan, who marries a young damsel of rather aspiring views, but without education or fortune. Abel becomes a ringleader of a strike, is reduced to poverty, reproached by his wife, and suddenly leaves home to seek his fortune. His infant child dies from want. The bereaved mother vows never to forgive her husband:—

"Abel Drake! if ever you come back to me—come ye rich, or come ye poor, sick or in health—I tell thee now, o'er th' dead body of our child, and in God's own presence, I'll never own thee as my husband! Never!"

Long after the terrible sound of her voice had done ringing through the chamber of death, she knelt there, with her clasped hands extended over the body of her babe, and her stroog resolute face raised to Heaven.

The above passage is very dramatic, and very unreal; but not more unreal than the rest of the story. Barbara enters into the service of a Mrs. Wolcombe, as nurse-maid, blossoms into a governess, and is asked to marry the gallant Captain Wolcombe, upon the supposition that her first husband has been drowned in Canada. After a great deal of diplomatic coying, rather extraordinary in an ex-nursemaid, Barbara consents to wed the love-sick soldier. We might observe, if we were inclined to be fault-finding, that it is not usual for rich manufacturers to consent to their sons marrying the widows of factory hands; or for English officers to form such alliances. However, just in time to prevent Barbara from committing bigamy, up turns Abel Drake, in the character of a wonderful inventor. Barbara is not mollified by absence, and being, perhaps, a trifle disappointed at not being able to marry the captain, treats her husband after the manner of a domestic Lady Macbeth. There are several scenes, and at last, a meeting in the churchyard, at the grave of their child, a reconciliation, an arrest for desertion (a palpable anti-climax), and finally, all differences are made up at the death-bed of Isaac the schoolmaster. Mr. Wolcombe offers to take Abel into partnership, and so, in nursery language, "they lived together happily for ever afterwards."

We think those who read "Abel Drake" will agree with us that it is a very bad story, though very well told.

SOUTHERN PROSPECTS.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The same good fortune which attended the first renewal of the invasion of the South seems uninterruptedly to smile on the Federal arms, and the exultation of the New York journals has known no bounds. And yet, on the other hand, I have seen no symptoms of despondency in the retiring forces of the Confederates, and certainly no diminution of the sympathy with their cause which pervades the educated classes in England. The Radical journals, it is true, are incessantly urging that the success of the Northern arms is a proof of the triumph of democracy, and throwing out warnings of their coming fate on what they are pleased to call the aristocracy of England. But these are matters which are beyond my scope, though fraught with some moment to politicians in this country. The evacuation of the Navy-yard at Norfolk Harbour was necessarily part of the scheme embraced by the council of war which decided on the retreat from Yorktown lines; and the destruction of the world-renowned Merrimac, or Virginia, inevitably followed. The resignation of his appointment to command her by Commodore Tatnall, the motives and cause of which were confidently asserted by the New York papers, we know now to have been occasioned by the extensive injuries inflicted on her by the bursting of her 200-pound gun, which rendered her unequal to the repetition of her former exploits. One thing is certain, as the Saturday Review properly points out, that the most thorough going calumniator of the Confederate States can scarcely dispute the loyal devotion which they have shown to the cause and the Government which they had chosen. And it is this devotion which has insured them the respect of all who are not blinded by self-interest against the monstrous proceedings which have characterized the efforts of the autocracy of Washington to impose the Morrill Tariff on their neighbours. Whether the strictures which the successive retreats have called forth on the naval imbecility of the Confederate States are well founded, we are not yet in a position to decide; but the attitude of their military commanders is not open to the same condemnation. And while the Cabinet of Richmond is in accord with the united support of a free and energetic people, it is not in the mouth of a constitutional lawyer to despise it. So long as the population continue loyal and faithful, the chiefs self-denying and courageous, and their armies unconquered as well as undismayed by the superior forces of an insulting and despotic invader, there is hope and promise. It cannot be too often repeated that inside the positions which navigable rivers would put into the possession of the Federals, by reason of their overwhelming naval superiority, there exists more than 800,000 square miles of territory which the Federals must hold as well as conquer by force of arms. Into that country they must penetrate, with all the chances of fever, of the necessity of transporting all their supplies through a hostile population, superadded to the difficulty of beating an opposing army on their own native soil. These forces, it must be remembered, are commanded by generals who have won the devotion of their own soldiers, and the admiration of foreigners, by strategic movements characterized by secrecy in counsel, rapidity of action, and, above all, by success in effect. Sympathy in England I have long looked to as confined to words by the very nature of our position; that of France may be more effectual, but it must be bought at a sacrifice. The true strength of the Confederate cause now, as ever, lies in the inextinguishable tenacity with which men, educated in the love of freedom handed down to them from their forefathers, cling to the defence of their homes against a hated and arrogant foe. And to doubt their ultimate success in so sacred a cause, is to despair at once of the honour of human nature and the providence of a chastening but merciful God.

AN ENGLISH SYMPATHIZER.

THE CONFEDERATE GUNBOATS AT THE MOUTH OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—Is it not our interest (not to say duty) to help the Times and the bewildered public of this country out of the dilemma into which they have been thrown by the strange contradiction apparent in the issue of the conflict at New Orleans, as compared with that in Hampton Roads? Now, I happen to be in possession of facts, the knowledge of which might have saved the Times the two lengthy "speculations" in which it has indulged on this subject,—and they are briefly these:—First, that the Manassas presented an oval surface almost identical in appearance to her hull, and was simply plated with $\frac{3}{8}$ or $\frac{1}{2}$ in. bar iron, which was the flat rail once used on the track of the Mexican Gulf railroad. You will readily perceive that her shape did not secure perfectly the advantage of sloping lines, and her armour-plate was known to be indifferent unless she was kept bows on, so as to very materially increase the angle at which a ball would strike; and as she was only intended as a ram, it was thought practicable to keep her vulnerable part from being exposed. Besides this, she sat so low in the water, that balls from the deck of an ordinary frigate would strike her from such an elevation as to nullify all the advantage she may have had from oval sides.

Regarding the reputed iron-clad gunboats, I presume they were all of the model I saw before leaving New Orleans; and the result, as stated by —, but corroborates the superiority of sloping sides. He says that his balls had no effect until he found the vulnerable points. Now this I can explain in a moment. Only the machinery of these boats was intended to be protected—and the one I saw had the sloping sides covered with iron immediately around, or rather in front and rear, of the engines, and nowhere else, leaving the remainder of the boat as unprotected as any other wooden craft. Evidently the balls that struck the armour around the engines flew off, while those that were aimed at and struck her hull had the same effect they would have on any other wooden sides. I give you these items in haste.

J. J. M.

EUROPEAN POLITICAL HERESIES.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

THE disruption of the American Union will certainly be one of the most extraordinary historical features of the present century. The extreme facility with which these hordes of Northern shopkeepers have left their mercantile pursuits to engage in all the hardships and cruelties of warfare, astounding as it may appear, is nothing when compared with all the political heresies which this fratricidal war, so wantonly waged upon the South by the North, has resuscitated in Europe. In fact, all the clearest principles of modern international law seem to be intentionally ignored by the Councils of Europe; and its statesmen yielding, as it were, to some whimsical and supernatural power, might well exclaim with Medea, "Viduo meliora sed deteriora sequor."

France and England, two great nations whose very commercial life are at stake in this great struggle, apparently behold the direful events of the American drama, with the utmost insensibility and indifference. The press of these two nations discuss the different phases of the war as though the American continent might disappear from the surface of the globe, without affecting, in the slightest degree, the social organization of Europe.

It can scarcely be conceived that both the Governments and the press of these two countries should have permitted the American war to take its present proportions, if its inherent consequences had been foreseen; especially when the early application of the general principles of international law to the Southern States should have certainly impeded the progress of Northern vandalism and overbearing ambition.

As it is never too late to do good, it may not be amiss to bring back to the vacillating memory of leading men the theories which now govern the political world.

We understand the rules as applicable to nations, to be, that the right of sovereignty, which natural and social law confer equally upon them, gives to each one the absolute right to constitute its own Government; at its will to change or modify its constitution to suit its own political, national, and social purposes; to decide for itself on the best mode of securing its own happiness and prosperity. This right is nothing more than the offspring of reason itself, and the respect which it commands should be sufficiently powerful to apply equally to all nations, small or large, weak or strong. Why? Because, in our opinion, it is common to all, because its disregard would inevitably jeopardize national and social life, because brutal force would overrule legality, because disorder would usurp the place of order, and finally, because no nation could ever rely upon its morrow.

The laws of equity urgently require that existing Governments should treat with friendship a new-born Government, and greet her as a sister entering into the great society of nations. Before truth and justice, all Governments stand on an equal footing. In the great association of humanity each people has a co-equal right to the respect and consideration of the others; or, as Governments are but the representatives of the people, none have the right to treat a neighbour with contumely or disdain.

We apprehend no contradiction of these principles from the European statesmen, far less from those of the United States, for they were the very first to advocate their universal adoption.

In the message of President Monroe, delivered to Congress on the 2nd day of December, 1823, we read the following passage:—"The policy of the American Government towards Europe has been, and shall always be, to consider the Governments de facto as the legitimate Governments, because we respect the right of all nations to claim their independence."

When, therefore, taking in its hands this sovereign power, the people of the Confederate States have chosen to modify their constitution, to adopt a Government of their own, to elect a President, and to trust him with their future destinies, a refusal of recognition on the part of the European Governments can hardly be construed in any other light than that of a paramount negation of the universally admitted principle of the sovereignty of the people.

Is it not by virtue of these very principles that the provinces of the Papal States have been permitted to abandon their legitimate sovereign—that the people of Naples have overthrown their own king, to join the crown of Italy? And, if found to apply in these two particular instances, how much more forcibly are the Confederate States entitled to their most extended application, especially at the hands of England, who can but with ill grace plead ignorance of the fact.

Are the people of the Confederate States to be indefinitely denied the right which belongs to all the nations of Christendom? Is the Confederate Government the only one to be debarré from the benefit of indismissible truth and justice? or are the United States such a formidable Power, and so much to be dreaded as a foe, that her audacious will and arrogant aspirations should be permitted boldly to defy truth and justice?

Patience is undoubtedly a great virtue, but when pushed to the extreme it often becomes a deplorable weakness.

P.B.

PARIS, May 1862.

BALTIMORE, MAY 2.—ARREST OF MR. JOHN SWANN AND OTHERS.—As the Confederate prisoners were coming through Liberty-street on their way from the cars to the jail, on Thursday evening, they were accosted by Mr. John Swann, with the remark—"Well, boys, you're welcome," or some expression of the kind. This being heard by the Deputy-Marshal, he immediately advanced, and placing his hand upon Mr. Swann's shoulder, called him by name, and said that this kind of thing must be put a stop to. Whereupon he gave Mr. Swann into the custody of a policeman, who took him to the station-house, where he was confined during the whole of the night. Yesterday morning General Dix was applied to by the friends of Mr. Swann, to know the cause of his arrest and detention, when they were informed that Marshal McPhail had acted under orders, and that it was absolutely necessary that open expression of sympathy for prisoners should be suppressed. General Dix considered it proper that Mr. Swann should be made an example of, and accordingly he was ordered to Fort McHenry. We also hear of the arrest of Messrs. John Tormey, Henry Smith, and one or two others.

The American Question.

THE subjoined appeared first in a French journal of recent date. It is from the pen of M. Bellot des Minières, a gentleman thoroughly conversant, both from painstaking study, and personal acquaintance with the resources and character of the Southern people. It forms a suitable pendant to the circular of Messrs. Neill Brothers, which we publish elsewhere.

Is the South conquered, the North conqueror, lord, and master? Take a map, and reflect.

What is called the taking, the surrender, of New Orleans and of Yorktown, I would call evacuation of these places. These matters, if they are not concerted between the South and other Governments, are not as clear as I might desire. But what I should reproach the Confederates for, would not be to have abandoned the city without sustaining a bombardment, which must have reduced it to ashes, without the slightest possibility of resistance, but not to have foreseen the case of a few steamers running the gauntlet of the forts, and to have provided against this by other forts in the rear. As for Yorktown, who can believe those journalists, who copy and repeat what others say, that the fortunes of the South would be staked on that isolated position, or that the position itself was of a military importance to warrant a permanent occupation? The Confederates only aimed at checking McClellan's army, and to gain time for the erection of their defences in the interior, nearer Richmond, so as to allure the enemy further and further from his base of operation and his depôts of stores, while they themselves would be nearer their own.

Other considerations suggest themselves to the thinking mind. To sustain a regular siege, no position could have been selected more unfavourable than Yorktown, situated, as it is, at the extreme point of a peninsula, bounded by two mighty streams, which enabled McClellan to bring up as many large siege pieces and mortars as he needed, without counting on the assistance of the Federal fleet, whose huge batteries might combine with the land forces in the attack. That fleet could shell the Confederate lines and defences along the shores of the James and York Rivers with guns of infinitely greater range than they can use at thirty miles further up the peninsula. First, because it is impossible to carry by land siege pieces of fifteen, eighteen, and twenty tons, readily transported on board ships, but which it would be folly to drag with horses over bad roads, in pursuit of a hostile army marching on its own soil. The slightest fall of rain would paralyze the pursuers. Secondly, because the Confederate army falling back, and the peninsula enlarging, this army, at a distance of twenty-five miles from Yorktown, finds itself, on each of its flanks, some twenty miles removed from the cannon of the Federal fleets. It is not necessary to be much of a strategist to understand, that, if it is required to check an army of a hundred thousand men advancing upon a certain point, it would be madness to await that army where there are a thousand pieces of siege and naval artillery to contend against, when this artillery can be wholly avoided elsewhere.

In the battle at Williamsburg the South gained the victory. It is within my personal knowledge, holding it from indisputable authority, that the Confederates have almost always in the open field, and always when the disparity of numbers was not overwhelmingly against them, beaten their opponents. This morning I have received a letter from a former consul of the United States, at Liverpool. I extract the following:—

It now turns out, as usual, that the Yankees have lied, and that they have been severely beaten near Williamsburg. I have seen two letters from the North, entitled to perfect confidence, one from New York, and the other from Philadelphia, both testifying to the same fact.

As regards New Orleans, what has taken place there differs widely from what has been reported in Europe. 25,000 shells were thrown into the two forts, they were not taken by assault, and from the North's own confession, they destroyed several ships of war. General Lovell, with his command of 40,000 men, and the Confederate fleet were more needed by Beauregard further up the Mississippi, than they could be needed in New Orleans, the military occupation of which city is impossible to the North for any length of time.

At present there are the strongest reasons to believe that Beauregard has won a second victory at Corinth. It has been published in the Northern papers that events of high importance had taken place there, but that the Federal Government had kept the information which it had received, perfectly secret. Then we find in English correspondence and English papers, that Beauregard had defeated the Federals and taken 9000 prisoners.

And if we come to the financial condition of the North, we can see no improvement there. They altogether rely on the hope that the South is giving way under those pretended reverses, so grossly exaggerated. The Tax Bill has not been voted. The slightest defeat of the Federals, which should be allowed to become known, will at once break down the credit of Mr. Lincoln's Secretary of the Treasury.

The retreat of the Confederate troops from New Orleans is unquestionably an advantage to the South, and a loss only to the North. That question of Secession, in the eyes of Europe, of America, and especially of the North, is more one of moral order than of brutal force. Mr. Lincoln can only rely on his supporters in the North just as long as he succeeds in making them believe that the South is, at heart, in favour of the Union, and only momentarily deluded by ambitious leaders. It is well known in the North that the conquest of the South would be of no practical result, if the South has a firm will not to re-enter the Union. The occupation of Richmond itself would be a matter of no importance. The Government and the army would retire further back. We can see, from McClellan's official despatches, that it is but with the utmost difficulty that he can provide for his troops; and yet the season is not far advanced, and McClellan is still within gunshot of his ships.

The South cannot make its soldiers invulnerable when these, having no ships of war to support them, are exposed to a disproportionate fire from the enemy's artillery; but the Southerners know very well that gunboats cannot travel inland, and still less in the mountains, and that if the Northern hosts, in proximity to their capital, and with their fleet close at hand, can hardly feed themselves, their victualling will become an utter impossibility when they shall have advanced a few hundred miles in the interior of the country.

Had McClellan been beaten at Yorktown, the result indeed would have proved very unimportant; he could have promptly rallied his troops, and fallen back on his basis of operations. But suppose that he should meet with defeat in the interior, any disadvantage in a fight there becomes at once a disaster. An army beaten under such conditions is an army annihilated. And the case is the same with Buell. Let him be beaten by Beauregard, and his retreat is irretrievably cut off by the people of Tennessee and Kentucky.

The passing of the Abolition Bill for the district of Columbia has done more harm to Mr. Lincoln than any good he may derive from the occupation of New Orleans and Yorktown. The members of Congress for the Border States have withdrawn their support from Lincoln, and have denounced his Administration on the floor of the House. It shows that the whole of Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, Virginia, and Maryland, have given up every idea of the Union being restored, regarding it as an utter impossibility. There lies, in my opinion, the capital fact that not only are these States in favour of the South with their whole heart, but the majority of the Democratic party are opposed to Mr. Lincoln. That party has been wounded in its most vital feelings; that is to say, its political principles—besides, it complains of having been trifled with. The bearing of these Senators and Deputies has for its sole object to be in keeping with the most positively expressed opinions of their constituents. Even at Wheeling, the capital of the new state of Kanawha, formed of the disaffected portion of Virginia, at both the State and county elections the returns have shown a large Secessionist majority. For anyone acquainted with American affairs, this is the order of facts, which has quite another significance than the "Te Deums" chanted by the North.

When the Northern people have seen that the occupation of New Orleans does not affect the South, and that the South, instead of being crushed down, seems, on the contrary, to redouble its energies, to gather its strength anew, to clothe itself more firmly with the indomitable resolution of resisting to the last, then the Northern people will recognize how deeply they have been misled.

Should even Europe join the North, never can the South be conquered by military force. All and every thing depends on one point: Is the South demoralized, or does it will its independence? Why! its spirit has not flinched yet, and its strong will is to resist to the very end. The whole of the people fly to arms. Their Congress has decreed a general levy of all able-bodied men above eighteen years of age; they enlist without awaiting the decree. I am, also, a believer in an alliance between the South and France, relating to Mexico; which France, from all appearances, intends to make one of her dependencies. The South would gladly furnish her 100,000 men. If the South has only her ports open to supply herself with arms, her cause is gained—desperate as it is absurdly supposed by some to be.

THE PUBLIC DEBT 1200,000,000 DOLLARS IN JUNE.—Caleb Cushing, in a speech before the Massachusetts Legislature, this week, upon the subject of Taxes, said:—"Providing the war is brought to a speedy close, his estimate—founded on the detailed figures and the opinions of men in the Government service—of the debt at the close of the Federal fiscal year, June 30, 1862, is at least 1200,000,000. In arriving at this estimate he calculated the expenses to average 1000 dollars to each man in the 633 regiments now in service, and although illness might lessen the number, it would not in the least lessen the expenses. Add to this 634,000,000 dollars the enormous cost of the naval branch, and the above estimate is not overstated. There are two subjects of large consumption which are lightly taxed by Government, which are in great demand abroad—spirited and intoxicating liquors, and tobacco."

BALTIMORE, May 22.—DEATH OF MR. JAMES WILCOX JENKINS.—Information has been received from Richmond that James Wilcox Jenkins, son of Edward Jenkins, Esq., of this city, was killed about the 10th day of April, in a skirmish near Yorktown. According to the brief obituary in the Catholic Mirror, the captain of his company reported that "he died gloriously, fighting bravely at his post." At the time of his death, Mr. Jenkins was a subordinate officer in a Louisiana regiment. His body now lies buried at Williamsburg, the ancient capital of colonial Virginia. Mr. Jenkins had filled several positions of honour and trust in the United States' navy, and in the performance of the duties which were thus devolved upon him, he was held in the highest esteem by superior officers under whom he served. Whilst with Commander Lynch, now of the Confederate navy, in a cruise of three years on the South American coast, Mr. Jenkins held the responsible post of purser, not then being of age. He subsequently filled other offices in a manner which won for himself the highest encomiums from those best qualified to judge of his merits. At the breaking out of the war, Mr. Jenkins was engaged in business in New Orleans, but immediately joined the Confederate army, and served with his company for a long time under General Bragg, at Pensacola. He was afterwards ordered to Yorktown, and was present at the memorable skirmish in which Colonel Drenth fell, whose body he assisted in bearing from the field. Mr. Jenkins was a descendant of one of the earliest settlers of Maryland, and was only twenty-six years of age at the time of his death.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specimen furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, J. Rutherford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.

Represented by
JOS. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
3, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS.
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rilled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BEEZLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Bryon-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly attend to all orders for the Index, and send it by mail, or by express, and will also attend to all orders for the Index,
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES:
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: Houghton, New Lamb-eth.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classical, and liberal system of advertising.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, till will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mightily lever "the Press," and disperse the influence which by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, properly,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors.

WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION

FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRESS INTERNATIONAL
DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress
International de Bienfaissence, will take place in London from the 5th to the 14th of June.

The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.

A series of Soirees will be given during the period of the Meeting, and it is intended that the Committee will visit to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entailing to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to
all the Meetings of the Association and Congress,
and the Soirees, &c.

Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C.; and 12, Old Bond-street, W.

As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association
has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting
will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.

For every 45 subscribers to this Fund, subscribers
are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City
Office, Guildhall, E.C.; by Messrs. Ransom, Bouvier, and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Westminster Bank, Lombury, E.C.; the Union Bank,
Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kennard,
and Co., 4, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George Ledger, 4, Charlotte-street, Mansel House, E.C.

GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.,
and Chairman of Executive Committee.

A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.

G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO AND BRITISH

COLUMBIA, via Panama—Steamers from Southampton on the 2nd and 17th of each month.
THROUGH BILLS OF LADING for goods, &c., are
issued by the ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, in connection with Messrs. Wells, Fargo,
and Co., of San Francisco. Goods should be sent to Southampton, addressed to the care of a shipping agent there. Jewellers received in London.

For further particulars apply to Captain Vincent,
Superintendent; or to R. T. KEMP, Sec., Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 55, Moorgate-
street, E.C.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN

PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY, living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Elysees, offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching for TWO or THREE CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.

Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Langerie,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

"The Human Face Divine." Eyes, Nose, Lips, Mouth, Teeth, Chin, Neck, Head, Hair, Hand, Feet, Temperament, Complexion, Recumbent, Capabilities, &c., in the

NEW ILLUSTRATED SILEN-

CE-STRATOR IN PHYSIOLOGY, PHONO-
LOGY, and PHRENOLOGY, with 1000 Portraits.
Two bound vols. Price 1s. 6d. and 1s. 11d.
Strand, W.C.

ENGLISH COMMERCIAL

17, R. T. KEMP, Sec., Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 55, Moorgate-street, E.C.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bolu.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 435,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,896 77

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT. after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.

Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.

Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.

New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.

Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 699,523 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 865,420 08

The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1859.

Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.

Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.

New Orleans, March 29, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day, it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Pontx.
C. Homold.
G. Milteneberger.

A. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. E. Voochich.
B. D. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 257,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,142,939 95

The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:

Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.

THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI- CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and
land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, 23 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primage.

PATERN PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of Freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Does not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, any goods, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur
a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship who refuses to take on board any package that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to V. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little
had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a blot to the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havana. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the lenders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "Index" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and

Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY E. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—May 29, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 6.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 5, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	81
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET	82
Liverpool Letter	82
Manchester Letter	82
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
List of killed, wounded, and missing at the Battle of Shiloh	83
Private Letters and Extracts	84
Letter from the Confederate States	85
Letters from Washington	85
" Paris	85
" Havannah	86
LEADERS—
The War	88
Who commenced the War?	88
The South as a Literary Market	89
Federal Treatment of Foreign Consuls	90
REVIEWS OF BOOKS—
A Historical Parallel, No. III.	91
An Embassy to the Court of St. James's in 1840.. .. .	92
CONFEDERATE STATE PAPERS—
Two Messages of President Davis concerning the Diplomatic negotiations with the Washington Government, and enclosing Correspondence of Judge Campbell, of the United States' Supreme Court, with Mr. Seward	93, 94, 95
ADVERTISEMENTS	96

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

IF Europe had one eye and one ear, and the former could be plucked out, and the latter hermetically sealed, what a nice, what a much more pleasant, world it would be for the Yankees. At present, in spite of the most unremitting efforts on the part of the Lincoln Government, it has been found impossible to perfectly deceive us as to the actual state of affairs. Not only are Mr. Stanton's paper victories short-lived, but no amount of manœuvring can conceal the reverses of the Federals.

Last week the Yankees were exulting over the destruction of the Virginia, and we were assured that now the end was coming. The Monitor, the Galena, and the rest of the Federal fleet, hitherto kept by the Virginia under the protection of batteries, were to sally forth and co-operate with the army of the Potomac. The Confederates were to be "smashed up" in so many days, hours, minutes, and seconds. Having been assured that the dreadful Virginia was no more, a fleet of iron-clad boats—the Monitor, Galena, Naugatuck, Port Royal, and Aristook—proceeded towards Richmond, but it was not destined to get a sight of the Confederate capital. At Fort Darling, seven or eight miles below Richmond, the fleet found the river closed to navigation by sunken vessels, piles, and chains. At this point the Federals were roughly used. A heavy battery on Ward's Bluff did tremendous execution. The "impregnable" Galena (even according to Federal accounts) was pierced in sixteen places. The Monitor could not elevate her guns to touch the batteries, and so withdrew from close quarters, but not until she had been hit. The Federal commander says:—

The fire of the enemy was remarkably well directed, but vainly, towards this vessel. She was struck three times—one solid eight-inch shot square on the turret, and two solid shot on the side armour, forward of the pilot-house. Neither caused any damage beyond bending the plates. I am happy to report no casualties.

It is rumoured that not only did the plates bend, but started, and that the Monitor was hurt as well as scratched.

The Naugatuck was disabled at the outset by the bursting of her 100-pounder gun. The Aristook and Port Royal were severely damaged. Meantime, the banks of the river being lined with rifle pits, the loss of life was unusually heavy. The Federals admitted 1100 killed and wounded; but we need not observe that the Federals never confess the full extent of their losses. Such large casualties must have been caused by an attempt to land the troops with which the gunboats were freighted, and which were intended to be thrown on Richmond. After four hours the fleet succeeded in getting away. The Northern telegram described the affair as "a repulse," which, considering the above facts, must, we presume, be a polite equivalent for "a defeat."

Further accounts confirm the view we took of the naval engagement above Fort Pillow. The Confederate gunboats were not injured, while two of the Federal iron-clad boats, the Monro City and the Cincinnati, were sunk.

The Confederates have taken possession of Port Royal, a town near Fredericksburg, in Virginia. We have no details at present, but in the course of a few mails we shall know more about it, and then the "driving out the Federal Colonel Bentley's command" will turn out to be an important victory. The Stanton edition of this news is very ominous.

General Banks officially reports that the Confederates have driven the Federal Colonel Bentley's command from Port Royal, with considerable loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. The Confederates now probably occupy Port Royal.

When, besides a long list of killed and wounded, there is a considerable loss of prisoners admitted, it is virtually a confession of defeat. It is worthy of notice that General Banks is not quite certain whether or not the Confederates had occupied Port Royal, showing that not only were his forces driven out, but that he had to retire to a respectful distance.

We have no news of the movements of General McClellan, except that two divisions of the army had crossed the Chickahominy, and there is a rumour that the Federal advance was about five miles from Richmond.

So far from the war being nearly over, so far from the "rebellion" being crushed, Mr. Lincoln is obliged to call for another levy of volunteers. The new levy will amount to 50,000 men. Those who were foolish enough to swallow the Federal boasts about the subjugation of the South, in consequence of the evacuation of New Orleans and Yorktown, will find this call for more men a rather indigestible morsel. Let the Federals paint this ugly fact as they will, it still remains incontestible evidence that the North has not conquered the South and it is conscious the conquest cannot be effected with present resources. Even the fettered Federal press is allowed to hint the end is not near:—

The New York Journal of Commerce thinks there is no reason to believe that the war will be ended this summer, unless there be a revolution in the Southern States.

A revolution in the Southern States! From what cause is it to arise? The sham of Union feeling can no longer be paraded; for not a vestige of this feeling can be found. All that General Butler can do at New Orleans is to reduce the defenceless inhabitants to a state of "sullen submission." As at New Orleans, so at Norfolk, the mayor and councilmen have refused to take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government. General Wool has been obliged to declare martial law, in consequence of the generally rebellious spirit, and to threaten the people with cutting off their trade, unless they consent to national apostasy. We do not think the declaration of martial law unnecessary. Not a foot of the more than 800,000 square miles of Confederate territory can be held by the Yankees except by brute force.

Is a revolution in the North impossible? Last week we had to report a riot in New York because the soldiers had not been paid, and, consequently, could not remit to their wives; and now we have to chronicle a collision in Washington between the military and civil authorities, on the Fugitive Slave question. Perhaps Mr. Lincoln is about to declare martial law in New York and Washington, and the new levy is needed to enforce its observance.

As was anticipated, Mr. Lincoln has nullified General Hunter's proclamation. European nations wonder that, after such a reproof, the General does not resign, or, if he is mean-spirited enough to pocket the affront, is not recalled.

This General Hunter is engaged in a cowardly and diabolical work. He is said to be organizing a regiment of negroes. The poor creatures are fleeing from his impressment. We can conceive nothing more atrocious than such conduct. If General Hunter and his comrades wish to pillage, but are afraid of Confederate bullets and bayonets, let them, rather than gratify their lust by the carnage of the unoffending negroes, see if they cannot get their women to fight for them. For the honour of human nature, we rejoice to add that the dastardly conduct of General Hunter has so incensed Federal officers that many of them are resigning their commissions.

The Confederates have evacuated Pensacola, after destroying the navy-yard and forts. The public property was removed.

The accounts that have been forwarded to Europe, in reference to the sacrifice of Southern staples, have not only been unexaggerated, but fell short of the truth. So determined are the Confederates that their cotton shall not fall into Federal hands, that they do not wait for the last minute before commencing the work of destruction. We have files of Southern papers to the 3rd of May. Cotton burning has commenced in the interior, and large quantities have been already consumed. A letter from Nashville says: "I am informed that 10,000 bales of cotton have been burned in the counties of Williamstown, Maury, and Rutherford alone. General Pillow's overseer burned 600 bales of cotton before leaving his Maury plantation."

Upon the fate of Richmond depends more than a third of the tobacco crop in the Confederate States.

According to the Memphis Appeal, of May 15, General Butler has outraged the Consulates of France, Spain, and Holland:—

General Butler, yesterday, took forcible possession of the office of the consul of the Netherlands, searched the person of the consul, and took from him the key of a bank vault, in which were $800,000 dollars, transferred by the Citizen's bank to Hope's bank, of Amsterdam, intended for the payment of the interest on the Confederate bonds. General Butler also took possession of the offices of the French and Spanish Consulates, in the old Canal bank, and placed a squad there. He also seized the Canal bank and Smith bank, and has issued an inflammatory proclamation to incite the poor against the rich, promising to distribute to the poor 1000 barrels of beef and sugar captured in New Orleans.

We have discussed this affair in a leader.

Insults to foreigners are the order of the day in the North. In another page will be found a leader, copied from a New York paper, insolently defying the Emperor of the French. The commander of the Tuscarora has written a letter to the New York Herald, declaring that Captain Patty, of the Royal Navy, had not held good faith towards him in the case of the Nashville, and declaring that British justice is measured by false weights, and that neutral obligations have never been allowed to interfere with British interests. He concludes with an assertion, that the British Government has coquetted with the Confederates from the beginning.

For an officer of the Federal service to accuse an officer of a friendly Power of dishonourable dealing, is more objectionable than the general denunciation of British justice. It is a very ungentlemanly presumption upon the forbearance of the British Lion. We refer our readers to the letter of our Havannah correspondent, which gives an account of further outrages on the British and French flags.

The Federal fleet has captured the British steamer Circassian, near Key West. The United States' District Court has ordered the restitution of the British steamer Labnan, the seizure being declared illegal.

Our latest advices from Mexico are to the 12th May, and come to us via New York. Juarez and his Cabinet were reported to have fled from Mexico, but Washington despatches declare the report to be false, and add that the Mexicans are preparing to defend the city. It is also stated that Mr. Corwin has negotiated a treaty for the Federal Government to lend Mexico 10,000,000 dollars. We are not informed whether the loan is to be in paper or specie.

The Mexican Government has ratified the Wyke-Yamouza treaty. Vera Cruz has formally declared in favour of Almonte. The Mexicans had occupied Solidad and Cordova, and were cutting off the French communications with the coast.

From Canada we learn the Government was defeated on the Militia Bill, and a new Cabinet has been formed.

The Duke Constantine has been appointed to the Governorship of Poland. It is supposed this arrangement will have a pacific tendency.

Yesterday was the Derby Day, and the Downs, as usual, were crowded with a motley throng—a little more motley than usual, by reason of the travellers of all nations attracted to London on account of the Exhibition.

A Washington correspondent of the Times observes:—"The Merrimac has returned to Norfolk, and it is said she has a leak. However, that may be a false report, and the dread of the Merrimac is a great impediment to all the operations of General McClellan. This poor General confesses now that the works of the enemy are three times stronger than he suspected. Poor man! Everything was placed at his disposition, and he had not the good sense to procure perfect knowledge of the place he was going to. Even persons who were formerly McClellan's best friends are doubting him now, or at least, his talent. The President once said, 'That fellow is always speaking about his great plans; but I'll be— if I believe he has any at all.' Mr. Stanton, I hear, is of the same opinion. The papers bring long accounts about the things going on before Yorktown, but I assure you they are not worth repeating. I think McClellan has got there in a horrible fix, and will wish in vain 'to be in Dixie.' General Johnson said that he would die of old age before McClellan came to Richmond. Poor fellow! why had he not some experienced men about him to point out to him a much better way? Major Leconte, of the Swiss army, who was on his staff, has been recalled; but it is said that he has had enough of the generalship of Napoleon IV., and is utterly disgusted, though he has written a complimentary letter to the general. I wonder that McClellan does not profit more by the advice of General Porter, who must be a very able commander. Once, at a review held by his patron, this General made his troops fire without calling in the skirmishers, probably thinking them shot-proof from behind. McClellan was very near losing this great general. When he ascended in a balloon to reconnoitre, the rope broke, and poor Porter was floating over the camp of the Secessionists. However, the general profited by another current of air, and descended safe and sound in the camp of the Federals."

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, June 4, 1862.

The past week has been one of great activity in our cotton market, with a considerable advance in prices. Our last report closed upon Middling Orleans at 12½d; on Thursday the market was strong, with sales of 10,000 bales at ½d advance, partly in consequence of stimulating news from India; the price of cotton in Bombay had advanced considerably, owing to a falling off in the supplies, while goods and yarns were in good demand at rising prices. On Friday our market received an additional stimulus from the Nova Scotian's news, through Cape Race, to the 20th ultimo; the repulse of the Federal squadron up the James River was reported, and the general aspect of affairs was favourable to the Confederates. Our market, in consequence, continued buoyant with sales of 10,000 bales at hardening prices. On Saturday an equal amount of business was done at extreme prices, the Australasian news being before us, and containing no new feature of interest. On Monday there was a large attendance of spinners, and the sales reached 12,000 bales—half to the trade—prices still stiffening at the rate of 1-16d. to ¼d. per day. Yesterday the Juras' news was to hand, with dates from New York, via Quebec, to the 24th ult., and, though they comprised few items of striking interest, their tenor was in favour of holders. The cotton market in New York was tending upwards, Middling Uplands 28 to 29½ cents—a good proof that little hope is entertained there of early supplies from the South. Attention was chiefly directed to Lincoln's requisition for a new levy of 50,000 men, from which it was inferred that the Northern forces were rapidly dwindling in effective strength, and were unable to show that superiority to the enemy which was needful to assure them of victory. The general scope of the news was entirely in favour of a prolonged and indecisive contest. Our market, in consequence, kept tightening, with sales of 10,000 bales. In Manchester there was a corresponding improvement, and to-day spinners have attended largely, keeping up the animation in our market; the business is again estimated at 10,000 bales, and the current quotations of to-day are as follows.—Middling Orleans, 12½d. to 13d.; Mobiles, 12½d. and Uplands, 12½d. per lb. Fair Dhollerahs are worth 8½d.; Omrautta, 8½d.; Comptah, 8½d.; Broach, 9½d., and Sawginned Diaruar, 10½d. per lb.

For Surat Cotton "to arrive," a very active demand has existed all the week, and prices have advanced almost daily. The rates now paying are 9d. for early shipments of Broach, and 8½d. for the first shipments of Dhollerah and Omrautta. For cotton sailing in May ½d. less would be taken. These prices, however, can only be obtained for "merchants' cotton." "Native" shipments are difficult to sell, owing to the many cases of bad turns-out that have occurred this year, and can only be placed at about ½d. reduction. It may be remarked that the prices now paying for Surats "to arrive" are just the highest obtained before the recent drop, and at the latest quotations from Bombay they would hardly allow shipments to come out without loss. The attention of speculators has recently been turned very much to East India cotton. It is seen that at the existing rate of outgoing, the stock must be almost exhausted by the autumn. There are to-day, in round numbers in stock and afloat for this port, 300,000 bales, all that is likely to be available for the next twelve weeks; the existing rate of consumption is about 16,000 bales per week, and judging from previous experience the export should reach at least 9000 bales per week, giving a total outgoing of 25,000 bales per week, or 300,000 bales for twelve weeks—but allowing the export to be kept down to the extremely low figure of 5000 bales per week the stock of Surat cotton here by the end of August would only be 30,000 bales, while the total of all sorts could not much exceed 150,000 bales. At the present rate of consumption of American cotton—say 5000 or 6000 bales per week, and without any export demand, our supply of that class is relatively larger than of Surat, being equal to sixteen or eighteen weeks of outgoing against twelve or fourteen weeks in the latter case.

Reports are floating about of later news by the Jura through Cape Race, but nothing authentic is known.

MANCHESTER, June 4.

During the past week following my last report, our market improved considerably in tone, and prices were strengthened by the increased dearthness of cotton consequent on the American intelligence: and both goods and yarns for India were favourably affected on receipt of more encouraging advices from India reporting a fair amount of business doing, both in the Bombay and Calcutta markets, at an advance in price.

Several classes of buyers have shown more disposition than of late to make limited purchases of printing cloths, and of the lighter T cloths, and also of long cloths; but the aggregate business done has been small, the advance asked by holders having prevented operators from extending their purchases. Heavier domestics have scarcely been touched, and 9-8th shirtings have been dull.

Goods adapted for the East have met with a better demand, the India houses having made some purchases of 40-inch shirtings at an advance of 1½d. per piece over the rates of Tuesday last. Prices then wanted, but not obtained by sellers, were paid at the close of the week by merchants, but the small advance thus obtained is most unwillingly submitted to, as buyers, from the present high range of prices, act with great caution, although there is every indication of a greater advance in textile of Africa, yet the greater number of our merchants do not operate with that confidence, which would infer a general belief in the safety of speculating on such a supposition.

The spinners of mules, of water, and of mock water yarns for India meet with a like difficulty in their attempts to get an addition of ¼ or ½ per lb.

The spinners of twist and well for printing cloths and Eastern goods, are not inclined to sell at the prices they would have accepted a week ago. Manufacturers, however, are exceedingly backward in doing anything.

Spinnings for the continent are generally firmer, and to some extent dearer; but merchants having few orders to execute, very little business has been done.

Single yarns of 60's to 80's show a little improvement, and some counts of two folds from 80's downward are rather better.

Our market continues to harden, and to-day the prices of goods and yarns are dearer than on this day week. The telegrams received from Calcutta and Bombay, reporting an active business at higher prices, have induced buyers to make offers for goods which would have been previously accepted, but the firmness of holders in resisting these offers has prevented much business being done. Our exports to the Eastern markets continue to decrease. The shipments to Calcutta for the month of May are, for plain goods, 14,485,266 yards, and for the five months, 105,327,640 yards, showing a decrease of nearly 20 per cent. over 1861, and over 40 per cent. as compared with the same period of 1860. The news per Jura has also strengthened prices, as spinners do not see any possibility of having any supplies of cotton for some time to come.

LONDON, Wednesday evening, June 4.

On Friday last the demand for money appeared to be subsiding. The applications at the Bank of England became decidedly more limited, and, in the Stock Exchange, the supply being abundant, the rate for loans from day to day on Government securities was only 1½ per cent. The funds were almost stationary in prices, with little business, and the dullness extended to all other departments of the Stock Exchange. Any decline in the funds, however, was prevented by the returning ease in the money market. On Saturday, Consols for money opened and closed at 93½ to ¾, and for the account, 92½ ex div., whilst for July they were done at 92½ to ¾.

On Monday, the price throughout the day was 92½ to 92¾, they being quoted from that time without the July dividend.

On Tuesday, the wide circulation of the rumour that the Federal forces had experienced a great defeat, prejudiced the funds and some other securities. Consols fell ½ per cent.

To-day the attendance at the Stock Exchange has been very limited, on account of the DERBY, and the transactions in stocks and shares have been few and unimportant. Consols have recovered, however, from the decline of an eighth which took place yesterday. The last bargains were at 92½ to ¾.

Bank Stock closed at 234 to 236; New Three per Cents, 91½ to ¾; India Stock, 107½ to ¾; Rupee Paper, 103½ to 109½; and Exchequer Bills, March, 9s. to 13s.; June, 8s. to 12s. premium.

The blockade of the other Southern ports does not appear to have become more effective, since the occupation of New Orleans. We notice the arrival of several Confederate steamers at Havannah, Nassau, and Liverpool, bringing direct advices from the Confederacy of as late a date as May 3.

GENERAL BEAUREGARD'S GENERAL ORDER.

"HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
"Coryth, Miss., April 16, 1862.

"Soldiers of the Army of the Mississippi:—

"You have bravely fought the invaders of your soil, for two days, in his own position. You have fought your superior in numbers, in arms, in all the appliances of war. Your success has been signal; his losses have been immense, outnumbering yours in all, save the personal worth of the slain. You drove him from his camp to the shelter of his iron-clad gunboats, which alone saved him from complete disaster. You captured his artillery, more than twenty-five flags and standards, his tents, and over three thousand prisoners. You have done your duty. Your commanding general thanks you; your countrymen are proud of your deeds on the bloody field of Shiloh, confident in the ultimate results of your valor."

"Soldiers! onward events saved the enemy from annihilation. His insolent presence still pollutes your soil; his hostile flag still flaunts before you. There can be no peace so long as these things are. Trusting that God is with us as with our fathers, let us seek to be worthy of His favour, and resolve to be independent or perish in the struggle."

"G. T. BEAUREGARD,
"General Commanding."

A CONTRABAND IN WALL STREET.—Yesterday afternoon a very black individual, belonging to that class of beings commonly designated "contrabands," made his appearance at an office in Wall-street, and told a woeful tale about his troubles. He confessed that he was from Wilmington, N.C., which place he had been induced to leave, and subsequently was induced, by plausible stories, to visit the North, as a paradise of freedom, where work was to be had in abundance, and fabulous sums would be given for labour. He made his way to this city in a Government vessel, or otherwise; but instead of finding plenty and freedom, he was encountered with cool indifference wherever he applied for assistance. He professed to be a cooper by trade, and said that he could find no employment here, and was weary seeking for aid and comfort. The "bosses" told him that they dare not give him work, because all their white hands would instantly leave them in disgust. Coming to the conclusion that Northern freedom and equality were all gammon, he only asked for a little assistance to get back to Wilmington once more, where he expected at least to get enough to eat and drink.

In the cells of Forts Warren and Lafayette, are incarcerated hundreds of American citizens.—They were sent there without any specific charges being made against them. They went at the fiat of Mr. Seward's supreme despotic power. They have appealed to know upon what charges they were imprisoned. They have demanded, and their friends have demanded, that they be allowed the poor privilege of a trial. But their appeals have passed unheeded. They have lain for months in the cells of these Bastilles, and yet, as in the case of Gordon, who was legally convicted, they have not yet, by their "imprisonment and sufferings, atoned sufficiently for their offence, and vindicated the law." Mr. Gordon is an Abolitionist, and was imprisoned for attempting to prevent the enforcement of the Fugitive Slave Law, and it required but a short time for him to suffer atonement for his offence, and a vindication of the law. The men imprisoned in Forts Warren and Lafayette, are Democrats, and were incarcerated for refusing to bow down and worship at the shrine of Abolitionism. In the opinion of the "powers that be," their offence is much greater than that of Mr. Gordon's, and will require a much larger time to suffer out an atonement and vindication of the law. Such is free government under Republican rule.—Ohio Empire, April 19.

THE cheering intelligence from the peninsula, on yesterday, had the effect of a pleasant surprise upon the community. The details of the fight are, as yet, meagre, but the brilliancy of the victory is none the less certain. The first despatches were slightly exaggerated, being, no doubt, the first flying reports from the scene of conflict. A participant in the fight informs us that our loss, in killed and wounded, sums up 220; the Federal loss, in killed and wounded, is unknown; the number captured by our forces is 623. The Federals had appeared 6000 strong, along a skirt of woods a short distance from a small fortification in our possession, below Williamsburg. At an early hour on Monday morning, General Longstreet despatched a howitzer to the right and another to the left of their position, and subjected them to a cross-fire, which did terrible execution, advanced on their front, and put them to route, taking the above number of prisoners, and eleven (not twelve) pieces of artillery. The prisoners were immediately put on the march to Richmond, and were expected to arrive last night.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

LONDON, May 29, 1862.

Much has been said in the New York papers about the Union loving sentiment found in Tennessee on the approach of the Northern, or Federal army; also the prospect of an immediate supply of cotton from these quarters. For the purpose of showing what appears to be the real condition of affairs, I send you copies of letters received in London from a New York house, who, believing the reports, sent an agent to Nashville to purchase cotton. This agent happened to be an Englishman, who was interested in knowing the true state of things that he might communicate the same to his friends this side. If they are of any service to you, you are at liberty to publish them; they may cause our Lancashire friends to think that cotton from America is a long way off.

J. B.

NASHVILLE, April 30, 1862.

The planters will not send in any cotton whilst the city is in possession of the Federal forces, and Mr. —, whose extended business relations gives importance to his information, states that a great deal of cotton has been burned, and that, as a body, they refuse to sell at any prices, if intended to be shipped to the North.

NASHVILLE, May 2, 1862.

As regards the important question of cotton planting, a relation of Mr. —, just in from the adjoining countries, states that, as a general thing, where 150 acres were planted last year, not over thirty to thirty-five are this, the balance being put in wheat and corn; some few have given half to cotton, but not many. The same gentleman travelled about Mississippi, Louisiana, and Alabama, through the month of February, and reports a large portion of lands in those States have been devoted to grain crops, that in other years were entirely cotton; and from all he could gather, he does not believe the aggregate planting of the Cotton States is much more than half the crop.

NASHVILLE, May 3, 1862.

I have this morning had a long and very interesting conversation with a gentleman just arrived from Macon, Georgia, in which section he has been for some months packing up cotton, his purchases standing him in, on the average, only 7½ dollars for middling fair, paid for in Confederate currency. He says a good deal has been sold by the planters at 5 dollars per lb. payable in gold; he also states that they have not planted half a crop in that State, thinks not over a third; that Governor Brown had warned the people that he would order the cattle to be turned on such lands that were not seeded with grain crops, to the extent of one-half; he further remarked that, from observation, he placed the yet ungrown cotton at one-half the crop, consequent on the want of bagging and bale rope on the one hand, and the apprehension of Federal confiscation on the other.

NASHVILLE, May 5, 1862.

A party reported to Mr. —, last week, that he knew of a lot of sixty bales (cotton) about twenty-five miles from this, that the planter was willing to sell at 12 dollars for gold; the order was given to go and buy them, and the purchase was made only to be abandoned, the neighbours, hearing of it, refused to allow the cotton, then partially loaded, to be shipped here, supposing it to be for the North—such is the spirit yet displayed against the renewal of commercial relations with the loyal States.

NASHVILLE, May 6, 1862.

Several buyers are in to-day from scouring the country, unsuccessfully, for cotton, during the past three weeks, they report that Confederate planters will not sell, and Morgan's men apply the torch when known to be in Union hands.

NASHVILLE, May 7, 1862.

Brisk skirmishing between squads of cavalry in adjoining counties, and the burning of what is termed "Union cotton" by the Confederate forces, is bringing buyers back here daily. Adventures at a cost of 18 dollars there and thereabouts, too risky with the growing insecurity.

PHILADELPHIA, May 16.

Through some gentlemen recently returned, and from reliable correspondence, we are in possession of intelligence from the South West, relative to the prospect of receiving cotton, which induces us to believe, beyond all question, that such is the condition of sentiment among the cotton planters, that the expectation of any supply, beyond a few thousand bales, may be abandoned until after the termination of the war. And it appears, that wherever cotton is likely to fall within the lines of occupation of the United States' armies it will be destroyed. The destruction has already reached many millions. Under these circumstances, we fear that the proclamation of the President opening the trade of any of the Southern ports held by the United States' forces, either with or without restriction, will lead to no relief, for it seems that so soon as a Southern port falls into Federal possession, its communications with the interior are closed, and it ceases practically to be considered as an outlet for Southern commerce, and under such a state of things we may look in vain for a restoration of commercial relations until the interior be pacified. As to our prospects in that direction, we have already given our views, which are only more confirmed by the progress of events. We have this morning the important news of the proclamation of General Hunter, the commanding-general, emancipating all the slaves in Georgia, South Carolina, and Florida. This is, probably, preliminary to general emancipation, and we may bid farewell to the further production of cotton in this country. We leave to your contemplation the evils that must follow from this fatal step.

MOBILE, April 18, 1862.

We are much disappointed in not receiving any letter from you, whilst from other correspondents in Liverpool we had letters to Feb. 1, some days ago. By these we see middling Mobile, which had rated at 13½d., had declined to 12½d. We have now our entire crop of cotton ready for European markets, so soon as the blockade is raised; or in the event of our enemies coming too near to it, it will find a market in the flames. This is no bravado, but will assuredly be the result, resolutions having been adopted by the commercial cities to destroy every bale of cotton rather than it should fall into the hands of the enemy, and the quantity planted and to be planted will not produce throughout the Confederacy over one million bales, UNLESS the blockade is speedily removed, when more will be planted. Our enemies think they are in a fair way to subjugate the South, but they will find they are mistaken. Our late reverses have only brought us to look at the matter more determinedly, and to gather up all our energies. You will, I am sure, wonder that our infant Confederacy, without arms, seaports closed, and no other friends but our strong hearts, has accomplished so much, particularly as our enemies threatened to crush us down with 75,000 men, and now find that with 750,000 it is not done, and will not be. We don't look for help from any source but God and ourselves, and we shall not ask for it from anyone; if it comes, it is well; if not, we can fight our own battles. To be sure, if for humanity's sake other nations come in to stop the war, it must be upon the terms of equality already given us as belligerents, with the possession of all our rights as freemen, and respecting all our liberties for which we are now fighting.

Bills of Exchange, 65 per cent. prem.

MOBILE, April 30, 1862.

A steamer leaves here, affording an opportunity to write you a few hasty lines. Our city is very nearly deserted, and very soon all the women and children will be out of it. The Federals have been blazing away at the forts below the city of New Orleans, near the mouth of the river, for some time, and have pretty much used up their ammunition. Several of their large vessels steamed past the fort, and anchored off the city. The military commander evacuated the city. The Federal commander ordered a surrender of the city, and that the Confederate flags then flying be hauled down. The mayor replied he gave up the city, but could find no one to pull the flags down. The transports with troops not being able to get by the forts, the naval force do not feel like venturing ashore, and so the city has been surrendered, but not yet occupied—a curious state of things. Meanwhile, the flags of both nations are flying. We are getting ready for our turn next. These foolish enemies get but barren victories. The people of the South will not trade or have any social intercourse with them; there is no Union element for them. Meanwhile, large forces are concentrating in the interior. The grain crops everywhere thus far are very fine. General Beauregard has just issued an address to the planters and owners of cotton in the Mississippi Valley "to put the torch without delay or hesitation" to the cotton. Little will be planted this year, and only for domestic use. Thus it is very likely, instead of two short crops, there will be two crops short! The war has now begun in earnest. There was a kind of listlessness among our people so long as the idea of foreign intervention was expected. Now that is exploded, and all are going into the fight for their liberties, to win or die!

CLARKSVILLE, May 8.

I have received, by chance, several of your letters, circulars, and half-a-dozen London Times', all of date in October, November, and January; all these at a time, although of old dates, created feelings like to the unexpectedly meeting with a number of old friends, and when I read your expressions of interest about us all, and the desire to visit us again, I at once began to anticipate a pleasure that I hardly expected ever to realize in this world of sorrows and deprivations, and my feelings spontaneously acknowledged that divinity within us which never forgets old friends. I will hope to see you again under my own roof. Alas! how often since the commencement of the terrible and cruel troubles now scourging and devastating our once happy and prosperous and free country, have I looked to your stable and protective Government, though not coming up to my notions of freedom and perfect development, and earnestly wished that, with all those dependent on and dearest to me, we were sheltered under its protecting wing. I have really desired to expatriate myself from my country, once almost my idol, now distracted and maddened beyond recovery, and from my home, hallowed by affections and associations that heretofore bound me to her and it like rivets of steel.

Leaf tobacco of all grades is selling freely, and at high figures, here; say from 5 dollars for inferior lots, to 10, 12, and 15

dollars, in the equivalent of metal, or what is so considered. The production of last year was under an average, as was, I think, also, the quality, being for the most part rather poor, though leafy, and some spot and not a little worm-eaten; nearly all of dark colour. The prospect for production this year, near me, is unusually bad, insects preying on the young plants, and the prospect for planting more backward than I ever knew, owing to want of warm sunny weather; a very few such days as yet this spring. I think much exertion will be made in this quarter, stimulated by the very high prices, provided there are no important influences, from the malignant war waging now with more and more intensity, though at present at a distance from us; the locality may, however, be soon changed. You will also make the allowance for that intenseness of interest which nearly everyone is feeling in this horrible struggle, withdrawing the thoughts from nearly everything besides, except what necessity forces upon us; food and raiment we must have, but men are not greatly concerned for these, so absorbed and so astounded, I may say, are our minds at the terrible contest that is going on. A million of men in the field, bent only on the destruction of each other, and using every means they can devise to devastate and destroy all the materials of comfort, convenience, and necessity. Can your imagination realize so much madness? It would look, I think, to beings of another sphere, as if we were a nation of demons. The idea I want to impress is, that a people so engaged cannot succeed in their usual business as they would under different auspices. There will be no tobacco of consequence stemmed in all this region, nor much, I would think, grown in Missouri. On the Ohio, I hear, a full stemming will be done. In Virginia, the land of patriots, statesmen, and hospitality, but little tobacco can be grown, and none stemmed this year. That State is now the scene of war, and I suppose the most dreadful conflict may now be going on ever recorded. She may be overrun, her cities destroyed or occupied. She will never, never be subdued. We are the more anxious for her as we are cut off from all communication. On the line of Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama, at a point named Corinth, where thousands have been already slain and mutilated, large opposing armies are concentrated, and being daily added to, a terrible conflict is in daily anticipation, and when it takes place blood must flow like water—and what is this awful slaying for? Reconstruction! Reunion!! Establishment of peace, and return of prosperity, freedom, and happiness!!! Preposterous—impossible—hate, hate, eternal, and without mitigation!

Could you expect your brother to love you after you had persecuted him to his ruin? Was ever a million of men, with arms in their hands, brought to a peaceful establishment? It is said that New Orleans has fallen; suppose it true, and Memphis, Mobile, Savannah, Charleston, Richmond, Norfolk, and every other Southern city fall, will the South be subjugated? My opinion is, that the war is not yet at its zenith; but enough, and more than enough, of a drama too dreadful to contemplate. Would to God I could bury every reflection about it in oblivion.

CLARKSVILLE, TENN., May 10.

Loose tobacco is selling at 9 dollars 10 cents, and prized crops at 10 dollars 12 cents, for gold and Kentucky Bank notes. It is hard to form an estimate of the next crop, but it cannot be a large one. From information received here, millions of dollars worth of cotton have been burned all along the Mississippi valley during the past week; the excitement is increasing, and the destruction is spreading far into the interior. I had a large interest in upwards of 1000 bales fine cotton in Mississippi, which is no doubt a burnt-offering to the God of War and Liberty also. I give it up without one sigh of regret.

COLUMBUS, GEORGIA, April 29, 1862.

Matters in this country are not so satisfactory as they might be. You will no doubt have heard before you get this of the fall of New Orleans; still the people are not disheartened, and are only rallying the stronger. The Border States may be subdued, and then comes the tug. There seems to be a calm determination in the Cotton States never to submit to Northern rule. It is useless to speculate on the future or final consequences. Bankruptcy and ruin to all is not improbable, particularly for us of the present generation.

Apalachicola has been abandoned, but not yet occupied by the Federals.

There is hardly any cotton being planted this year—not above one-tenth of a crop. People are coming to the conclusion that the war will be a long and protracted one, and are preparing accordingly. All hopes so long, and by many, entertained of European intervention are abandoned, and we fall back upon our own resources, calmly determined to fight to the last. Any Union feeling that might have existed at the onset has been crushed out, by the coercive policy of Mr. Lincoln and his Government.

I do not pretend to try to form any opinion of the future, but am heartily sick of the war. But we cannot have peace until the rights of the South has been contended for, and their independence is acknowledged.

With all the seaports in the hands of the North, they will have begun their expectations of subjugation. The expense of holding them will eventually wear them out. They cannot force the South to trade with them, and may be like the man with the elephant.

Foreign Correspondence.

MOBILE, April 24, 1862.

The New Orleans mail-line steamer — is preparing for sea, and will depart for Havannah in about ten days. I begin early with a letter, to be continued during June, to put you up in Southern affairs. Three other steamers besides the — are fitting out for Havannah; one of the mail-line steamers for —. This business is risky but popular, and very profitable when it hits. A successful trip out and back pays 300 per cent. I wonder that European capital and enterprise do not embark in it. Our markets are bare of all imported commodities; 10 cent cotton goods and calicoes bring 50 cents; shoe (sole) leather is worth 1 dollar 50 cents the pound; a pair of shoes for me costs 12 dollars; coffee, 80 cents; tea not to be had at 4 dols. 5 cents. We have long since given it up at home. I shall write at random, and dot down what comes uppermost. Mobile not attacked yet; we expected it long ago. While I write, a Federal fleet of bomb vessels and gunboats are hammering away furiously at Fort Jackson, below New Orleans. So far, small impression made. I need not speculate on that as the result will have transpired before this leaves.

"Shiloh," as we call it, and "Pittsburg," as the enemy name it, was the bloodiest and greatest battle of the war. The way the Yankee papers and generals, and even the Secretary of War, have lied about it, is awful. With 38,000 men we attacked them, 50,000 strong, in their camps on the 6th inst. From 6 a.m. to 6 p.m. the battle raged, and during the whole day; without giving back a foot, we drove them out of their camps, nearly three miles, to the river. Their gunboats only saved the army from capture, or being driven into the Tennessee. At night our victory was complete. Our boys slept in their tents, ate (poor hungry fellows) of their luxuries, and helped themselves to their Minié muskets and clothing. At night Buell came up with large reinforcements, and next morning the battle was renewed, fresh troops on their side being put forward to assail our wearied ones. On that day we had not a man over 25,000 in the field, the enemy 70,000; yet, after eight hours of fierce fighting, the battle was a drawn one. Both sides stopped from exhaustion. We came off with 14 pieces of artillery, 25 colours, and 4000 prisoners. The latter I have seen; for my troops were their guard up to Tuscarora and Montgomery. Their loss could not have been less than 17,000 to 20,000, in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Our men fought with desperation, and every officer was a hero. Hardly a mounted officer that did not have his horse shot under him. I send you the Weekly Register after the battle, with full particulars. Mobile had many representatives in the battle, and has suffered greatly. The 21st regiment was a Mobile corps, and nobly distinguished itself. It carried several batteries at the point of the bayonet, and its casualties were more than 25 per cent. of its whole strength. Major Amstead fell early on the first day, and died like a true soldier. General Gladden was shot a few minutes later, and fell in the arms of John Scott, one of his aids. John Walker was there, as Bragg's aid, and escaped unhurt. Colonel Zach. Deas greatly distinguished himself, and is now at his father's, with a wound in the leg. He received half a dozen balls in his clothes and hat, and lost two horses. Dr. Nott's two sons behaved nobly. I suppose Dr. Pratt was in the battle, as he went up just before it.

The Yankees claim a victory. May they have many such. Our army was at Corinth to check his advance into Alabama and Mississippi. It marched out seventeen miles to do it, and although our soldiers were half starved, the road almost impassable, and torrents of rain had fallen, and they were two to one against us, we did check and have checked them. They are gathering in great force again; but no officer or man in the Corinth army doubts that we shall whip them whenever and in whatever number they come. If they come out from the river, we shall kill or capture them before they get back to their gunboats.

We have the same confidence of Johnston's and Magruder's armies in Virginia. A great battle there is imminent, but we are confident of success.

April 29.

Great events and five days of intense excitement since the above. The enemy's boats have passed the forts on the Mississippi, and are before New Orleans. The Confederate army evacuated to keep the city from being shelled. The enemy cannonaded the city, but dare not shell it, and have no troops to take and hold it. The forts still hold out, and troop transports cannot pass. Singular position! The mayor of New Orleans refuses to haul down the Confederate flag, and tells the Yankees to come and do it themselves. See all this in the papers I send. Our army is growing stronger and stronger at Corinth. A great and decisive battle must soon come off there and in Virginia.

I send you the Weekly Registers of the past five weeks; they will post you in Southern affairs generally. The enemy will have their hands full on the Mississippi for a few weeks, and, so far, we expect to be let alone. Of course we get their next visit; the order is to hold Mobile, so that we shall fight here before long. The Mississippi won't help the Yankees much; our people are burning their cotton, and won't trade with the North-West. As long as our two great armies are in the field, we are not whipped; even if they are beaten, we shall take to the woods and carry on a guerilla war. It will cost Abe as much to hold as to conquer. We have not the least idea of giving up, and are sure of independence in the end; we know that we have to suffer many trials, privations, dangers, and death; but the spirit of the people is prepared for it.

May 1, 1862.

The forts at the mouth of the Mississippi have fallen, and the Yankees are in New Orleans. Our turn next. Another battle imminent at Corinth. We have at least 50,000 men there under Beauregard and Bragg.

WASHINGTON, May 17.

We are without any information as to the state of affairs in New Orleans since its occupation by the Federal forces, beyond the proclamation of General Butler, proclaiming martial law in the city. The newspapers are not allowed to publish anything except under the supervision of a censor. Provisions of all kinds were very scarce. I am waiting anxiously to hear of the progress of affairs, but up to our latest date we have not heard of a single individual who has presented himself as a Union man, and welcomed the Federal general to the city. This absence of any Union sentiment has caused great disappointment here, and it has been truly said that if no Union sentiment can be found in the city of New Orleans, which is largely composed of Northerners and foreigners, it is in vain to expect it elsewhere. I send you a paper herewith, containing the proclamation.

There have been no important movements in military affairs within the last few days. McClellan continues the concentration of his forces at a place called Cumberland, which is on the Pamunky River, about thirty miles from Richmond. The main body of the Confederates are reported to be entrenched on the Chickahominy, about twelve miles from that city; and if there is to be a battle it will be fought on the banks of this little stream. McClellan has made very slow progress during the last ten days; his army was badly worsted at Williamsburg; the loss is now officially acknowledged at near 3000, but it is reported in many quarters as still heavier. He may also be awaiting the movements of McDowell, who is still at Fredericksburg, where he has been for the last thirty days. It is still, in my opinion, a matter of great uncertainty whether the Confederates will risk a battle near Richmond. They may conclude to fall back, with their forces untouched and in good order, and take the line of the Roanoke as their defence. A few days will decide the event, as McClellan must move forward, either to the occupation of Richmond, or a defeat. We expect every day to hear of a terrific battle at Corinth. Both sides are increasing in their preparations, and at Halleck's headquarters it is reported that Beauregard has between 120,000 and 165,000 men; but I think this is a clear exaggeration, although I would not be surprised if he had upwards of 100,000. I do not think Halleck has much over 100,000, and to get these together he has been compelled to call in Mitchell, from North Alabama, so that the latter's operations in that quarter have all gone for nothing, except the capture of some prisoners. Fort Pillow appears yet to hold out. We hear of the appearance of the naval forces off Fort Morgan and Mobile Point, and suppose that the bombardment will soon be commenced at that place, and I expect Mobile will soon be occupied by the United States' forces.

But the news at hand this morning from Port Royal, South Carolina, in my opinion, in its importance far transcends anything that we have received since the commencement of the war. I allude to the proclamation of General Hunter, the commanding-general, a copy of which I enclose, in which he proclaims the freedom of all the slaves in the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. This is, perhaps, preliminary to a general system of emancipation under the same power of martial law by which this has been promulgated. We have now to contemplate this event in all its serious evils, its horrors, and its ruin. I shall be mistaken if this does not awaken the most profound attention in Europe, because it must be very evident that the emancipation of slavery destroys all hope of any further production of cotton or tobacco in this country; and, so far as the first article is concerned, is the virtual destruction of all the interests, commercial and political, which are involved in the cotton manufacturing interest of Europe.

I am sick at heart this morning at the contemplation of the ruin that is before us. The North must suffer equally with others; but in the excitement of the moment, "in the madness that rules the hour," reason seems to have departed, and we are at the mercy of a wild fanaticism which knows no bound to its passions.

There is enough in this threatened act of emancipation to cause a train of afflictions which might fill pages; but these are evident to all who stop to reflect, and it were needless for me to refer to them.

Sterling exchanges remains about the same, 113½ to 114, and gold stands at 3 to 3½ premium. United States' Stocks have receded somewhat from the extreme point, which was 107 for 6's, and now stand 104½ to 105. The general feeling is, that we approach the termination of the war, and that the South will soon be subjugated into submission at all points, and it is under this impression that the Government Securities stand so high; and they are further sustained under the belief that large orders will come out from Europe to buy stocks. I do not agree in these views, of course, but give them as the general expression of sentiment.

PARIS, June 3, 1862.

The news of the violence committed by General Butler upon several of the Consulates of the city of New Orleans has so astounded the French press, that not a single comment has as yet been made by them upon this brutal violation of international law. The Patrie alone contains these few lines:—"The Comte Mejan, Consul General at New Orleans, has addressed to M. the Baron Mercier, our Minister to Washington, a report specifying the acts of violence which the French Consulate has suffered at the hands of the Federal General."

This unanimous silence on the part of the French press looks very ominous for the Unionist bullies; for it is but the calm which precedes the tempest. Unlike England, France, when insulted in her national pride and colours, wastes no time in loud and hollow denunciations, but prepares silently the means of striking a deadly blow to its offenders. I am very much mistaken, or the bullying reign of Lincoln and Seward is well nigh over; they will soon find that the Emperor will exact from them something more than the lame apologies so readily offered, and so easily accepted by Lord Protest. Indeed, some experienced diplomatists, with whom I have spoken upon the subject, seem to consider this outrage beyond the reach of all apology; they unhesitatingly declare their opinion to be, that a Consulate in a foreign land is made, by international law, an intrinsic portion of the territory of the nation it represents, and that its seizure can be construed in no other light than the laying of violent hands upon that nation itself. If so, Uncle Sam may soon be plunged in a more critical position than he has bargained for; for Seward will not be permitted by the Emperor to play with the tri-coloured flag as he has done so far with the Union Jack.

The late Secretary of War of the United States has arrived in Paris. He has taken magnificent apartments at the Hotel de Louvre, where he seems to delight in the enjoyment of all the luxuries civilization affords. Thinking himself still in Washington, he holds grand and petit levees, to which the Yankees alone are admitted. Southerners are excluded therefrom by positive orders emanating from his Excellency, not that any Confederate citizen could ever have thought of so far disgracing himself as to seek an interview with the honourable Minister, unless, indeed, it were some of his victims, taking advantage of his transit in this free land to meet him upon equal ground, and avenge the wrongs received from the late Secretary of War. I am told that a gentleman situated in that very position has left Genoa for Paris immediately upon hearing of his arrival here; he comes to test the personal bravery of the new Minister to Russia. I am further assured that he has pledged his solemn oath not to rest until he has obtained an exemplary satisfaction from the Yankee Brutus.

It is exceedingly amusing to see the Yankees gravitate around him; as soon as he appears at a distance off fly their hats, down go their eyes, and humbly do they approach him. They seem not to have been able to realize that, though in Paris, they have got out of his grasp, or out of the reach of his powerful rod; and indeed, well may the poor Yankees, who have so easily abdicated at home all the rights of freemen, feel cowed down when in presence of the man who has, in a public meeting, expressed the following sentiments:—"I would not punish the deluded rank and file after they have laid down their arms. I would not harm one hair on the head of a single individual who was enticed, or seduced upon misrepresentations, to join the rebels; but had I the leaders (they have been all the time at Richmond; why did not the Secretary of War lead the Federal army thither to take them, he could then have satisfied his relish for the rope). I would do with them as I said I would do with the mayor of Baltimore, when he asked the President to send back the national troops from Cockeysville, and not allow them to pass through Baltimore. I said, let me alone and I will hang him and his whole posse upon the trees around the War Department (probably to render the sight of these grounds more pleasant and more picturesque). Had I been allowed to do so, our troops would never have been impeded in their march through that city, and by such a course the rebellion would now have been crushed. Such are my opinions on that question, which, perhaps, I sometimes express unwisely for my own good, and this is another reason for the passage of the resolution to which I have alluded to."

The translation of the most remarkable work which has, so far, been published upon the American question has just made its appearance. I allude, of course, to Mr. James Spence's book. Mr. Spence has depicted the causes of the dissolution of the American Union, with such a profound knowledge of the true character of the American Constitution and laws, that it is difficult to understand how it is that the English Government could, after its perusal, have hesitated to recognize the Confederate States at once. The intelligent translation of this work by M. Begouin has already made it very popular in Paris, and its circulation will no doubt strengthen the position of those who believe in the justice of the Southern cause, and convert many, if not every one, of those who have been the admirers of the North.

With the exception of THE INDEX, the London papers seem to take the Bermuda affair very quietly; and the impression generally prevailing here among the politicians is, that the demand of Mr. Seward upon the British Cabinet to surrender the Emily St. Pierre will be complied with, unless the violence committed upon the French Consulate in New Orleans provokes a war between France and the United States; in which case, it is supposed, John Bull would immediately take advantage of this imbroglio to try the virtue of his much-talked-of Armstrong guns against the United States.

From another Correspondent.

PARIS, June 3, 1862.

The difficulty which arose between the General Lorencez and General Prim, with regard to the Mexican expedition, is said to be in a fair way of being settled, to the entire satisfaction of the Imperial Government. After some diplomatic explanations exchanged between the two Cabinets of France and Spain, it is rumoured that Spain is soon to assume an entirely new situation in the Mexican question. She is to use her diplomatic influence to aid and forward its solution. According to this new arrangement, General Prim is to be recalled to Spain.

Marschal Serrano would be sent to Mexico, with the title of Extraordinary Ambassador.

It is further said that England approves this policy of France and Spain, and will acquiesce in the final decision of the Mexican populations. Since the nomination of M. Ingres to the Senate, the artistic world is in full ebullition. The claims of Horace Vernet, of Eugene Delacroix, and of Auber, the celebrated musician, are brought forward by their respective admirers, with a persistence which, if it were countenanced by the Emperor, might turn the Senate of France into a musical and artistic academy.

Though the Roman question is temporarily settled by a determined statu quo, new dissertations upon the opportunity of evacuating Rome, as also upon the necessity of maintaining the French troops in the Eternal City, are soon to come out. Messrs. St. Marc Girardin, D'Haussouville, and Lamartine, even M. Thiers, are all reported as being busily engaged preparing pamphlets upon either side of this much vexed question. All these geniuses are probably losing much of their precious time upon a question which, in my judgment, is too firmly and deeply rooted in the Catholic hearts to be susceptible of an earthly solution as yet.

While each of the above-named eminent authors, no doubt, entertains the hope of astonishing the world with his particular views upon the fate which he reserves to the Papal Tiara, an important diplomatic negotiation is said to be going on between Austria and France, for the purpose of settling the affairs of Italy. Both of these Governments, if the rumours be true, should have agreed upon the maintenance of the temporal power of the Pope, upon the condition, however, that important modifications should be made in the Pontifical Administration.

It is further alleged that the consent of the Pope to this arrangement would be considered by Austria, France, and Italy as a sufficient guarantee of political tranquility, to authorize these three Powers to bring down their respective armies on the footing of peace.

Though very little au fait of the American affairs, I think I can give you a piece of information which will prove agreeable to your Southern friends. I have seen a letter, this morning received by one of my friends from his agent in New York, stating, unequivocally, that General Banks has experienced a severe defeat in a fight with Jackson; that his army was moving in all haste towards Winchester hotly pursued by the Confederates; that McDowell, who, I believe, commands the Rappahannock army, near or opposite Fredericksburg, had lost a large number of men by diseases of a very pernicious character; that both these generals were at Washington, at the date of the letter, demanding large reinforcements, which the Government was unwilling to grant, on the ground that such a diminution of the Washington army might expose that city to a coup de main on the part of the Confederates. What bearing this news may have on the campaign, I know not; but it seems to me that, if such be the case, Richmond, the seat of the Confederate Government, is not so much threatened as reported by the Northern accounts.

M. the Baronde Bomberg, the new Ambassador of the Czar, and M. the Baron de Bismark, Minister of Prussia, have already begun to pay their visits to the high diplomatic world. The first is said to be the bearer of a diplomatic note of the Emperor of Russia to the Emperor of France, announcing that on account of the violation of the territory of Montenegro by the Turkish armies, his Russian Majesty had issued a circular advising his agents at Constantinople to hold themselves in readiness to leave. This rupture of a very serious nature, for it is said to meet the approval of the French Government. In connection with Russia, it is reported that the Grand Duke Constantine has been appointed by the Emperor, Vice-King of Poland, with instructions to organize for that country a separate and distinct government. It is said that the Emperor would have further declared his intention to grant to this unfortunate Polish nation, a political charter as soon as circumstances would allow it.

The consistories of Rome have not as yet assumed the political character, as it was thought they would. But the Cardinal Antonelli's parlors have been converted into a political club, where the prelates of Catholicism meet to devise all sorts of plans to preserve the Roman institutions.

Said Pacha has received a deputation of the principal stockholders of the Canal of the Isthmus of Suez. The object of their visit to his Egyptian Majesty was to ask the continuance of his patronage. Said Pacha answered, that he had never been so well disposed to favour, by all means in his power, the completion of this important work, but that he was bound to state that the main difficulties originated with the English Government, and that France alone could remove their opposition.

Said Pacha will be in England in a few days; he intends staying there but a short time. The old Chateau de Neuilly has been prepared to receive him on his return from London. It is said he has determined to remain in France until next fall.

The Pereires have just sent out two engineers to Mexico to make some arrangements about the working of the Mexican mines. These engineers are accompanied by a whole corps of experienced miners. This proves, evidently, that the French Government intends to remain there until a strong Government is established and working; for I know the Pereires too well not to be satisfied that they would never have undertaken an operation of this importance without having the positive assurance of the French Government's help and protection.

HAVANNAH, May 5, 1862.

Our people at New Orleans, Charleston, and Mobile, have been very negligent in keeping us supplied with Southern newspapers, and though the communication between Havannah and those cities has been almost interrupted, I have not received regular files. I enclose you now the Nassau Guardian, with list of arrivals at that place from Confederate ports; Havannah Mercantile Weekly Report, with list of arrivals at Havannah; also some late Southern papers, which will give you all the Southern news of which I am possessed.

You will have heard ere this of the great battle of Shiloh. The success of the Confederates on the first day was perfect, and on the second, against reinforcements of fresh troops, fighting against fearful odds, they made a drawn battle, and secured all the cannon (eighty), small arms (17,000), and prisoners from 3000 to 6000, taken in the first day's fight. Our people fought like lions, Breckinridge and Hurley covered themselves with glory, as well as did the invincible Beauregard, and Bragg. The noble A. S. Johnston fell leading a charge, and a whole people, who a few weeks before were asking for his removal from his command, were convinced of their error, and thrown into the deepest sadness at his loss. It is reported here that in an attack by the Federal fleet on Fort Jackson, some fifteen vessels got by, and went up to New Orleans. I doubt the truth of this report. It is also stated that the English steamer Bermuda was captured by the Niagara on the high seas, on mere suspicion of carrying a cargo of munitions of war destined for the Confederates. There have been several outrages committed recently upon neutral flags, in this vicinity, by Federal vessels of war. An English steamer was fired upon and injured, within three-quarters of a mile of the Cuban coast, and a French steamer, laden with sugar, and bound for France, was also fired upon, and so disabled that she had to return to Havannah; these outrages will be brought to the notice of their Governments by the English and French Consuls.

Extract from the Havannah Mercantile Weekly Report.
LIST OF VESSELS
Arrived at Havannah from Ports in the Confederate States since (our last statement) March 15 to date, April 30, 1862.

1862.	Nation.	Tons.	Name.	Where from.	Cargo.
Mar. 24	Conf. sch.	50	Gino	N. Orleans	134 bales cotton
25	Do.	40	Cuba	Mobile	223 " "
26	Do.	103	Independence ..	Do.	219 " "
27	Do.	54	Eagle	N. Orleans	90 " "
29	Brit. sch.	22	Mary	Pensacola	35 " "
Apr. 1	Do.	63	Mary Ellen ..	Do.	33,000 ft. lumber & 50 bales cotton
2	Conf. stm.	234	Nelly	Charleston	352 " "
3	Conf. stm.	603	Austin	N. Orleans	1,147 " "
6	Brit. stm.	249	Elizabeth ..	Do.	412 " "
7	Do.	432	Fox	Do.	624 " "
18	Conf. stm.	767	Win. G. Hewes ..	Do.	1,441 " "
19	Do.	670	Arizona	Do.	1,035 " "
21	Do.	623	Atlantic	Do.	1,086 " "
22	Do.	616	Matagorda ..	Sabina Pass	953 " "
22	Conf. sch.	79	Wide Awake ..	N. Orleans	168 " "
23	Do.	80	Garibaldi ..	Do.	205 " "
23	Brit. stm.	457	Victoria	Do.	552 " "
27	Conf. sch.	68	Cora	Mobile	180 " "
28	Conf. sch.	69	Burrows	Do.	67 " "
28	Conf. sch.	130	L. C. Acton ..	Do.	355 " "
TOTAL					9358

NOTE.—Four vessels arrived at outports in March, with 953 bales of cotton. Total 10,308.

SHIPPING IN THE PORT OF HAVANNAH.

Names & Nations.		Tons.	Masters.	Bound to.	Consignees.
Elizabeth	Brit.	249	Johnson ..	Matamoros	Vignier, Robertson, and Co.
W. G. Hewes	Conf.	767	Smith	Do.	Ditto.
Matagorda	Conf.	616	Cole	Do.	Ditto.
Austin	Conf.	603	Fowler	Matamoros	Ch. Caro & Co.
Arizona	Conf.	676	Forbes	Do.	Ditto.
Atlantic	Conf.	623	Smith	Do.	J. M. Arcandano.
Matagorda	Conf.	616	Parker	waiting	Union & Barroso.
Victoria	Brit.	357	Lumber	Do.	Calhazac Brothers.
Total					8 steamers.

[The list of arrivals from Confederate ports at Nassau, referred to by our correspondent, was published in No. III. of THE INDEX, May 15.]

DETAILS OF THE EVACUATION OF NEW-ORLEANS.

(From the Mobile Register, May 2.)

Yesterday New Orleans was subjected to the most terrible humiliation and degradation which have ever fallen upon a brave and true people. After a valiant defence by our forts below the city—after exhausting all our resources and skill—the greater resources on water of the enemy enabled them to pass our exterior fortifications with their large fleet, and they approached the city with a squadron of fifteen of their largest vessels, all steamships, gunboats, and mortar vessels. There was a large force of land troops in the city; but of what avail were they against the ships and gunboats of the enemy? At the moment it was announced that the ships had passed the forts, it became evident to all reflecting persons that the city was defenceless. Steps were then taken to render it a barren conquest. By order of the Governor and military authorities all the Government munitions and stores were sent away. Such material of war as could not be removed was destroyed. Orders were also issued to destroy all the cotton in this city. This was done. The troops, under the command of General Lovell, were marched to the interior lines of the city—a few miles below, these lines would have been formidable against an army advancing by land; but the batteries near the river were quite weak and ineffective against the ships—especially in the present stage of the river—the high surface of the water enabling them completely to command the surrounding country.

In the condition of affairs, it was quite obvious that the enemy's fleet would meet with no serious obstacle in passing up the river. Accordingly, it was announced at an early hour that they were coming. Their vessels came up slowly, as if feeling their way—the Hartford, the flag-ship of Farragut, leading. Then followed the Brooklyn, the Richmond, and nine other ships, big and little. As these ships approached the batteries, about six or seven miles below the city, our artillerists opened upon them from both sides of the river, but as the guns were only 24's, they produced but little effect. The ships replied with several broadsides, which showed that they completely commanded our batteries. The batteries, though manned by unpractised gunners, kept up the fire for some time, but with no effect, and under such discouraging circumstances as to render it an obvious policy to withdraw the gunners and the troops; the batteries were accordingly abandoned, and the troops were marched to the Jackson railroad. In the meantime, the hostile squadron steamed up the river. A terrible and melancholy spectacle was presented to the victorious ships. The whole levee, for miles, was wrapped in smoke from the burning cotton and gun carriages, which the authorities had ordered to be consumed. In the river were many hulls of burning ships, the debris of our fleet and of the merchant vessels and steamers which contained cotton.

The squadron proceeded up the river, the great multitude clustered on the levee looking on in disgust and horror at the dismal spectacle. As they passed, a few shots were fired by some of our soldiers, but without orders. The ships did not reply, but proceeded slowly along our levee. A feeble cheer was raised on board of one of the ships, which was responded to by something like a cheer from a few persons in the crowd. The cheers, whether intended as such or not, drew upon the parties who were suspected of giving them some dozen or so of pistol shots, by which several persons were wounded. The squadron being advanced, the foremost ship, as far as the Fourth District, came to an anchor—the ships, to the number of thirteen, taking up positions in front of the city so as to command the several streets. After remaining in this position for a half-hour, a boat came ashore with two officers, one Captain Bayleis, second in command of the squadron (Captain Farragut being flag officer), and a lieutenant. These officers were greeted, on touching the shore, with the most uproarious huzzas for "Jeff. Davis and the South," and with the most threatening demonstrations. They had neglected to bring a flag of truce, and it was a proof of the good sense of even an infuriated multitude that they were allowed to land. They, however, proceeded under the protection of some gentlemen, who undertook to conduct them to the Mayor's office, in a drenching rain, followed by a furious and excited mob. Though no violence was offered to the officers, certain persons, who were suspected of favouring their flag and cause, were set upon with great fury and very roughly handled. On arriving at the City Hall, it required the intervention of several citizens to prevent violence being offered to the rash ambassador of an execrated dynasty and Government.

The Mayor received the Federal officers in his office with proper dignity. Captain Bayleis stated the purport of his mission. He had been sent by Captain Farragut to demand the surrender of the city and the elevation of the flag of the United States over the Custom-house, the Post-office, the Mint, and the City Hall. The Mayor replied that he was not the military commander of the city, that he had no authority to surrender it, and would not do so; but that there was a military commander now in the city, and he would send for him, to receive and reply to the demand.

A messenger was despatched to General Lovell. In the interval a number of citizens who were present, got into conversation with the United States' naval officers. The lieutenant seemed to be a courteous, well-behaved gentleman, who bore testimony, with apparent earnestness, to the vigour and valour of the defence of our forts, and was quite communicative. The senior officer was more reserved, but still more large in professions of peaceful intentions. It was difficult, however, for him to conceal the bitter sectional hate of a Massachusetts man against a true Southern community.—In the course of the conversation, however, this officer remarked that Captain Farragut deeply regretted to see the spirit of incendiarism which prevailed in the city, in the destruction of cotton and other things. The Mayor remarked that he differed with him; that the destruction was of our own property, and did not concern outsiders. Captain Bayleis replied that it looked like hitting off one's nose to spite his face. The Mayor replied that we had judged differently.

After awhile, General Lovell arrived in front of the City Hall, and was greeted with loud cheers by the crowd outside. On entering the Mayor's office, Captain Bayleis introduced himself as second in command of the United States' Squadron in front of the city. General Lovell replied, "I am General Lovell, of the army of the Confederate States, commanding this department." The officers then shook hands, and Captain Bayleis stated his mission to demand the surrender of the city, and the elevation of the United States' flag over the Custom House, Mint, and Post Office—adding that he was instructed by Captain Farragut to state that he came to protect private property and personal rights, and especially not to interfere with the negro property.

General Lovell replied that he would not surrender the city, nor allow it to be surrendered; that he was overpowered on the water by their superior squadron, but that he intended to fight them on land as long as he could muster a soldier; that he had marched all his armed men out of the city; that he had evacuated it; and if they desired to shell the town, destroying women and children, they could do so. That it was to avoid this he had marched his troops beyond the city limits, but that a large number even of the women of the city had begged him to remain and defend the city even against shelling. He did not think he would be justified in doing so. He would, therefore, retire and leave the city authorities to pursue what course they should think proper. Captain Bayleis said that no such purpose was entertained by Captain Farragut, reiterating the expression of his regret at the destruction of cotton. General Lovell interrupted him by saying that it was done by his authority. Captain Bayleis said that he had no doubt that General Lovell had done his duty, and they were doing theirs. It was then concluded that Captain Bayleis and the other officers would return to their ships, and the Mayor would call the Council, and lay before it the demand of Captain Farragut. The officers requested to be protected in their return to their ships, and General Lovell directed Colonel Lovell and Major James to accompany them. The officers accordingly proceeded to the front of the City Hall, where they took a cab and proceeded to the wharf. During the interview an immense and excited crowd of people had congregated about the City Hall, who alternately hurled for Jefferson Davis, for General Lovell, and most vigorously groaned for "Lincoln and his squadron."

To calm this multitude Pierre Soule addressed them in a few eloquent and effective words, counselling moderation, self-possession, fortitude and confidence in their cause, declaring that the honour of the Government and city was in safe hands, and that General Lovell's answer to the demand to surrender was worthy of the commander of a brave people.

General Lovell, on appearing on the steps, was also loudly cheered. He addressed the multitude in a short speech, declaring his purpose not to surrender the city, but to retire with his army and fight the Lincolnites, whom they could always whip on land. He briefly sketched his course in the preparation of the defence of the city. Had done all he could do with the means at his disposal. That he came here six months too late, and it was beyond his resources to contend successfully against the enemy's power on water.

He advised the citizens to bear themselves manfully, never to stoop or submit to the Lincoln domination, and to wait with patient fortitude for the deliverance from bondage which must soon come to them. The General then mounted his horse, and, accompanied by his staff, rode to the Jackson Railroad, where he took the last car, having already sent his army ahead of him.

THE MILITARY PLANS OF THE SOUTH.

We quote the following from the Glasgow Herald, written to an individual in that city by his relative in Baltimore:—

Baltimore, May 15, 1862.

The policy of the Confederate Government has now been defined, and I think I can see through some of the movements.

My idea is that they will give up all places that can be attacked by the gunboats, and fall back and concentrate their armies in the interior. Richmond, however, will be defended, and I feel confident of the result, providing the gunboats do not work their way up James River. We are assured by our Southern friends that the river is safe.

Joe Johnston, Robert Lee, and Magruder are now posted on the Chickahominy River, with an immense force, and there will be fighting at that point; and you can rest assured of the success of the Confederates in case McClellan ventures to attack them, of which there seems to be grave doubts at this time. Johnston defeated the Federals at Williamsburg, and, as an officer told me at Burnum's a few nights ago, it was a victory of the Shiloh character for the Federals. They lost in that battle over 6000 men. This report you can rely on. I do not write from rumours. The Confederates were on their retreat from Yorktown when their rearward was overtaken by the Federals, who, pressing hard upon them, compelled them to make a stand and fight, which they did most nobly, and defeated them. The Northerners retreated from the field, and the Southerners took up their line of march, taking with them 623 prisoners and eleven pieces of artillery.

The battle of West Point was another glorious victory for the arms of the South. Lee defeated the invaders, killing and wounding over 6000 men, and drove them under the protection of their gunboats. Since McClellan took his position before Yorktown he has lost over 30,000 men. The Federals themselves even estimate a higher figure.

McClellan is hard pressed before Fredericksburg. He reports an army in front of him of 60,000, and says he does not think it prudent to risk a battle. This you can rely on.

Banks, Milroy, and Fremont have been compelled to retreat before Jackson and General George Johnson. Banks was reported at Strasburg a few days ago. Yesterday 3000 of his men entered Winchester, having lost everything in the retreat. The Southerners here to-day say they have saved nothing, and the roads for eighty miles are blocked up with wagons and army stores, and Ashby advancing and destroying what he cannot carry off. I am giving you plain facts, and what I know to be so. I will enclose you an article from the New York World, which will convince you what is the condition of the Federal army in Western Virginia.

Beauregard is yet at Corinth, where he will fight.

THE NEW YORK HERALD ON THE MEXICAN INTERVENTION.

The New York Herald of May 21, has the following leader; it is a fair specimen of the insulting tone adopted by Northerners in reference to Europe.

EUROPEAN INTERVENTION IN MEXICO—NAPOLEON IN A TIGHT PLACE.

The want of sympathy manifested by the principal European Powers for the American Republic since the commencement of its internal troubles, and even the indirect aid afforded to the rebellion, have rendered the American people particularly sensitive about the armed intervention of those Powers in Mexico, in the face of the well-known traditional policy of the United States. Little has been said about the matter, because we are engaged in the crushing of an insurrection which absorbs all our attention; but we do not feel it the less.

The European Powers have taken advantage of this; for if we were at peace they would not venture to set a hostile foot upon Mexican soil, nor would any of their agents dare to broach the idea of setting up a monarchy on this continent. But the tremendous extent of our land and naval forces, our immense preparations by land and by sea, and the splendid successes achieved by our arms, have alarmed two of these Powers—Spain and England; for they know that half the splendid fleet that captured New Orleans, commanded by Farragut, could take Havana in one day, and give Cuba to our arms; that all the West Indies could be as easily annexed by the same mighty agency, and Canada would fall like a ripe pear at the first gentle shake of the tree. By that instinct of self-preservation, which is the first law of nations, as it is of individuals, England and Spain have drawn their horns within their shells, and left France alone in her glory and her peril.

Louis Napoleon evidently does not understand the temper of the American people, perceive the approaching dissolution of the rebellion, or feel sensible of the dangerous position in which he has placed himself. In six weeks the insurrection will have been put down, and if by that time Mexico should then call upon our Government for aid to repel the high-handed outrage committed upon her independence, we could not refuse her the desired assistance without renouncing all our American ideas. What would be the result? With a portion of the squadron which reduced New Orleans we could capture the French fleet at Vera Cruz, and shut in the French army, which would never return to France. The expedition would speedily become the victim of a second Moscow.

This may prove Napoleon's downfall, as the invasion of Russia resulted in the overthrow of his uncle. It is not that he has much to lose in the way of territory in the New World; but the loss of his army and fleet, and the loss of his prestige, would be more than the loss of territory. If it suits him to play fast and loose with principles, that is not the part which the American Republic can play. It must be true to itself, true to its history and traditions, and true to the spirit of the age. Napoleon plays Pope one day and revolution next, two ideas in antagonism with each other. He went as far as he could in Italy without overthrowing the temporal sovereignty of the Pope. In order to atone for that offence, he seizes an insane interval in our history, and sends a fleet and an army to Mexico in order to restore the domination of the church in that country, and to overthrow popular institutions. But we are fast returning to our senses, and if he does not make haste to remove his ships and troops they will never return. And we hereby give notice to the said Emperor of the French, to her Britannic Majesty, and to her most Catholic Majesty Queen of Spain, and to all other European Powers whom it may concern, to quit the soil and ports of the republic of Mexico on or before the fourth day of July next; otherwise it will then become the bounden duty of the people and government of the United States to employ their magnificent army and navy to clear the American continent of every vestige of foreign sway.

ENGLAND AND THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

Str.—It is generally believed by the inhabitants of the Confederate States, that England is their lukewarm friend, if not their secret enemy. In their opinion, she ought long ago to have acknowledged their independence, and thereby have committed herself to the advocacy and support of their cause. By remaining neutral she has disappointed their expectations, and forfeited their goodwill. Curiously enough, the complaints made by the Confederates are re-echoed by the Federals. The latter upbraid England because of her Southern sympathies, and affirm that she has so shaped her policy since the beginning of the war as to afford to the South direct countenance and indirect aid. We are told, in no polished or measured language, that our neutrality is a farce, a shield under which we conveniently carry on intrigues for the overthrow of the North. These contradictory charges neutralize each other. It must be owned, however, that the complaints of the Confederates are better founded, and deserve more serious attention, than those preferred by their opponents.

Now, it is indisputable that vast numbers of Englishmen are wholly indifferent towards the South, and a small number fervently desire that she may be subdued. The former class is wholly ignorant of the real question at issue between the North and South, and of the character of the Southern people. These men belong, for the most part, to the middle-class. They have travelled a good deal on the Continent, and come in contact with numbers of Americans in the course of their wanderings. They have found these Americans to be conceited, insolent, and uneducated; little impressed with beautiful scenery, rare paintings, superb architecture; confident that a Broadway "store" is a handsomer structure than any European cathedral, and that nothing in Europe can match the Falls of Niagara; and apparently actuated by no other motive than to see the greatest number of sights in the shortest possible space of time, and at the smallest possible expenditure of dollars. American travellers who talk and act thus are chiefly Northerners, and, it is to be hoped, are very inferior samples of their countrymen. On the other hand, the Southerners who visit Europe do not rush about from place to place, as if prickled with evil consciences, or so pressed for time as to be unable to enjoy what they witness. Not only do they travel about in a leisurely and sensible manner, but, being men of wealth and culture, they obtain entrance into circles to which the underbred Northerners can never hope to be admitted. Consequently, there are few Englishmen who ever meet with, and fewer still who make the acquaintance of, Southern gentlemen. It were as fair to decide on the character of the French and German nations from the specimens to be seen in Leicester-square, as to judge the Southern people from the Northerners who excite our disgust and contempt when we have the misfortune to be their fellow-travellers on a Rhine steamer, or fellow-occupants of a Swiss hotel. Prejudices are easily formed, but hard to root out; and it may be long before those of our countrymen who entertain erroneous impressions of the Southern people will be brought to see and retrieve their mistakes. A change is gradually taking place. Hundreds, who a year ago would not have grieved had the South been conquered, now ardently desire that she may triumph. The earnestness and consistency with which she has asserted her rights, the unanimity with which she has defended them, the capacity of her leaders, the skill of her generals, the valour and devotion manifested by her people, have already done much towards making our countrymen modify opinions once entertained by them concerning her, and which they will soon see reason for discarding altogether as unfounded and unjust.

It were folly to expect that the English partisans of the North will ever change their views. The majority of them are fanatics, and fanatics neither listen to reason nor profit by experience. The party in this country which worships the "Union," though very small, is very noisy; hence, it appears greater and more important than it really is. Nearly every member of it is either a member of the Manchester school, or of the Peace Society. It owns several newspapers, which worthily emulate the vilest of the New York journals in calumniating the Confederates and hounding on their foes. In these newspapers the Federals are constantly admonished to strain every nerve in fighting for the preservation of that abstraction called the "Union," and the Northern soldiers are urged to inflict on the Confederates a merciless and memorable vengeance. This pro-Northern party is, unhappily, not without some influence in the country. The Government cannot run counter to it with impunity. To its open and secret influence must be ascribed the hesitation which has been shown in recognizing the independence of the Confederate States, and any bad feeling which may now or hereafter be entertained towards England by the Confederates will have been engendered by the machinations of that party. But England cannot submit much longer to the dictation of a handful of narrow-minded and unpatriotic men. If there be one thing which rejoices them more than another, it is the ascendancy of those who glory in dishonouring her. Whether it be Russia, Germany, or the Federal States, that insult her, these men applaud the deed and commend the perpetrator. The best proof we can possibly have that the recognition of the Confederate States will be for the advantage of England is that Mr. Bright and his friends are opposed to it. As soon as the country perceives this, it will loudly call on the Government to welcome the Confederate States into the family of nations. Before many weeks elapse that, I think, must be done. Until then we shall lie open to the reproach of having failed in performing a simple act of justice, as well as of having foolishly omitted to take a step which may hereafter redound to our national advantage.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JUNE 5, 1862.

The War.

THE news of the week is important and significant; the rumours of the street and "on 'change" are even more so. For the first time since the beginning of the war have these rumours been adverse to the success of the stronger side in the contest. It is currently reported and believed that private despatches have been received by prominent business firms—some go so far as to say by the Government—that Halleck's army has sustained a severe reverse near Corinth, and that the defeat of Banks' division was more general and disastrous than appears from the published intelligence. We have never been disposed to attach undue importance to mere rumours, although those we referred to seemed to have attained so tangible a form as to have somewhat affected the quotations of consols; but in this instance they do certainly indicate that the public mind of this country is becoming conscious of the extremely critical condition into which the Federal armies have been lured by exaggerated successes. It is now understood that the invaders have staked their fortunes upon two throws of the dice, the loss of either of which is irreparable, while the gain of neither can be decisive. The larger portion of the Federal forces is frittered away in the occupation of distant points, which must be abandoned if the main armies in the West and East are defeated; or in enforcing a partial quiescence upon States which impatiently await the expected opportunity to rise against the oppressor. A little food for self-glorification and indecorous boasting is all that has so far compensated them for the enormous outlay incurred in the capture of two seaports, and half-a-dozen places of comparatively trifling importance. Not one of the substantial advantages, either commercial or political, to be derived from these achievements has yet been obtained, or appears likely to be obtained. The whole burden of the war, then, rests upon the armies of Halleck and McClellan.

As for Halleck's army, if it is not already defeated, it is certainly doomed. No army ever marched to victory with such evil forebodings, such a distrust in its own powers and fortunes, so settled a conviction of its own defeat. The day of thanksgiving, ordered with such wanton profanity by the Washington authorities, cannot conceal even from the deluded masses of the North that their so-called victory at Shiloh had this strange effect of hopelessly, crippling their strength, and paralyzing all their forward movements. New York awaits with fear and trembling the news from the West; the Federal War Department has thought it necessary to take extraordinary precautions that no news whatever should come. The Confederates, we feel convinced, are no longer in danger in that quarter.

McClellan's army appears to be scarcely more fortunate than Halleck's. The course of events in the East has already attested the wisdom of the policy which dictated the evacuation of Yorktown. Severely beaten at Williamsburg, as is now obvious from the later accounts of the battle, his "invincible" gunboats repulsed with heavy loss, his Lieutenant, Banks, driven back into the inhospitable mountains of Western Virginia, the Young Napoleon of the North has been foiled in every detail of his vaunted combinations. Not in London alone, but in New York also, the belief gains ground that Richmond is quite as safe at Washington. If the Federals cannot capture this important city within a few miles, as it were, of their own capital, what are we to think of their pretensions to conquer a territory equal to twenty European kingdoms? But if it should hereafter be found that the hastily-constructed fortifications cannot always repulse the iron-clad fleets which the North will endeavour to concentrate against them, and if Richmond, in consequence, should be abandoned, which is now considered highly improbable, the Confederates will nevertheless have obtained what is all-important to them—Time. For the season of effective campaigning is now rapidly drawing to a close. McClellan would be out-generalled, as he was at Manassas and Yorktown, and Richmond would prove no more valuable a possession than Nashville, or Norfolk, or New Orleans, have proved. A writer in the Times of yesterday, in whose lucid style and thorough knowledge of his subject we recognize the author of the "American Union," shows, by unanswerable arguments, that in no event could the Confederate army be cut off from retreat to Lynchburg, and that this city, in every military point of view, forms a better key of a defensive position than does Richmond.

Regarded in whatever light, it is undeniable that the news of the past week has been consistently adverse to the North. President Lincoln himself makes the most direct confession of the fact in calling for an additional levy of 50,000 men. Halleck and McClellan both clamour loudly for reinforcements. What has become of those countless hordes which were to sweep over the South like an avalanche, crushing it by the mere force of numbers?

Who Commenced the War?

"THE Confederates, of course, by the attack on Fort Sumter," will be the reply by ninety-nine Englishmen out of every hundred, to this query. Of the many errors in regard to American affairs persisted in in defiance of all evidence and logic, none is so prevalent or so deeply rooted in the public mind as this, and yet none is in more violent contradiction to the voice of truthful history. We should despair of obtaining a hearing for that voice on a point considered by so many to be settled beyond dispute, had we not to offer in evidence facts which are new to the majority of the English public, and documents which, to our knowledge, have never before been published in England. We refer to two Messages, with accompanying papers, of President Davis to the Confederate Provisional Congress, then in secret session at Montgomery, written when the Confederate States were as yet only preparing for a war they had exhausted every honourable means to avoid. No candid thinker can justly lay claim to an unbiassed judgment who has not listened to the evidence these documents contain. A brief synopsis of facts and dates, which may assist attentive perusal, completes our task of introducing them to the reader.

On November 6th, 1860, the day of the last general election for a President of the United States, the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, according to its wont since the construction of the Union, convened in special session, to appoint electors to cast the vote of the State, and instructed them to cast that vote for John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky. On the night of the same day the telegraph made known the result of the election in almost every State of the Union, although the mere formality of casting the vote by the electoral colleges of the several States would not take place until more than a month later. In view of the solid phalanx into which the North had arrayed itself in this selection against the South, despite the most earnest expostulations of the latter, and the most unmistakable warnings; every Northern State, except one, whose vote was divided, having heaped up immense majorities for the candidate whose election had, by common accord, been accepted as the symbol of open defiance against the South—the Legislature of South Carolina resolved to consult the will of the people as to the steps to be taken in this solemn emergency, and passed an Act for a Convention of the people to be held in the city of Charleston. It must here be remarked, that Conventions of the people are the recognized and lawful form in which, according to American theories of Government, each individual State, and even the whole of the States associated together, deal with such extraordinary political questions as cannot, from their nature, come within the competence of the constituted authorities of the several States, or of the association of States. These Conventions are assumed to embody, and to be alone competent to express and exercise that supreme sovereignty which is held to reside in the people, and from which all lawful authority is held to be derived. Thus it is by a Convention of the people that each State, without exception, has always framed the Constitution by which it entered the Union. It is by such Conventions that each State has always exercised its right of amending or altering that Constitution. Few States, either North or South, have not exercised that right more than once as members of the Union. It was by a National Convention, that is to say, by delegates from the Conventions of the several States, that the Union itself was instituted, and the Federal Constitution framed; and a similar body is expressly designated in that instrument as the proper authority for such alterations or modifications as the exigencies of future generations might require. Conventions, therefore, though the expedient only of great emergencies, are neither infractions of law, nor innovations upon usage. It has never been asserted that the elections to the Convention of South Carolina were not fairly conducted, or that the members themselves did not fully represent the will of the people. In the election district of the city of Charleston alone, there were as many as twenty-seven different combinations of names proposed to the voters, and the result at the ballot-box was a selection from each. In the second week of December this Convention met, and, after brief consultation, on the twentieth day of that month, passed by the unanimous vote of all its members the following ordinance:—

AN ORDINANCE,

TO DISSOLVE THE UNION BETWEEN THE STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA AND OTHER STATES UNITED WITH HER, UNDER THE COMPACT ENTITLED THE "CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA."

We, the people of the State of South Carolina, in Convention assembled, do declare and ordain, and it is hereby declared and ordained, that the ordinances adopted by us in Convention on the 23rd day of May, in the year of our Lord, 1788, whereby the Constitution of the United States of America was ratified, and also all Acts and parts of Acts of the General Assembly of this State, ratifying the amendments of the said Constitution, are hereby repealed: and that the union now subsisting between South Carolina and other States, under the name of the United States of America, is hereby dissolved.

This event produced a very different effect in different parts of the Union. At the North it was treated with levity, as a mere empty threat on the part of the seceded State, which, it was argued, would soon be forced back by the unbearable burdens of a separate national existence. No one, however, spoke or thought of coercion by arms, and even her right to withdraw from the Union was not generally questioned. The organs of the ultra-abolition party spoke of it, and of the threatened secession of all the other Southern States, as a happy riddance. In the so-called Border States the gravity of the crisis was appreciated; but these States being then sincerely attached to the Union, did not despair of being able to restore it. A so-called "Border States' Peace Convention" was convoked by them for this purpose, to which the Legislatures of these States sent delegates, and by which a variety of compromises were suggested without any practical result whatever. In the so-called Cotton States the secession of South Carolina was the signal for an active canvass, conducted with consummate skill on both sides, between the advocates of immediate secession, and the party of temporizers calling themselves "Co-operationists."

An avowed Union party, even at that time, there was not in those States; what few lovers of the Union, for its own sake, there might have been took shelter under the wings of the Co-operation party. The two parties in the field, whose champions met each other in debate on every stump in city and country, were nearly evenly balanced in strength. Both agreed as to the right of secession, but differed as to the expediency, or rather, the manner of its exercise; the one insisting upon immediate withdrawal from the Union, and the formation of national governments for each individual State, the other counselling delay, consultation with other Southern States, preparation before the final step should be taken, and concerted action on the part of all. Both, however, agreed to submit to the decision of the ballot-box. That decision in every Cotton State was against delay, and against the dangerous expedient of waiting for each other. In January, the Conventions met in Alabama, Mississippi, Georgia, Arkansas, Florida, and Texas, and by the end of the month these six States had followed the example of South Carolina. From that moment all party differences were at an end. Concessions had been made by each side; what there was wise in the councils of the Co-operationists was adopted in practice; violent or peculiarly obnoxious men were sacrificed to the general harmony; and the seceded States presented the unprecedented spectacle of a political love-feast, in which life-long opponents vied with each other in apologies for the past, and friendly assurances for the future. On February 5, delegates from all the seceded States met at Montgomery, to concert the terms of a temporary alliance, and propose the basis of a permanent Confederation. In this assemblage each former political organization was represented according to its attested numerical strength. A week after its meeting, a Provisional Government was unanimously instituted, and with equal unanimity a Provisional President and Vice-President appointed, the former representing the more prudent wing of the "immediate Secessionists" the latter, the late "Co-operation party."

The Southern Confederacy was now formed, its Government in actual operation; still no sound of war was heard. The President of the United States, in a formal Message to his Congress, declared himself alike powerless under the Constitution to sanction the disruption of the Union, and to preserve it by force. Meanwhile, South Carolina had exhausted the resources of diplomacy at Washington to obtain a peaceful settlement of accounts with the Union. Three of her most distinguished citizens, Messrs. Barnwell, Adams, and Orr, were invested with full powers to treat in the name of the State. On their failing, they were succeeded by Mr. Hayne, the Attorney-General of the State, whose efforts were equally unsuccessful. The President received and corresponded with both delegations, though declining to recognize their official character, and pleaded his constitutional incompetency to treat with so difficult a subject, but expressed his peaceful intentions in the strongest terms, and even sent Mr. Treseott, the Assistant-Secretary of State, to Charleston, to give greater emphasis to his assurances. As early as December 26th, Major Anderson, the Federal commander of the forts in Charleston harbour, had removed his command, after partially demolishing one of the forts, to a position of greater strategic strength; an act which President Buchanan expressly admitted to have been a violation of his pledge to preserve the military status quo at Charleston unimpaired; but refused to annul; by this refusal causing a change of almost his entire Cabinet. Still no overt act of hostility had been committed on either side. Major Anderson continued to receive his supplies from the market, and from the private hospitality of Charleston.

It is at this time that the narrative is taken up by the official documents we publish elsewhere. It will be seen that one of the first acts of the Confederate Government was, to open with the incoming Administration of Mr. Lincoln those negotiations in which South Carolina had so signally failed with the Administration of Mr. Buchanan. In the very selection of its Commissioners it proved its earnest desire for a peaceful settlement. Of the three, each represented one of the old parties which, in by-gone times, had contended for predominance in the common Government.

We have President Davis' official announcement to the Confederate Congress, that their instructions were to make every honourable concession for the sake of peace. Now let the reader peruse for himself how these Commissioners, and through them, the Confederate Government, were lulled into a false security by assurances as false as Judas' kiss; how a justice of the Supreme Court—the most honoured office in the United States—was made the unconscious instrument of perpetrating this fraud; how a solemn promise was made, and kept like that of the witches of Macbeth; how a hostile fleet was secretly equipped, and its purpose only revealed several days after it had sailed, and when, in the ordinary course of navigation, it might be expected to reach the doomed city, warned too late; how it was the finger of God, by a tempest, that alone defeated the bloody scheme so nefariously concerted. We are strangely mistaken if any man to whom public faith is more than an empty word, and who believes nations, like individuals, to be amenable to the laws of honour, can read this history without repeating, with the Confederate President:—"The crooked path of diplomacy can scarcely furnish an example so wanting in courtesy, in candour, and in directness, as was the course of the United States' Government toward our Commissioners in Washington."

Is it difficult, after this, to understand that what love for the Union, what doubts of the justice or necessity of withdrawal from it, might still have remained latent in the South, should be extinguished for ever? The South was unprepared for war, the weaker in number, without an arsenal worthy the name; without a powder mill in her whole territory; with scarcely a fort in a state of defence. The duplicity of Mr. Lincoln's Government caused her to neglect precious opportunities, and, but for the heroic determination of her people, might have proved fatal to her independence. The Southerners can justly proclaim, before God and man, in the words of their leader, when he took his oath of office, now fifteen months ago:—

Sustained by the consciousness that the transition from the former Union to the present Confederacy has not proceeded from a disregard on our part of our just obligations, or any failure to perform every constitutional duty; moved by no interest or passion to invade the rights of others, anxious to cultivate peace and commerce with all nations; if we may not hope to avoid war, we may at least expect that posterity will acquit us of having needlessly engaged in it.

The South as a Literary Market.

THE interest which commerce, in all its many forms, has in the destinies of the Confederate States, is a subject on which political economists and statisticians have lavished their logic and their figures. We know, or, at least, we ought to know, to within a pound or two, the dowry of the rich bride which only awaits our wooing. We can cipher it up by an easy process of arithmetic, that the independence of the South, opening to unrestricted free trade a market of fabulous capacity for production and consumption, and a coasting navigation of thousands of miles to the shipping of all the world, would be equal to the discovery of another India, and that an India discovered for our special benefit and enjoyment, without the drawback of its costing us large standing armies, and an equally expensive machinery of Government. The interests, we repeat, of commerce and capital in the destinies of the South, are, if not generally understood, at least sufficiently explained to give no one an excuse for not understanding them. But the interests of literature, scarcely less in magnitude, no one has ever taken the pains to consider.

One of the first acts of the Southern Congress, at Montgomery, was the passage, without opposition, of the following resolution, which is now one of the laws of the land:—

A RESOLUTION

IN RELATION TO INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHTS.

Whereas, Great Britain, France, Prussia, Saxony, and other European Powers, have passed laws to secure to authors of their

States the benefits and privileges of their copyright laws, upon condition of similar privileges being granted by the laws of such States to authors the subjects of the Powers aforesaid, therefore be it

Resolved by the Congress of the Confederate States of America, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to instruct the Commissioners appointed by him to visit the European Powers, to enter into treaty obligations for the extension of international copyright privileges to all authors the citizens and subjects of the Powers aforesaid.

Approved March 7, 1861.

The importance of this law needs no elaboration with those who know, from sad practical experience, to what heavy losses British authors and publishers have been subject by the wholesale and systematized piracy practised under sanction of law in the United States. Here is a public as numerous as that which the author addresses at home, to whom he gives his brains without substantial reward, and too often, even, without reward of fame, and of which the publisher must be content to see his rightful gains pass into other hands. An English book of any merit is certain to be reprinted in America, costing nothing but its weight in paper, and the mechanical labour of printing it, requiring no judgment or risk on the part of the so-called publisher, and, therefore, sold at one-fifth of its English price. A few examples will suffice for illustration. Baron Macaulay's "History of England," on moderately good paper, in four volumes, bound in sheep, is retailed in the United States for four dollars, or a trifle over sixteen shillings. It is notorious that its American sale, in this cheap form, has been almost double its sale in England and her dependencies. "The British Poets," an exact counterpart of the London edition, in type, paper, and binding, retail, for 2s. 6d. a volume. Four of the leading British Reviews, and one Monthly, are furnished to the American subscribers at £2 per annum by a firm whose sole business consists in such republications. But this is by no means the worst feature of this wholesale robbery. It is only where the author's name is an additional source of profit, that he is not robbed of that also. Works of reference, such as dictionaries and other laborious compilations usually receive a few American improvements, and in that form are the easy spoil of whoever chooses to put his name on the title-page. We have now in mind a useful little volume, Walford's "Men of the Time," which, enriched by the biographies of a few American politicians, but all trace of its British origin erased, sells at five shillings in the Transatlantic market. We could cite a whole catalogue of meritorious works that have undergone a similar fate. A New York magazine, which, before the war, claimed to have a circulation of largely upward of a hundred thousand, had, from its origin, stolen its best articles from the magazine literature of this country.

Huge fortunes, it is unnecessary to add, have been made by this simple and convenient process. In a few cases, but only in a very few, a pittance has been paid to the author or publisher here for advance sheets, so as to secure the simultaneous publication in both hemispheres of some popular book or serial, in order the more effectually to preclude the possibility of European competition. It would be well if American literature enabled us to resort to the practice of retaliation; but the style of our loving kinsmen is, as yet, beyond the appreciation of the unformed taste of the people of these kingdoms. Of the few really good books that America has given us most were first published here, and thus the benefit of copyright laws secured to the authors.

The independence of the Confederate States enlarges the appreciative and remunerative audience of every man who lives by his pen, or who plies it from choice or for fame, by some six or seven millions of his own race and language, eager to receive intellectual instruction from the parent source of their language and literature. The South has always been a profitable literary market; but the North, as in all things, has held the monopoly. Of rare, or old, or costly books, the South has been almost the exclusive purchaser on the American continent. New York and Boston imported libraries from the continent, but it was to sell them again to Charleston, to Savannah, Augusta, Montgomery, and Nashville. The secession has cost the Northern periodical press the better half of their circulation. Even the school-books of the South have always been, without a noticeable exception, of Northern origin. All this, we are aware, speaks ill of Southern intellectual activity, but it is accountable by a variety of causes, into which it is not our purpose to enter now. Suffice that the Southerners, a very prevalent error notwithstanding, are a reading people. Less profoundly absorbed by money-making pursuits, with none of that feverish bustle in which the man of the North consumes his mind and body, they are, from nature as well as from circumstances, a serious, thoughtful, meditative people. No one ever so slightly conversant with the history of the American Republic, but knows that by far the greater number of its distinguished jurists and statesmen, as well as of its tacticians of repute, are of Southern birth. To say that the South has no literature would be to do it great injustice. It has a political literature, the fruit of a half century of political struggles with its rival, which is scarcely known to Europe, but which is marked by ability of no common order. It has a poetry, also, of its own, which indicates both taste and power. But it is fair to say that the Confederate States, in the career of independence which they have so heroically commenced, will not for many years be able to supply their own literary wants, or to give an equivalent for what they must necessarily receive from Europe. Of no species of Northern manufactures will they be so jealous and suspicious as of Northern reading matter, and just as British dry goods must take the place of Northern dry goods, and British ships the place of Northern ships, so must British newspapers and British publications of every character fill the immense vacuum which the disruption of the American Union has created in their favour in the Southern States.

Federal Treatment of European Consuls.

THE reported proceedings of General Butler, at New Orleans, are so extravagant that there is a disposition to discredit them, although they come from hitherto reliable sources. That he should tyrannize over the New Orleanists is reasonable, though unrighteous. If any part of the South is to be held by the North it must be ruled oppressively. There is no other way of keeping an antagonistic, loathing people in subjection. But how can we explain the insults to the Dutch Consul, the ignominious searching of his person, and the seizure of money entrusted to him on account of Messrs. Hoop, of Amsterdam? What motive can we suggest for taking forcible possession of the offices of the French and Spanish Consulates? The riddle is easily answered. Though the United States have nothing to gain from insulting Europe, yet the United States' officers cannot hope for the favour of King Mob unless they embrace every opportunity of treating Europe with indignity. The arrangement is simple, and until now has worked well. The military and naval officers practice the insults preached by a rabid press; and to keep off hostilities until a convenient season, Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward are always ready, and probably willing, to eat any quantity of humble pie. Still there is a limit to patience, and we think that limit is nearly reached. The confirmation of the reported outrage on the Dutch Consul and the French and Spanish Consulates will cause great disgust throughout Europe.

Many who feel thus incensed would find it difficult to state how far the Federal Commander has transgressed the law of nations. It happens that the authority and privileges of consuls, except when defined by special treaties, are, to some extent, conjectural. They are not entitled to the same privileges as ambassadors, except in those countries where they exercise diplomatic functions; but in such instances, although called consuls, and still performing consular duties, they are public ministers, and so can claim the immunities universally accorded to the representatives of sovereignty. We have, however, to deal with the case of consuls not exercising diplomatic functions, except in case of need. Have such officers any privileges not enjoyed by private citizens? Nearly all jurists agree that they have. Vattel gives some reasons for consular privileges: "The consul is no public minister. Yet, bearing his Sovereign's commission, and being in this quality received by the Prince in whose dominions he resides, he is, in a certain degree, entitled to the protection of the law of nations." All English consuls are appointed by the Crown, and no foreign consul can exercise his office in England until his appointment has been approved by the Sovereign. There is a very erroneous impression that consuls are virtually the nominees of the merchants. It is true, Chambers of Commerce, and other mercantile bodies, recommend candidates to supply consular vacancies, but such recommendations, though entitled to a respectful consideration, are not always regarded. A few months since the Danish Consul-Generalship for England was vacant. The Danish Chambers of Commerce recommended one candidate, but the King, in the exercise of his undoubted prerogative, elected another gentleman to the office. A consul, then, is an officer of the Crown, commissioned, subject to the consent of the Government of the country in which he is to reside, to protect the property and to exercise some degree of authority over the persons of the subjects of his Sovereign. Indeed, so dignified is the consular position, that, in the event of the legation being recalled—as was the case with the English legation at St. Petersburg, before the commencement of the Crimean war—the consul forthwith acts as the public minister of his Government. Being without instructions, he cannot, of course, enter into diplomatic discussions, but he can receive and transmit despatches; he can communicate directly with the Foreign Office of the country in which he is residing; he is charged with the care of the ambassadorial archives; to his fellow countrymen he can, and is bound, to render all the assistance that they could have demanded of the ambassador, and if he has any complaint to make in reference to the treatment of a fellow-countryman, he need not wait for instructions from his Government, but may, if the case is urgent, forthwith apply for redress. We press this point, because, virtually, the foreign consuls in New Orleans were in the position of consuls on whom had devolved diplomatic functions, and surely, with the functions, so many of the privileges as are necessary for official effectiveness. New Orleans was blockaded, and consequently, foreign residents could not communicate with their ministers at Washington, and could only look to their consuls.

But besides the manner of his appointment and acceptance, and the important duties devolving on him and the still more important functions he may at any moment be called upon to undertake, Vattel directs attention to the fact that the official discharge of consular duties necessitates consular immunities and privileges. "The functions of a consul seem even to require that the consul should be independent of the ordinary justice of the place where he resides, so as not to be molested or impeded, unless he himself violates the law of nations by some enormous crime." This, then, according to reason and usage, is the position of a consul, except when, as in Eastern or semi-barbarous countries, he exercises diplomatic functions. Officially, he is entitled to the immunities of a public minister; but personally, he does not enjoy the privileges of a public minister, and is responsible to the laws of the country in which he resides for his personal acts.

We need not rest the case upon the authority of Vattel. We will cite the opinion of Mr. Cushing, the American jurist. When Attorney-General, the learned gentleman addressed a circular to the United States' Consuls, instructing them as to their powers in reference to the marriages of United States' citizens abroad. In his introductory remarks, he observes:—"But although consuls are not merely commercial agents, as many authors assert, and although they undoubtedly have some of the rights of a foreign minister, still it is undeniable they do not enjoy the privileges of extraterritoriality, according to the rules of public law, as received in the United States . . . in their personal affairs, they are punishable by the local tribunals for offences."

Mr. Cushing assents to the view we have adopted; but, with annoying reticence, he omits to state what are the privileges of consuls, although he does name an important privilege to which he avers they are not entitled. Are we to understand that, with the exception of extraterritoriality, a consul is entitled to all the privileges of a public minister?

In 1853, a Convention was signed between France and the United States, as to consular duties and consular privileges. The Second Article states that the consuls-general, consuls, vice-consuls, or consular agents of the United States and France, "shall enjoy in the two countries the privileges usually accorded to the offices, such as personal immunity, except in the case of crime." This second article, it will be perceived, is declaratory; it stipulates for the usual privileges, and it affirms that personal immunity, except in the case of crime, is one of the privileges usually accorded to the consular office. What crime had the Dutch Consul at New Orleans been guilty of that his person was searched? Was he, in the midst of warfare, with the possible contingency of the bombardment and sack of the city, to refuse the custody of property belonging to Amsterdam merchants? Yet we confess, such guardianship would be worthless, if we were bound to receive Mr. Cushing's ruling as to extraterritoriality. Let us see if his doctrine is tenable.

In the Convention of 1853, between France and the United States, there is a clause permitting consuls to display the arms or flag of their country at their offices or dwellings. This clause, though not verbally, is really declaratory; for it is the universal custom of consuls to hoist their national flags, or to put up over their doors their national arms. What is the object of hoisting a national flag? Why, for example, do vessels hoist the national flag? Only to set forth claims to extraterritoriality. Nor do consuls hoist their national flags for the sake of decorating their offices and abodes. But to make the matter clearer, we have the third article of the Convention of 1853, that "The consular offices and dwellings shall be inviolable. The local authorities shall not invade them under any pretext. In no case shall they examine or seize the papers there deposited. In no case shall those offices or dwellings be used as place of asylum." Anything stronger than this could not have been penned. It proves the seizure of the office of the French Consulate was illegal. We further contend that it proves the outrage on the Dutch and Spanish Consulates equally unjustifiable. We may be told that this is an express compact between France and the United States, but we beg to say, it is a declaratory compact, not differing from, but in accordance with, the usages of civilized communities.

We are of opinion, then, that the conduct of General Butler to the foreign consuls is illegal. That it is insulting and hectoring needs no proof; but Europe has so long submitted to Yankee bullying that she has scarcely a right to complain of it.

There is another view of the case which we must consider. For argument's sake, grant that consuls have neither officially nor personally any more privileges than non-official foreign residents—and we presume no one will assert that consuls have less privileges—are there not such things as neutral rights? If General Butler did not know that he was grossly violating the law of nations by taking forcible possession of the Consulates, he must have known that he was violating the rights of neutrals.

The United States may disregard the law of nations and adopt a semi-barbarous policy, but not with impunity. Sooner or later civilized nations will have to enforce the claims of international rights. A few more such outrages as the one we have been discussing, and the Yankees will have to learn that though they can "lick all creation" on paper, they will be obliged in practice to submit to the laws and obligations of civilization.

THE pressure upon our columns compels us to omit, for this week, the serial parts of "The Cruise of the Sumter" and "Three Months in the Confederate Army."

Reviews.

A HISTORICAL PARALLEL. *

No. III.

On October 5, 1568, the Prince of Orange crossed the Meuse, near Stochem. This achievement was the most brilliant operation of the campaign. The Prince, at the head of 30,000 troops, for the most part composed of men who cared nothing about the good cause, and only fought for good pay, and the chance of plunder, was anxious to give the enemy battle. Alva was too consummate a general to risk a needless encounter. The Spaniards were domiciled in the Netherlands; the patriots were, strategically, invaders. An invader held in check, worn with harassing retreats, with marches and counter-marches, and with skirmishes which are never allowed to grow into battles, is virtually defeated. Alva would not fight William, but he followed him about like his shadow. In a month's campaign, the patriot camp was moved twenty-nine times, and at every move Alva changed his position so as to be near enough to his enemy to cause embarrassment and irritation, but not near enough to compel an engagement. The most serious affair happened when the Prince was crossing the river Geta to effect a junction with the Count de Genlis. The rear-guard, 3000 strong, under the command of Hoogstraaten, was posted on a hill to protect the passage of the main body. Alva immediately despatched his son Frederic with a force of 7000 men, to attack the enemy. The hill was surrounded, and Hoogstraaten and his forces remorselessly slain. Those who escaped immediate carnage were burnt or butchered in cold blood. Viletti was anxious to cross the river and follow up the advantage, but Alva forbade the pursuit. There was no objection to slay 3000 of the enemy if they could be trapped like rats, but is useless to fight a rapidly dissolving army, however certain of victory, seeing that no battle could be fought without some loss to the victorious side. The tactics of the Spaniard were completely successful. The people whom the Prince came to deliver gave him no sign of welcome; for, oppressed and depressed as they were, they needed some evidence of their deliverer's prowess. The troops became mutinous, and after endeavouring to incite them to fight for religious freedom in France, the Prince disbanded his army at Strasburg, paying their arrears as far as he could, and solemnly engaging, "should he return from France alive, and be still unable to pay their arrears of wages, to surrender his person to them as a hostage for his debt."

If the first exilement of the Prince had been discouraging, what must have been the moral effect of the second? On the former occasion he had gone forth to seek aid to save his country from spoliation—now he retires, after proving that the aid collected with so much ingenuity, pains, and cost, was ineffectual. The Prince was, so far, a failure—a complete, entire failure. No marvel that timid patriots despaired of his ability or his fortune, nor can we altogether question the prudence of those who determined not to trust the unlucky William. Was such a one the chosen prophet to speak to the dry bones, to the trodden dust, of national independence, and recall them to life and animation? Even so. The prophet, as well as the people, needed the fiery ordeal. It seems as though, like Job, the Netherlands were permissively and sorely afflicted. Whilst we read of the cruel scourges of the inhuman Spaniards, and of the cruel frustrations of the hopes of the patriots, we wonder how the Ruler of the Universe suffered such outrages, and such frequent disappointments to the cause of truth and justice. But the end vindicated the unsearchable wisdom of Providence. The long contest with the Netherlands precipitated the downfall of Spanish power, mutilated the cruel Inquisition, and uprooted the political supremacy of the Papacy. If William had been immediately successful, civil and religious liberty might have been established in the Netherlands, but not elsewhere. The eighty years' struggle was not for the benefit of the Netherlands only, but was destined to bless all nations, and all times, by crippling the tyrannies that made Europe a huge prison. And we may observe the same of the present contest in America. The immediate object of the Confederates is to defend their sovereign rights and their independence; the object of the North is to make the South its tributary, and so monopolize the wealth thereof. But what of the result of the struggle? Sooner or later the South must establish its independence, because it is impossible to enslave eight millions of people who prefer ruin and death to national dishonour; and the independence of the South will break down a monopoly that impoverishes the world. Posterity will wonder at the apathy with which nations conscious of the advantages of free trade beheld the contest, just as we now are overwhelmed with surprise at the indifference of Europe to the prolonged warfare between Spain and the Netherlands. We are astonished at the blindness that could not see that religion was a mere excuse for cruel oppression generated by a spirit of avarice; much more will future historians be surprised at the credulity of this age in paying the slightest heed to the humanitarianism excuse for Northern avarice—in supposing that Yankees care for a race whom they treat as reptiles, seeking, as they do, to deprive the negro of his home, that in the name of emancipation they might beat him with the scorpions of their inextinguishable, loathing hatred; mocking him with the pretence of liberty, and teaching their children to regard him as a leper doubly accursed, and that the touch of his black skin is more horrible than the bite of an adder; holding that even to permit him to worship God in the same temple is defiling. It is true, the cant of humanitarianism no longer deludes the intelligent classes of Europe; but, for a time, it veiled the enormity of the Northern raid on the South, just as the plea of religion concealed the enormity of the Spanish raid on the Netherlands. We do not say the analogy is perfect. Philip had sovereign rights in the Netherlands, but the Yankees have no rights in the Confederate States.

No sooner was the campaign over, than Alva, breathing out slaughter and vengeance against the people who had meekly submitted to his authority instead of supporting the Prince who came to deliver them from cruel bondage, turned his attention to domestic oppression. Fancying himself secure, he ventured to strike at the last vestige of the Netherlands' rights, by proposing a scheme of perpetual taxation to the Provincial Estates assembled in Brussels in the spring of 1569. The Estates were commanded to endorse, not to discuss, the following decrees:—

A tax of the hundredth penny, or one per cent., was laid upon all property, real and personal, to be collected instantly. This impost, however, was not perpetual, but only to be paid once, unless, of course, it should suit the same arbitrary power by which it was assessed to require it a second time.

A tax of the twentieth penny, or five per cent., was laid upon every transfer of real estate. This imposition was perpetual.

Thirdly, a tax of the tenth penny, or ten per cent., was assessed upon every article of merchandise or personal property, to be paid as often as it should be sold. This tax was likewise to be perpetual.

The whole country was alarmed. The Catholics perceived that their religion might save their necks, but would not preserve their property. So universal was the opposition raised to the scheme, that Alva, finding himself unsupported at Madrid, was obliged to accept a compromise. The provinces agreed to pay two millions yearly for two years. Then a general amnesty was proclaimed.

Certainly but little enthusiasm could be expected from the crowd, had the text of the amnesty been heard. It consisted of three parts—a recitation of the wrongs committed, a statement of the terms of pardon, and a long list of exceptions. All the sins of omission and commission, the heresy, the public preaching, the image-breaking, the compromise, the confederacy, the rebellion, were painted in lively colours. Pardon, however, was offered to all those who had not rendered themselves liable to positive impeachment, in case they should make their peace with the Church before the expiration of two months and by confession and repentance obtain their absolution. The exceptions, however, occupied the greater part of the document. When the general act of condemnation had been fulminated by which all Netherlands were sentenced to death, the exceptions had been very few, and all the individuals mentioned by name. In the act of pardon, the exceptions comprehended so many classes of inhabitants, that it was impossible for any individual to escape a place in some one of the categories, whenever it should please the Government to take his life.

Such an amnesty was too much like a bait to catch the unwary, rather than an act of clemency, to produce a pacification. If the Netherlands were to be plundered, and Protestantism exterminated, the avowed and unceasing brutality of Alva was more effectual, and not more cruel, than the flimsy hypocrisy of Philip.

In 1570, there was a terrible inundation to add to the miseries of the unhappy country. Not less than 100,000 persons perished. The Spaniards, with that readiness to dogmatically interpret the will of God which characterizes fanaticism, whether clothed in Romish red or Protestant black, declared that the flood was a punishment for heresy.

The Prince of Orange was not disheartened by the gloomy prospects of his country. He busied himself in raising supplies and in seeking foreign alliances. The former came in slowly, and the latter were difficult to negotiate on account of the fear inspired by the power of Spain. In 1572, the Duke of Alva had so far entered into amicable relations with the Queen of England, that at his instigation Elizabeth forbade her subjects to supply the "sea-beggars" under the command of De la Marek, then lying off the Southern Coast, with meat, bread, and beer.

The Spaniard soon had occasion to repent the success of his diplomacy. De la Marek set sail for the coast of Holland, boldly demanded the surrender of Brill; the terrified inhabitants fled, and the "sea-beggars" took possession of the city. "The two parties, not more, perhaps, than 250 men in all, met before sunset in the centre of the city, and the foundation of the Dutch Republic was laid." Alva deputed Bossu to recover the city, but the Nieuwland sluice was opened, the country flooded, the Spaniards were panic-stricken, and retired. Flushing soon followed in the wake of Brill.

Instantly afterward, half the island of Walcheren renounced the yoke of Alva. Next, Enkhuizen, the key to the Zuyder Zee, the principal arsenal, and one of the first commercial cities in the Netherlands, rose against the Spanish Admiral, and hung out the banner of Orange on its ramparts. The revolution effected here was purely the work of the people—of the mariners and burghers of the city. Moreover, the magistracy was set aside and the government of Alva repudiated without shedding one drop of blood, without a single wrong to person or property. By the same spontaneous movement, nearly all the important cities of Holland and Zealand raised the standard of him in whom they recognized their deliverer. The revolution was accomplished under nearly similar circumstances everywhere. With one fierce bound of enthusiasm the nation shook off its chain. Oudewater, Dort, Harlem, Leyden, Gorcum, Loewenstein, Gouda, Medenblik, Horn, Alkmaar, Edam, Monnikendam, Purmerode, as well as Flushing, Veer, and Enkhuizen, all ranged themselves under the government of Orange, as lawful stadholder for the King.

Nor was it in Holland and Zealand alone that the beacon fires of freedom were lighted. City after city in Gelderland, Overijssel, and the see of Utrecht; all the important towns of Friesland, some sooner, some later, some without a struggle, some after a short siege, some with resistance by the functionaries of Government, some by amicable compromise, accepted the garrisons of the Prince, and formally recognized his authority.

Still the movement was not a revolution. The Prince was obeyed as the stadholder of the King over Holland, Zealand, Friesland, and Utrecht, and the conservatism of the movement gave it strength. Alva attempted to conciliate by abolishing the hated tax, but the concession, like all tyrannical concessions, came too late. However, towards the close of 1572, the prospect of the patriots was again dark. The much-needed contingent under Genlis was cut to pieces. Mons was recaptured. The Prince of Orange had once more to disband his German army after a fruitless campaign, and to retire to Holland. Town after town was recovered by the Spaniards, and in all cases the town was sacked, the men butchered, and the women subjected to treatment worse than death.

Harlem had been surrendered after a gallant and protracted resistance. We may well wonder that the citizens did not give up at the first summons, considering the disparity of forces. The besiegers were equal in number to all the inhabitants of the town; that is, the Spanish commander, Don Frederic, had 30,000 men under his command, and the garrison did not exceed 4000 men. But the brave Harleimers did not shrink from the unequal contest. Women and children, as well as men, provisioned the city by skimming over the ice on skates during the winter nights. Moreover, there were 300 fighting women.

The last was a most efficient corps, all females of respectable character, armed with sword, musket, and dagger. The chief, Kanau Hasselaer, was a widow of distinguished family and unblemished reputation, about forty-seven years of age, who, at the head of her amazons, participated in many of the most fiercely-contested actions of the siege, both within and without the walls. When such a spirit animated the maids and matrons of the city, it might be expected that the men would hardly surrender the place without a struggle.

The Prince of Orange sent a body of 4000 troops under the command of De la Marek to relieve the city. This much needed contingent were completely routed by the Spaniards. After three days' cannonade terminating on December 20, Don Frederic ordered an assault.

Romero advanced to the breach, followed by a numerous storming party, but met with a resistance which astonished the Spaniards. The church bells rang the alarm throughout the city, and the whole population swarmed to the walls. The besiegers were encountered not only with sword and musket, but with every implement which the burghers' hands could find. Heavy stones, boiling oil, live coals, were hurled upon the heads of the soldiers; hoops, smeared with pitch and set on fire, were dexterously thrown upon their necks. Even Spanish courage and Spanish ferocity were obliged to shrink before the steady determination of a whole population animated by a single spirit. Romero lost an eye in the conflict, many officers were killed and wounded, and three or four hundred soldiers left dead in the breach, while only three or four of the townsmen lost their lives. The signal of recall was reluctantly given, and the Spaniards abandoned the assault. Don Frederic was now aware that Harlem would not fall at his feet at the first sound of his trumpet. It was obvious that a siege must precede the massacre. He gave orders therefore that the ravelin should be undermined, and doubted not that, with a few days' delay, the place would be in his hands.

Although another effort of the Prince of Orange to succour the place was defeated, the citizens remained stout-hearted. As fast as the Spaniards mined, the patriots countermined. At length, when the ravelin was given up, and the Spaniards poured in, expecting to instantly possess themselves of the city, they were met by a new and stronger barrier, which the citizens had secretly and industriously raised. Don Frederic then determined to reduce the place by famine.

* The Rise of the Dutch Republic. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. History of the United Netherlands. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. London: John Murray.

The siege lasted for seven months. Gallant sorties were of frequent occurrence. "These citizens," wrote Don Frederic, "do as much as the best soldiers in the world could do." The city did not surrender till July 12.

Ordinary food had long since vanished. The population now subsisted on linseed and rape-seed; as these supplies were exhausted they devoured cats, dogs, rats, and mice, and when at last these unclean animals had been all consumed, they boiled the hides of horses and oxen; they ate shoe-leather; they plucked the nettles and grass from the graveyards, and the weeds which grew between the stones of the pavement, that with such food they might still support life a little longer, till the promised succour should arrive. Men, women, and children fell dead by scores in the streets, perishing with pure starvation, and the survivors had hardly the heart or the strength to bury them out of their sight. They who yet lived seemed to flit like shadows to and fro, envying those whose sufferings had already been terminated by death.

Even when the Prince of Orange recommended a surrender, they determined to make a sally and conquer or perish. This intention was abandoned in consequence of a solemn promise made by Don Frederic, of ample forgiveness if the town submitted. Of course the promise was broken.

Five executioners, with their attendants, were kept constantly at work; and when at last they were exhausted with fatigue, or, perhaps, sickened with horror, three hundred wretches were tied two and two, back to back, and drowned in the Harlem Lake.

At last, after twenty-three hundred human creatures had been murdered in cold blood, within a city where so many thousands had previously perished by violent or by lingering deaths, the blasphemous farce of a pardon was enacted.

The siege of Harlem, thus wonderfully protracted, left the Spaniards little ground for triumph.

In 1573, Alva retired from the Netherlands out of favour with his sovereign, and bitterly cursed by the people he had so cruelly oppressed. The close of his administration was marked by disaster. Just before Requesens assumed the command, the patriots had gained a naval victory on the Zuyder Zee, capturing the Spanish Admiral, Count Bossu. Such reverses must have been extremely galling to Alva after his long triumphant career. The meanness, as well as the wickedness, of his disposition was shown by cheating his Amsterdam creditors.

The Duke had contracted in Amsterdam an enormous amount of debt, both public and private. He accordingly, early in November, caused a proclamation to be made throughout the city by sound of trumpet, that all persons having demands upon him were to present their claims, in person, upon a specified day. During the night preceding the day so appointed, the Duke and his train very noiselessly took their departure, without notice or beat of drum. By this masterly generalship his unhappy creditors were foiled upon the very eve of their anticipated triumph; the heavy accounts which had been contracted on the faith of the King and the Governor remained for the most part unpaid, and many opulent and respectable families were reduced to beggary. Such was the consequence of the unlimited confidence which they had reposed in the honour of their tyrant.

Alva was, indeed, greedy of fame. The renown of his inhuman butcheries did not content him, so he was guilty of an act which entitles him to be remembered as an adroit swindler.

The year 1574, was a dark one for the Prince of Orange. Count Louis, at the head of a small and mutinous army, was obliged to give battle to Avila. The patriots were defeated, and the gallant Louis, his brother Count Henry, and the Duke Christopher, were never again seen alive. For awhile, the Prince refused to believe the evil tidings, and wrote urgent letters "day by day, long after the eyes that should have read the friendly missives were closed."

The siege of Leyden, interrupted by the enterprize of Count Louis, was resumed on the May 26, 1574. Mr. Motley's account is worthy of the subject, and we cannot pay the historian a higher compliment. The siege of Leyden will for ever be freshly remembered as a marvellous example of human endurance. The sufferings of Harlem were repeated—even exceeded. The city was not relieved until October 3.

Yet, while thus patiently waiting, they were literally starving; for even the misery endured at Harlem had not reached that depth and intensity of agony to which Leyden was now reduced. Bread, malt-cake, horseflesh, had entirely disappeared; dogs, cats, rats, and other vermin, were esteemed luxuries. A small number of cows, kept as long as possible for their milk, still remained; but a few were killed from day to day, and distributed in minute proportions, hardly sufficient to support life among the famishing population. Starving wretches swarmed daily around the shambles where these cattle were slaughtered, contending for any morsel which might fall, and lapping eagerly the blood as it ran along the pavement; while the hides, chopped and boiled, were greedily devoured. Women and children, all day long, were seen searching gutters and dung-hills for morsels of food, which they disputed fiercely with the famishing dogs. The green leaves were stripped from the trees, every living herb was converted into human food, but these expedients could not avert starvation. The daily mortality was frightful—infants starved to death on the maternal breasts, which famine had parched and withered; mothers dropped dead in the streets, with their dead children in their arms. In many a house the watchmen, in their rounds, found a whole family of corpses, father, mother, children, side by side; for a disorder called the plague, naturally engendered of hardship and famine, now came, as if in kindness, to abridge the agony of the people. The pestilence stalked at noonday through the city, and the doomed inhabitants fell like grass beneath its scythe. From six thousand to eight thousand human beings sank before this scourge alone, yet the people resolutely held out—women and men mutually encouraging each other to resist the entrance of their foreign foe—an evil more horrible than pest or famine.

Yet the heroism of the people would have been of no avail but for the bold device of inundating the country by cutting the dykes. The prince still held in his hand the keys with which he could unlock the ocean gates and let the waters in upon the land, and he had long been convinced that nothing could save the city but to break the dykes. Leyden was not upon the sea, but he could send the sea to Leyden, although an army fit to encounter the besieging force under Valdez could not be levied. The Battle of Mookerheyde had, for the present, quite settled the question of land relief, but it was possible to besiege the besiegers with the waves of the ocean. The Spaniards occupied the coast from the Hague to Vlaardingen, but the dykes along the Meuse and Yssel were in possession of the Prince. He determined that these should be pierced, while, at the same time, the great sluices at Rotterdam, Schiedam, and Delfshaven, should be opened. The damage to the fields, villages, and growing crops would be enormous, but he felt that no other course could rescue Leyden, and with it the whole of Holland, from destruction. His clear expositions and impassioned eloquence at last overcame all resistance. By the middle of July the Estates fully consented to his plan, and its execution was immediately undertaken. "Better a drowned land than a lost land," cried the patriots, with enthusiasm, as they devoted their fertile fields to desolation.

No one, we presume, will dispute the wisdom or the righteousness of the inundation and desolation that saved Leyden. What ground, then, is there for carping at the Confederates gallantly making the same sacrifices under like circumstances? They are invaded, and they destroy the property they cannot defend. They are closely pressed by Northern hordes having the command of the sea, and the advantage of unlimited supplies of the material of war; therefore they swamp the country. Who has a right to complain? Not the enemy. A burglar may be incensed at the strength of bars, bolts, and locks, but it would be childish to bemoan his ill-usage. Is Europe aggrieved by the destruction of cotton and sugar, and the inundation of the country? No doubt we have a very considerable interest in the matter. The devastation in the Confederate States means pauperism in Lancashire and a depression of trade throughout Europe. We consider it politic and right to let the Confederacy maintain the cause of freedom alone, and so we submit to the incalculable sufferings entailed upon our artisans and the injury done to our commerce. Our suffering is the price of our policy. The Confederates cheerfully accept devastation rather than endure dishonour. They think "a drowned land is better than a lost land." To the Northern rabble it seems inexplicable that for the sake of nationality men should sacrifice property. The Yankees hold that cotton, sugar, and the almighty dollar are vastly more valuable than social and political rights. They will have to unlearn their creed, that "the dollar is God, and there is none beside." If it were possible and necessary, the South would carry into effect the resolve of William the Silent, to give the country to the sea rather than let it fall into the hands of the enemy. The resolution of the Southern people will not fail. The war may last for years. The Yankees may necessitate greater desolation and devastation than Spain necessitated in the Netherlands. Still the prosperity of the South will return with peace, as it did with the Netherlands; but the Northern Republic will at the end of the war have an empty exchequer and a crippled trade, and, like Spain, will find that the effort to subjugate a free nation has resulted in her own humiliation.

(To be continued.)

An Embassy to the Court of St. James's in 1840. By F. Guizot, Ambassador from His Majesty, Louis Philippe. London: Richard Bentley.

Those who read this book for amusement will not be disappointed, and any historical work from the pen of M. Guizot must command the attention of the historical student. Nevertheless, we cannot accept these memoirs as history, pure and simple. A record of current events, however elaborate, cannot be thoroughly impartial. Each generation makes its history, and posterity writes it. Still more impossible is it for anyone who has played a chief part in affairs to render a historical account of his times. In proportion to his conscientiousness will his recital be colored with his political partiality. M. Guizot is a remarkable instance of the truth of what we are advancing. We do not question his downright honesty of purpose, but the Minister of Louis Philippe cannot, after a retirement of fourteen years from office, rid himself of his officialism. He looks at the past and the present, is sorely perplexed that the actual state of affairs does not square with his former ideas and predictions, never considers that his ideas were fallacious, and his predictions unwarranted by circumstances and experience, but clings to them pertinaciously, and exclaims, "Providence seems sometimes to delight in confounding the judgments and conjectures of men." M. Guizot is not wrong; it is Providence makes a mistake. Such is not our creed. We believe that the laws which govern the moral and social condition of mankind are as certain and, we will add, as ascertainable, as the laws which govern the world of matter. We have no such irreverent conception of Deity as to suppose the Creator has endowed His creatures with the faculty of judgment in order to sometimes confound it. If conjecture is the child of ambitious aspiration, and judgment the offspring of alluring prejudice, it is consistent with, nay, it is an essential of, the Divine law that the one should not be realized, and that the other should be confounded. We are not advocating the presumptuous doctrine of the infallibility of human reason; but we contend that our fallibility in conjecturing and judging of those things that are within the province of our reasoning faculties, is not inherent, but acquired. If the statesman listens to the oracles of the past there is every probability that his judgment will be sound, and his predictions verified. Unless to this extent we have faith in the reliableness of human judgment, the craft of statesmanship is no more to be trusted and honoured, than astrological soothsaying, or the puerile speculations of aerial castle-builders.

M. Guizot, thus writes of the Revolution that exiled him from France, and brought about the restoration of the Napoleon dynasty:—

On the day when I left London to repair to the Chateau d'Eu, the 6th of August, Prince Louis Napoleon, towards four o'clock in the morning, disembarked near Boulogne, and with his name alone for an army, attempted for the second time the conquest of France. What would be the astonishment to-day, if any rational man, who, having slept since that date the sleep of Epimenides, should see, on waking, that Prince upon the throne of France, and invested with supreme power? I cannot recall again, without some embarrassment, what was said by all the world, in 1840, and what I wrote myself with reference to what we all called "a mad and ridiculous adventure," and to its hero. * * * Yet, there is nothing in the strange contrast between the incident of 1840 and the Empire of to-day, beyond what is natural and clear. No event ever shook the confidence of Prince Louis Napoleon in himself and his destiny; in despite of the success of others and of his own reverses, he remained a stranger to doubt and discouragement. Twice, vainly and wrongfully, he sought the accomplishment of his fortune. He never ceased to reckon on it, and waited the propitious opportunity. It came at last, and found him confident and ready to attempt everything. An eminent example of the power which preserves, in the dark shadows of the future, persevering faith; and a great lesson to all who doubt and bend easily under the blows of fortune.

The most casual reader can scarcely fail to observe that the above passage is illogical. If there is nothing strange in the Revolution of February undoing the work of Revolution of July, assuredly any rational man might have foreseen the convulsion looming in the future. We quite believe that M. Guizot, who, on the very eve of the revolution, "laughed immoderately" at the suggestion of danger, thought in 1840 that the throne of Louis Philippe was founded on a rock, and would endure for ever. But we submit that a sagacious statesman, in 1840, before sleeping the sleep of Epimenides, would, had he considered the subject, have foreseen that the durability of the monarchy was uncertain, if not improbable. The Citizen King had, little by little, separated himself from the power to which he owed his kingship. In that very year the Paris fortifications were commenced, and no one could be deceived by the pretence that they were intended to protect the capital against foreign invasion—wisely or unwisely, they were designed to command Paris in case of a revolt. The Citizen King could no longer rely on the loyalty of the citizens. The great fault of the Government of Louis Philippe was, not that it aimed at repressing the political liberties of the people, but that in effect it kept France stationary. The French never have been and never will be contented with peace and plenty at home, unless they are simultaneously regarded abroad as "the grand nation." The cry for reform would never have been raised if the European influence of France had been great and growing. And we assure M. Guizot, the revolution was foreseen by the partisans of Napoleon, if not by others. A Prince who can govern as Napoleon III. has governed would not be guilty of the extreme folly of making two hopeless and unsuccessful attempts for empire, for the sake of keeping his name before the world. Prince Louis Napoleon saw plainly the blunder of Louis Philippe, and was ready to profit by it. He miscalculated the season, and on two occasions shook the tree before the pear was ripe. If he had gone to Boulogne in 1847, it is highly probable he would have precipitated the revolution. Not that the French people at that time thought of the restoration of the Empire. When the Provisional Government was established in 1848, first Lamartine, then Cavaignac, was the hope of France; and it was only when the contest for the Presidency was over that Europe knew Louis Napoleon had a chance of the Chief Magistracy. Napoleon was elected because his name was a symbol of order, and still more, of that supremacy in the councils of Europe which Frenchmen so much desire. We are nauseated with the repetition of the assertion of Napoleon's faith in his destiny. If the phrase is meant to signify that he foresaw the downfall of the Citizen King, and that he was, from ability and association, his fitting successor, we have no objection to it save its vagueness. If those who utter it wish us to understand that the shrewdest man in Europe is the obedient slave of a fanatical chimera, and that the Imperial policy, so well-timed and so successful, is the result of a fatalistic monomania, we can only marvel at their blindness. Napoleon would not have thought himself destined to ascend the throne of France, if Louis Philippe had thoroughly understood the genius of the people over whom he was elected to rule.

During the season London is peopled with "lions," and in 1840, the year of the Queen's marriage, the English metropolis was more than usually favoured with the presence of passing and lasting celebrities. M. Guizot was not lost in the crowd of distinguished personages: on the contrary, he was the observed, not only of all observers, but of all the observed. He came to this country, saw everything, and naturally retains a vivid impression of his eight months' sojourn. As the representative of the French Sovereign he would have been honoured by statesmen, and heartily welcomed by Belgians. But the man was still greater than the ambassador. M. Guizot was famed for his literary ability. Above all, he was what this aristocratic England delights to honour—a self-made man—a parvenu. Not "self-made" in the vulgar sense of being raised to power by mob and ranting demagogism, for Englishmen hate and despise demagogues. "Self-made" is, indeed, a wrong term. M. Guizot was one of those fortunate individuals to whom Nature gives an indefeasible patent of intellectual nobility, which is sure to be acknowledged and respected by all classes of the community. The memoir of his ambassadorship shows that from day to day the brilliant Frenchman was associated with persons famed for intellect, title, or position; and that he was a keen observer of men and manners.

We commenced our reading of this work by marking several passages for extracts, but we soon found that if we were to quote all the particularly interesting parts we should have to reproduce at least half the book. We therefore select, almost at random, two specimens of our author's clever word-painting. We commend the following to the attention of those who have exaggerated notions of the grandeur, if not the gaiety, of a royal dinner:—

On Thursday, the 5th of March, I dined for the first time with the Queen. Neither during the dinner nor in the drawing-room afterwards was the conversation animated or interesting. Political subjects were entirely avoided; we sat round a circular table, before the Queen, who was on a sofa; two or three of her ladies were endeavouring to work; Prince Albert played at chess; Lady Palmerston and I, with some effort, carried on a flugging dialogue. I observed over the three doors of the apartment three portraits, Fénelon, the Czar Peter the Great, and Anne Hyde, daughter of Lord Clarendon, the first wife of James the Second. I felt surprised at this association of three persons so incongruous. No one had remarked it, and no one could explain the reason. I thought of one; the portraits were selected for their size—they fitted well in their respective places.

We next give a specimen of demagogic tuft hunting; the sketch of O'Connell is life-like:—

I found Mr. O'Connell exactly the sort of man I had pictured to myself. There was something, perhaps, in this, but it is always much to answer expectation. He was tall, bulky, robust, animated, his head a little sunk between the shoulders, with an air of strength and shrewdness; strength everywhere, shrewdness in the quick glance, slightly indirect although not indicating duplicity; he was neither elegant nor vulgar, his manner a little embarrassed yet firm, with even a tincture of suppressed arrogance. His politeness towards the Englishmen of condition he met there was mingled slightly with humility and pride: it was apparent that they had once been his masters, and that now he exercised power over them; he had submitted to their rule and he accepted their attentions. He was evidently flattered at having been invited to meet me. On our introduction, I said to him, "You and I, sir, are here two great evidences of the progress of justice and good sense: you, a Catholic, are a member of the English House of Commons; I, a Protestant, am the ambassador of France." This opening remark pleased him, and during dinner we conversed together almost like old acquaintances. During the morning, Mrs. Stanley had hesitated about an evening party; nevertheless she had decided for it, and after dinner I saw arrive Lord and Lady Palmerston, Lord Normandy, Lord Clarendon, the Bishop of Norwich, Lady William Russell, and several others. On leaving the dinner-table, a fit of social modesty seized Mr. O'Connell—he wished to take his departure. "You have company," said he, to Mr. Stanley. "Yes, but pray remain, we expect you to do so." "No, no, I must go."—"Stay, I entreat you." He stayed, with visible satisfaction not unmingled with pride. "That, then, is Mr. O'Connell?" said Lady William Russell to me, who probably had never seen him before.—"Yes," I replied, "and I am come from Paris to tell you so."—"You thought, perhaps, that we passed our lives with him?"—"No, I see evidently that you do not." All appeared glad of the opportunity to make themselves agreeable to him, and he seemed equally inclined to profit by it. He spoke much; he detailed the progress of temperance in Ireland; the drunkards were disappearing by thousands—the taste for regular habits and more refined manners advanced to proportion as inebriety receded. No one expressed the slightest doubt. I asked him whether this was a mere puff of popular humour or a lasting reform! He replied gravely, "It will last; we are a persevering race, as all are who have suffered much." He took pleasure in addressing himself to me—in calling me to witness the improved fortune of his country, and his personal triumph. I retired towards midnight, and was the first to go, leaving Mr. O'Connell surrounded by four cabinet ministers and five or six ladies of rank, who listened to him with a mixture, somewhat comic, of curiosity and pride, of deference and disdain.

We will, in conclusion, cite an instance of M. Guizot's good taste. He was the first Protestant who ever came to this country as French ambassador. Forthwith, the late lamented and somewhat erratic Bishop Blomfield proposed to receive him at St. Paul's officially and with "a little display." But, much to his honour, the Protestant ambassador declined the proposal, having "no taste for show in such a place." We expect the enthusiastic prelate did not quite understand the ultra-tolerant Protestantism of M. Guizot.

CONFEDERATE STATE PAPERS.

MESSAGE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.
APRIL 29, 1861.

GENTLEMEN OF CONGRESS.—It is my pleasing duty to announce to you that the Constitution framed for the establishment of a permanent government of the Confederate States of America has been ratified by the several conventions of each of those States which were referred to to inaugurate the said Government, in its full proportions and upon its own substantial basis of the popular will.

It only remains that elections should be held for the designation of the officers to administer it.

There is every reason to believe that at no distant day other States, identical in political principles and community of interests with those which you represent, will join this Confederacy, giving to its typical constellation increased splendour—to its government of free, equal and sovereign States, a wider sphere of usefulness, and to the friends of constitutional liberty a greater security for its harmonious and perpetual existence.

It was not, however, for the purpose of making this announcement that I have deigned it my duty to convene you at an earlier day than that fixed by yourselves for your meeting.

The declaration of war made against this Confederacy by Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, in his Proclamation, issued on the 15th day of the present month, renders it necessary, in my judgment, that you should convene at the earliest practicable moment, to devise the measures necessary for the defence of the country.

The occasion is, indeed, an extraordinary one. It justifies me in giving a brief review of the relations heretofore existing between us and the States which now unite in warfare against us, and a succinct statement of the events which have resulted, to the end that mankind may pass intelligent and impartial judgment on our motives and objects.

During the war waged against Great Britain by her colonies on this continent, a common danger impelled them to a close alliance, and to the formation of a Confederation by the terms of which the colonies, styling themselves States, entered severally into a firm league of friendship with each other for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever.

In order to guard against any misconception of their compact, the several States made an explicit declaration in a distinct article—that each State retain its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power of jurisdiction and right which is not by this said Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled under this contract of alliance.

The war of the Revolution was successfully waged, and resulted in the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1783, by the terms of which the several States were each by name recognized to be independent.

The articles of confederation contained a clause whereby all alterations were prohibited, unless confirmed by the Legislatures of every State after being agreed to by the Congress; and in obedience to this provision, under the resolution of Congress of the 21st February, 1787, the several States appointed delegates for the purpose of revising the articles of confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several Legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as shall, when agreed to in Congress, and confirmed by the States, render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Government, and the preservation of the Union.

It was by the delegates chosen by the several States under the resolution just quoted, that the Constitution of the United States was formed in 1787, and submitted to the several States for ratification, as shown by the seventh article, which is in these words: "The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same."

I have italicised certain words in the resolutions just made for the purpose of attracting attention to the singular and marked caution with which the States endeavoured in every possible form to exclude the idea that the separate and independent sovereignty of each State was merged into one common government or nation; and the earnest desire they evinced to impress on the Constitution its true character—that of a compact between independent States—the Constitution of 1787, however, admitting the clause already recited from the articles of confederation, which provided in explicit terms that each State reclaimed its sovereignty and independence.

Some alarm was felt in the States, when invited to ratify the Constitution, lest this omission should be construed into an abandonment of their cherished principles, and they refused to be satisfied until amendments were added to the Constitution, placing beyond any pretence of doubt the reservation by the States of their sovereign rights and powers not expressly delegated to the United States by the Constitution.

Strange, indeed, must it appear to the impartial observer, that it is none the less true that all these carefully worded clauses proved unavailing to prevent the rise and growth in the Northern States of a political school which has persistently claimed that the Government set above and over the States, an organization created by the States, to secure the blessings of liberty and independence against foreign aggression, has been gradually perverted into a machine for their control in their domestic affairs.

The creature has been exalted above its Creator—the principals have been made subordinate to the agent appointed by themselves.

The people of the Southern States, whose almost exclusive occupation was agriculture, early perceived a tendency in the Northern States to render a common government subservient to their own purposes by imposing burthens on commerce as protection to their manufacturing and shipping interests.

Long and angry controversies grew out of these attempts, often successful, to benefit one section of the country at the expense of the other, and the danger of disruption arising from this cause was enhanced by the fact that the Northern population was increasing, by emigration and other causes, more than the population of the South.

By degrees, as the Northern States gained preponderance in the National Congress, self-interest taught their people to yield ready assent to any plausible advocacy of their right as majority to govern the minority. Without control, they learn to listen with impatience to the suggestion of any constitutional impediment to the exercise of their will, and so utterly have the principles of the Constitution been corrupted in the Northern mind that, in the inaugural address delivered by President Lincoln in March last, he asserts a maxim, which he plainly deems to be undeniable, that the theory of the Constitution requires, in all cases, that the majority shall govern. And in another memorable instance the same Chief Magistrate did not hesitate to liken the relations between States and the United States to those which exists between the county and the State in which it is situated, and by which it was created.

This is the lamentable and fundamental error in which rests the policy that has culminated in his declaration of war against these Confederate States.

In addition to the long-continued and deep-seated resentment felt by the Southern States at the persistent abuse of the powers they had delegated to the Congress, for the purpose of enriching the manufacturing and shipping classes of the North at the expense of the South, there has existed for nearly half a century another subject of discord, involving interests of such transcendent magnitude as at all times to create the apprehension in the minds of many devoted lovers of the Union, that its permanence was impossible.

When the several States delegated certain powers to the United States' Congress, a large portion of the labouring population were importuned into the colonies by the mother country. In twelve out of the fifteen States, negro slavery existed, and the right of property existing slaves was protected by law; this property was recognized in the Constitution, and provision was made against its loss by the escape of the slave.

The increase in the number of slaves by foreign importation from Africa was also secured by a clause forbidding Congress to prohibit the slave trade anterior to a certain date, and in no clause can there be found any delegation of power to the Congress to authorize it in any manner to legislate to the prejudice, detriment, or the discouragement of the owners of that species of property, or excluding it from the protection of the Government.

The climate and soil of the Northern States soon proved unpropitious to the continuance of slave labour, while the reverse being the case at the South, made unrestricted free intercourse between the two sections unfriendly.

The Northern States consulted their own interests by selling their slaves to the South, and prohibiting slavery within their limits. The South were willing purchasers of property suitable to their wants, and paid the price of the acquisition without harbouring a suspicion that their quiet possession was to be disturbed by those who were not only in want of constitutional authority, but by good faith as vendors, from disquieting a title emanating from themselves.

As soon, however, as the Northern States, that prohibited African slavery within their limits, had reached a number sufficient to give their representation on a controlling vote in the Congress, a persistent and organized system of hostile measures against the rights of the owners of slaves in the Southern States was inaugurated and gradually extended. A series of measures was devised and prosecuted for the purpose of rendering insecure the tenure of property in slaves.

Fanatical organizations, supplied with money by voluntary subscriptions, were assiduously engaged in exciting amongst the slaves a spirit of discontent and revolt. Means were furnished for their escape from their owners, and agents secretly employed to entice them to abscond.

The constitutional provision for their rendition to their owners was first evaded, then openly denounced as a violation of conscientious obligation and religious duty. Men were taught that it was a merit to elude, disobey, and violently oppose the execution of the laws enacted to secure the performance of the promise contained in the constitutional compact. Often owners of slaves were mobbed and even murdered in open day solely for applying to a magistrate for the arrest of a fugitive slave.

The dogmas of the voluntary organization soon obtained control of the Legislatures of many of the Northern States, and laws were passed for the punishment, by ruinous fines, and long-continued imprisonment in gaols and penitentiaries, of citizens of the Southern States who should dare ask of the officers of the law for the recovery of their property. Emboldened by success, on the theatre of agitation and aggression, against the clearly expressed constitutional rights of the Congress, Senators and Representatives were sent to the common councils of the nation, whose chief title to this distinction consisted in the display of a spirit of ultra fanaticism, and whose business was not to promote the general welfare, or ensure domestic tranquillity—but to awaken the bitterest hatred against the citizens of sister States by violent denunciations of their institutions.

The transactions of public affairs was impeded by repeated efforts to usurp powers not delegated by the Constitution, for the purpose of impairing the security of property in slaves, and reducing those States which held slaves to a condition of inferiority.

Finally, a great party was organized for the purpose of obtaining the administration of the Government, with the avowed object of using its power for the total exclusion of the Slave States from all participation in the benefits of the public domain acquired by all the States in common, whether by conquest or purchase, surrounded them entirely by States in which slavery should be prohibited, thus rendering the property in slaves so insecure as to be comparatively worthless, and thereby annihilating in effect property worth thousands of millions of dollars.

This party, thus organized, succeeded in the month of November last in the election of its candidate for the Presidency of the United States.

In the meantime, under the mild and genial climate of the Southern States, and the increasing care for the well-being and comfort of the labouring classes, dictated alike by interest and humanity, the African slaves had augmented in number from about six hundred thousand, at the date of the adoption of the constitutional compact, to upwards of four millions.

In a moral and social condition, they had been elevated from brutal savages into docile, intelligent, and civilized agricultural labourers, and supplied not only with bodily comforts, but with careful religious instruction, under the supervision of a superior race. Their labour had been so directed as not only to allow a gradual and marked amelioration of their own condition, but to convert hundreds of thousands of square miles of the wilderness into cultivated lands covered with a prosperous people. Towns and cities had sprung into existence, and it rapidly increased in wealth and population under the social system of the South.

The white population of the Southern slaveholding States had augmented from about 1,250,000, at the date of adoption of the Constitution, to more than 8,500,000, in 1860, and the productions of the South in cotton, rice, sugar, and tobacco, for the full development and continuance of which the labour of African slaves was and is indispensable, had swollen to an amount which formed nearly three-fourths of the export of the whole United States, and had become absolutely necessary to the wants of civilized man.

With interests of such overwhelming magnitude imperilled, the people of the Southern States were driven by the conduct of the North to the adoption of some course of action to avoid the dangers with which they were openly menaced. With this view, the Legislatures of the several States invited the people to select delegates to conventions to be held for the purpose of determining for themselves what measures were best to be adopted to meet so alarming a crisis in their history.

Here it may be proper to observe that, from a period as early as 1798, there had existed in all of the States of the Union a party almost uninterruptedly in the majority, based upon the creed that each State was, in the last resort, the sole judge as well of its wrongs as of the mode and measures of redress. Indeed, it is obvious that, under the law of nations, this principle is an axiom as applied to the relations of independent sovereign States, such as those which had united themselves under the constitutional compact.

The Democratic party of the United States repeated, in its successful canvass in 1836, the deduction made in numerous previous political contests, that it would faithfully abide by, and uphold the principles laid down in the Kentucky and Virginia Legislatures of 1799, and that it adopts those principles as constituting one of the main foundations of its political creed.

The principles thus emphatically announced embrace that to which I have already adverted—the right of each State to judge of and redress the wrongs of which it complains. Their principles were maintained by overwhelming majorities of the people of all the States of the Union at different elections, especially in the election of Mr. Jefferson in 1805, Mr. Madison in 1809, and Mr. Pierce in 1852. In the exercise of a right so ancient, so well established, and so necessary for self-preservation, the people of the Confederate States in their conventions determined that the wrongs which they had suffered, and the evils with which they were menaced, required that they should revoke the delegation of powers to the Federal Government which they had ratified in their several conventions. They consequently passed ordinances resuming all their rights as sovereign and independent States, and dissolved their connection with the other States of the Union. Having done this, they proceeded to form a new compact among themselves by new articles of confederation, which have been also ratified by conventions of the several States, with an approach to unanimity far exceeding that of the conventions which adopted the Constitutions of 1787.

They have organized their new Government in all its departments. The functions of the executive, legislative, and judicial magistrates are performed in accordance with the will of the people, as displayed not merely in a cheerful acquiescence, but in the enthusiastic support of the Government thus established by themselves; and but for the interference of the Government of the United States, this legitimate exercise of a people to self-government has been manifested in every possible form.

Scarce had you assembled in February last, when, prior even to the inauguration of the chief magistrate you had elected, you expressed your desire for the appointment of commissioners, and for the settlement of all questions of disagreement between the two Governments upon principles of right, justice, equity, and good faith.

It was my pleasure as well as my duty to co-operate with you in this work of peace. Indeed, in my address to you on taking the oath of office, and before receiving from you the communication of this resolution, I had said that "as a necessity, not as a choice, we have resorted to the remedy of separating, and henceforth our energies must be directed to the conduct of our own affairs, and the perpetuity of the Confederacy which we have formed. If a just perception of mutual interest shall permit us to peacefully pursue our separate political career, my most earnest desires will then have been fulfilled."

It was in furtherance of these accordant views of the Congress and the executive, that I made choice of three discreet, able, and distinguished citizens, who repaired to Washington. Aided by their cordial co-operation and that of the Secretary of State, every effort compatible with self-respect and the dignity of the Confederacy was exhausted before I allowed myself to yield to the conviction that the Government of the United States was determined to attempt the conquest of this people, and that our cherished hopes of peace were unobtainable.

On the arrival of our commissioners in Washington on the 5th of March, they postponed, at the suggestion of a friendly intermediary, doing more than giving informal notice of their arrival. This was done with a view to afford time to the President of the United States, who had just been inaugurated, for the discharge of other pressing official duties in the organization of his administration, before engaging his attention in the object of their mission.

It was not until the 12th of the month that they officially addressed the Secretary of State, informing him of the purpose of their arrival, and stating in the language of their instructions their wish to make the Government of the United States overtures for the opening of negotiations, assuring the Government of the United States that the President, Congress, and people of the Confederate States desired a peaceful solution of these great questions—that it was neither their interest nor their wish to make any demand which is not founded on the strictest principles of justice, nor to do any act to injure their late confederates.

To this communication no formal reply was received until the 8th of April. During the interval, the commissioners had consented to waive all questions of form, with the firm resolve to avoid war if possible. They went so far even as to hold, during that long period, unofficial intercourse through an intermediary, whose high position and character inspired the hope of success, and through whom constant assurances were received from the Government of the United States of its peaceful intentions—of its determination to evacuate Fort Sumter; and further, that no measure would be introduced changing the existing status prejudicial to the Confederate States; that in the event of any change in regard to Fort Pickens, notice would be given to the commissioners.

The crooked path of diplomacy can scarcely furnish an example so wanting in courtesy, in candour and directness, as was the course of the United States Government toward our commissioners in Washington. For proof of this I refer to the annexed documents marked, taken in connection with further facts which I now proceed to relate.

Early in April the attention of the whole country was attracted to extraordinary preparations for an extensive military and naval expedition in New York and other Northern ports. These preparations commenced in secrecy, for an expedition whose destination was concealed, and only became known when nearly completed, and on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of April, transports and vessels of war with troops, munitions, and military supplies, sailed from northern ports bound southward.

Alarmed by so extraordinary a demonstration, the commissioners requested the delivery of an answer to their official communication of the 12th of March, and the reply dated on the 15th of the previous month, from which it appears that during the whole interval, whilst the commissioners were receiving assurances calculated to inspire hope of the success of their mission, the Secretary of State and the President of the United States had already determined to hold no intercourse with them whatever—to refuse even to listen to any proposals they had to make, and had profited by the delay created by their own assurances, in order to prepare secretly the means for effective hostile operations.

That these assurances were given, has been virtually confessed by the Government of the United States, by its act of sending a messenger to Charleston to give notice of its purpose to use force if opposed in its intention of supplying Fort Sumter.

No more striking proof of the absence of good faith in the confidence of the Government of the United States towards the Confederacy can be required, than is contained in the circumstances which accompanied this notice.

According to the usual course of navigation, the vessels composing the expedition, and designed for the relief of Fort Sumter, might be looked for in Charleston harbour on the 9th of April. Yet our commissioners in Washington were detained under assurances that notice should be given of any military movement. The notice was not addressed to them, but a messenger was sent to Charleston to give notice to the Governor of South Carolina, and the notice was so given at a late hour on the 8th of April, the eve of the very day on which the fleet might be expected to arrive.

That this manoeuvre failed in its purpose was not the fault of those who controlled it. A heavy tempest delayed the arrival of the expedition, and gave time to the commander of our forces at Charleston to ask and receive instructions of the Government. Even then, under all the provocation incident to the contemptuous refusal to listen to our commissioners, and the treacherous course of the Government of the United States, I was sincerely anxious to avoid the effusion of blood, and directed a proposal to be made to the commander of Fort Sumter, who had avowed himself to be nearly out of provisions, that we would abstain from directing our fire on Fort Sumter if he would promise not to open fire upon our forces unless first attacked. This proposal was refused. The conclusion was, that the design of the United States was to place the besieging force at Charleston between the simultaneous fire of the fleet. The fort should, of course, be at once reduced. This order was executed by General Beauregard with skill and success, which were naturally to be expected from the well-known character of that gallant officer; and, although the bombardment lasted some thirty-three hours, our flag did not wave over the battered walls until after the appearance of the hostile fleet off Charleston.

Fortunately not a life was lost on our side, and we were gratified in being prepared. The necessity of an useless effusion of blood by the prudent caution of the officers who commanded the fleet, in abstaining from the evidently futile effort to enter the harbour for the relief of Major Anderson, was spared.

I refer to the report of the Secretary of War, and the papers accompanying it, for further particulars of this brilliant affair.

In this connection I cannot refrain from a well-deserved tribute to the noble State, the eminently soldierly qualities of whose people were conspicuously displayed. The people of Charleston for months had been irritated by the spectacle of a fortress held within their principal harbour as a standing menace against their peace and independence—built in part with their own money—its custody confided with their long consent to an agent who held no power over them other than such as they had themselves delegated for their own benefit, intended to be used by that agent for their own protection against foreign attack. How it was held out with persistent tenacity as a means of offence against them by the very Government which they had established for their own protection, is well known. They had beleaguered it for months, and felt entire confidence in their power to capture it, yet yielded to the requirements of discipline, curbed their impatience, submitted without complaint to the unaccustomed hardships, labours, and privations of a protracted siege, and when at length their patience was relieved by the signal for attack, and success had crowned their steady and gallant conduct, even in the very moment of triumph they evinced a chivalrous regard for the feelings of the brave but unfortunate officer who had been compelled to lower his flag.

All manifestations or exultations were checked in his presence. Their commanding general, with their cordial approval and the consent of his Government, refrained from imposing any terms that would wound the sensibility of the commander of the fort. He was permitted to retire with the honours of war, to salute his flag, to depart freely with all his command, and was escorted to the vessel on which he embarked with the highest marks of respect from those against whom his guns had so recently been directed.

Not only does every event connected with the siege reflect the highest honour on South Carolina, but the forbearance of her people and of this Government from making any harangue of a victory obtained under circumstances of such peculiar provocation, attest to the fullest extent the absence of any purpose beyond securing their own tranquility, and the sincere desire to avoid the calamities of war.

Scarcely had the President of the United States received intelligence of the failure of the scheme which he had devised for the reinforcement of Fort Sumter, when he issued the declaration of war against this Confederacy, which has prompted me to invoke you. In this extraordinary production, that high functionary affects total ignorance of the existence of an independent Government, which, possessing the entire and enthusiastic devotion of its people, is exercising its functions without question over seven sovereign States—over more than five millions of people—and over a territory whose area exceeds five hundred thousand square miles.

He terms sovereign States "combinations too powerful to be suppressed in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by law."

He calls for an army of seventy-five thousand men to act as the posse comitatus in aid of the process of the courts of justice in States where no courts exist, whose mandates and decrees are not cheerfully obeyed and respected by a willing people.

He avows that the first service to be assigned to the forces which have been called out will not be to execute the processes of courts, but to capture forts and strongholds situated within the admitted limits of this Confederacy, and garrisoned by its troops, and declares that this effort is intended to maintain the perpetuity of popular Government.

He concludes by commanding the persons composing the "combinations" aforesaid, to wit: the five millions of inhabitants of these States, to retire peaceably to their respective abodes within twenty days.

Apparently, contradictory as are the terms of this singular document, one point was unmistakably evident. The President of the United States calls for an army of 75,000 men, whose first service was to be to capture our forts. It was a plain declaration of war which I was not at liberty to disregard, because of my knowledge that under the Constitution of the United States the President was usurping a power granted exclusively to the Congress.

He is the sole organ of communication between that country and foreign powers. The law of nations did not permit me to question the authority of the Executive of a foreign nation to declare war against this Confederacy. Although I might have refrained from taking active measures for our defence, if the States of the Union had all imitated the action of Virginia, North Carolina, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, by denouncing it as an unconstitutional usurpation of power to which they refuse to respond, I was not at liberty to disregard the fact that many of the States seemed quite content to submit to the exercise of the powers assumed by the President of the United States, and were actively engaged in levying troops for the purpose indicated in the proclamation. Deprived of the aid of Congress, at the moment I was under the necessity of confining my action to a call on the States for volunteers for the common defence, in accordance with the authority you had confided to me before your adjournment.

I deemed it proper further to issue a proclamation, inviting applications from persons disposed to aid in our defence in private armed vessels on the high seas, to the end that preparations might be made for the immediate issue of letters of marque and reprisal, which you alone, under the constitution, have the power to grant.

I entertain no doubt that you will concur with me in the opinion, that in the absence of an organised navy, it will be eminently expedient to supply their place with private armed vessels, so happily styled by the publicists of the United States the militia of the sea, and so often and justly relied on by them as an efficient and admirable instrument of defensive warfare.

I earnestly recommend the immediate passage of a law authorising me to accept the numerous proposals already received.

I cannot close this review of the acts of the Government of the United States without referring to a proclamation issued by their President under date of the 19th ult., in which, after declaring that an insurrection has broken out in this Confederacy against the Government of the United States, he announces a blockade of all the ports of these States, and threatens to punish as pirates all persons who shall molest any vessel of the United States under letters of marque issued by this Government. Notwithstanding the authenticity of this proclamation, you will concur with me that it is hard to believe that it could have emanated from a President of the United States.

Its announcement of a mere paper blockade is so manifestly a violation of the law of nations, that it would seem incredible that it could have been issued by authority; and conceding this to be the case, so far as the Executive is concerned, it will be difficult to satisfy the people of these States that their late confederates will sanction its declarations—will determine to ignore the usages of civilised nations, and will inaugurate a war of extermination, on both sides, by treating as pirates open enemies acting under the authority of commissions issued by an organised Government.

If such proclamation was issued, it could only have been published under the sudden influence of passion, and we may rest assured that mankind will be spared the horrors of the conflict it seems to invite.

For the details of the administration of the different departments, I refer to the reports of the secretaries of each, which accompany this message.

The State Department has furnished the necessary instructions for those commissioners who have been sent to England, France, Russia, and Belgium, since your adjournment, to ask our recognition as a member of the family of nations, and to make with each of these powers treaties of amity and commerce.

Further steps will be taken to enter into like negotiations with the other European powers, in pursuance to resolutions passed at your last session.

Sufficient time has not yet elapsed since the departure of these commissioners for the receipt of any intelligence from them.

As I deem it desirable that commissioners or other diplomatic agents should also be sent at an early period to the independent American Powers south of our Confederacy, with all of whom it is our interest and earnest wish to maintain the most cordial and friendly relations, I suggest the expediency of making the necessary appropriations for that purpose.

Having been officially notified by the public authorities of the State of Virginia, that she had withdrawn from the Union and desired to maintain the closest political relations with us which it was possible at this time to establish, I commissioned the Hon. Alex. H. Stephens, Vice-President of the Confederate States, to represent this Government at Richmond.

I am happy to inform you that he has concluded a convention with the State of Virginia, by which that honoured Commonwealth, so long and justly distinguished among her sister States, and so dear to the hearts of thousands of her children in the Confederate States, has united her power and her fortunes with ours, and become one of us. This convention, together with the ordinance of Virginia adopting the Provisional Constitution of the Confederacy will be laid before you for your constitutional action.

I have satisfactory assurances from other of our late confederates that they are on the point of adopting similar measures; and I cannot doubt that, ere you shall have been many weeks in session, the whole of the slaveholding States of the late Union will respond to the call of honour and affection, and by uniting their fortune with ours, promote our common interests and secure our common safety.

In the Treasury Department, regulations have been devised and put into execution for carrying out the policy indicated in your legislation, on the subject of the navigation of the Mississippi River, as well as for the collection of the revenue on the frontier.

Free transit has been secured for vessels and merchandise passing through the Confederate States, and delay and inconvenience have been avoided as far as possible.

In organizing the revenue service for the various railways entering our territory, as fast as experience shall indicate the possibility of improvement in these regulations, no effort will be spared to free commerce from all unnecessary embarrassments and obstructions.

Under your act authorizing a loan, proposals were issued inviting subscriptions for five millions of dollars, and the call was answered by the prompt subscription of eight millions by our own citizens, and not a single bid was made under par.

The rapid development of the purpose of the President of the United States to invade our soil, capture our forts, blockade our ports, and wage war against us, induced me to direct that the entire subscription should be accepted. It will now become necessary to raise means to a much larger amount to defray the expenses of maintaining our independence and repelling invasion.

I invite your special attention to this subject, and the financial condition of the Government, with the suggestion of ways and means for the supply of the treasury, will be presented to you in a separate communication.

To the department of Justice you have confided not only the organization and supervision of all matters connected with the courts of justice, but also those connected with patents and with the bureau of the public printing.

Since your adjournment all the courts, with the exception of those of Mississippi and Texas, have been organized by the appointment of marshals and district attorneys, and are now prepared for the exercise of their functions. In the two States just named the gentlemen confirmed as judges declined to accept the appointments and no nomination have yet been made to fill the vacancies.

I refer you to the report of the Attorney-General, and concur in his recommendation for immediate legislation, especially on the subject of patent rights. Early provision should be made to secure to the subjects of foreign nations the full enjoyment of their property in valuable inventions, and to extend to our own citizens protection not only for their own inventions, but for such as have been assigned to them or may hereafter be assigned by persons not alien enemies.

The patent office business is much more extensive and important than had been anticipated. The applications for patents, although confined under the laws exclusively to citizens of our Confederacy, already average seventy per month, showing the necessity for the prompt organization of a bureau of patents.

The Secretary of War, in his report and accompanying documents, conveys full information concerning the forces, regular, volunteer, and provisional, raised and called for under the several acts of Congress—their organization and distribution; also, an account of the expenditures already made, and the farther estimates for the fiscal year ending on the 18th of February, 1862, rendered necessary by recent events.

I refer to the report, also, for a full history of the occurrences in Charleston harbour, prior to, and including the bombardment and reduction of Fort Sumter, and of the measures subsequently taken for common defence on receiving the intelligence of the declaration of war against us, made by the President of the United States.

There are now in the field at Charleston, Pensacola, Forts Morgan, Jackson, St. Philip, and Pulaski, 19,000 men, and 16,000 are now en route for Virginia. It is proposed to organize and hold in readiness for instant action, in view of the present exigencies of the country, an army of 100,000 men. If further force be needed the wisdom and patriotism of the Congress will be confidently appealed to for authority to call into the field additional numbers of our noble spirited volunteers, who are constantly tendering their services far in excess of our wants.

The operations of the Navy Department have been necessarily restricted by the fact that sufficient time has not yet elapsed for the purchase or construction of more than a limited number of vessels adapted to the public service. Two vessels have been purchased and manned, the Sumter and McRea, and are now being prepared for sea, at New Orleans, with all possible despatch. Contracts have also been made at that city, with two different establishments, for the casting of ordnance—cannon, shot and shell—with the view to encourage the manufacture of these articles, so indispensable for our defence, at as many points within our territory as possible. I call your attention to the recommendation of the Secretary for the establishment of a magazine and laboratory for the preparation of ordnance stores and the necessary appropriation required for that purpose.

Hitherto such stores have been prepared at the navy yards, and no appropriation was made at your last session for this object.

The Secretary also calls attention to the fact that no provision has been made for the payment of invalid pensions to our citizens. Many of these persons are advanced in life—they have no means of support—and by the secession of these States have been deprived of their claims against the Government of the United States.

I recommend the appropriation of the sum necessary to pay these pensioners as well as those of the army, whose claim can scarcely exceed 20,000 dollars per annum.

The Postmaster-General has already succeeded in organizing his department to such an extent as to be in readiness to assume the direction of our postal affairs on the occurrence of the contingency contemplated by the act of March 15, 1861, or even sooner if desired by Congress.

The various books and circulars have been prepared, and measures taken to secure supplies of blanks, postage stamps, stamped envelopes, mail bags, locks, keys, &c.

He presents a detailed classification and arrangement of the clerical force and asks for its increase.

An Auditor of the Treasury for this department is necessary, and a plan is submitted for the organization of his bureau.

The great number and magnitude of the accounts of this department require an increase of the clerical force in the accounting branch of the treasury. The revenues of this department are collected and distributed in modes peculiar to itself, and require a special bureau to secure a proper accountability in the administration of its finances.

I call your attention to the additional legislation required for this department—to the recommendation for changes in the law fixing the rates of postage on newspapers and sealed packages of certain kinds, and specially to the recommendation of the Secretary, in which I concur, that you provide at once for the assumption by him of the control of our entire postal service.

In the military organization of the States, provision is made for Brigadiers and Major-Generals, but in the army of the Confederate States the highest grade is that of Brigadier-General; hence it will, no doubt, sometimes occur that, where the troops of the Confederacy do duty with the militia, the General selected for the command and possessed of the views and the purposes of this Government, will be superseded by an officer of the militia, not having the same advantages.

To avoid contingencies in the least objectionable manner, I recommend that additional rank be given to the General of the Confederate army, and concurring in the policy of having but one grade of Generals in the army of the Confederacy, I recommend that the law of its organization be amended so that the grade be that of General.

To secure thorough military education, it is deemed essential that officers should enter upon the study of their profession at an early period of life, and have elementary instruction in a military school.

Until such school shall be established, it is recommended that cadets be appointed and attached to companies until they shall have attained the age, and shall have acquired the knowledge to fit them for the duties of lieutenants.

I also call your attention to an omission in the law organizing the army, in relation to military chaplains, and recommend that provision be made for their appointment.

In conclusion, I congratulate you on the fact that in every portion of our country there has been exhibited the most patriotic devotion to our common cause. Transportation companies have freely tendered the use of their lines for troops and supplies.

The Presidents of the railroads of the Confederacy, in company with others who control lines of communication with States that we soon hope to greet as sisters assembled in convention in this city, have not only reduced largely the rates heretofore demanded for mail service and conveyance of troops and munitions, but have voluntarily proffered to receive their compensation at their reduced rates, in the hands of the Confederacy, for the purpose of leaving all the resources of the Government at its own disposal for the common defence.

Requisitions for troops have been met with such alacrity, that the numbers tendering their services have, in every instance, greatly exceeded the demand. Men of the highest official and social position are serving as volunteers in the ranks. The gravity of age, the zeal of youth, rival each other in the desire to be foremost in the public defence, and though at no other point than the one heretofore noticed have they been stimulated by the excitement incident to actual engagement and the hope of distinction for individual deportment, they have borne, what for new troops is the most severe ordeal, patient toil, constant vigil, and all the exposure and discomfort of active service, with a resolution and fortitude such as to command the approbation and justify the highest expectation of their conduct when active valor shall be required in place of steady endurance.

A people thus united and resolute cannot shrink from any sacrifice which they may be called on to make, nor can there be a reasonable doubt of their final success, however long and severe may be the test of their determination to maintain their birth-right of freedom and equality as a trust which it is their first duty to transmit unblemished to their posterity.

A bounteous Providence cheers us with the promise of abundant crops.

The fields of grain which will, within a few weeks, be ready for the sickle, give assurance of the amplest supply of food, whilst the corn, cotton, and other staple productions of our soil afford abundant proof that up to this period the season has been propitious.

We feel that our cause is just and holy.

We protest solemnly, in the face of mankind, that we desire peace at any sacrifice, save that of honour.

In independence we seek no conquest, no aggrandizement, no cession of any kind from the States with which we have lately confederated. All we ask is to be let alone—that those who never held power over us shall not now attempt our subjugation by arms. This we will, we must resist, to the direct extremity.

The moment that this pretension is abandoned, the sword will drop from our grasp, and we shall be ready to enter into treaties of amity and commerce that cannot but be mutually beneficially.

So long as this pretension is maintained, with a firm reliance on that Divine Power which covers with its protection the just cause, we will continue to struggle for our inherent right to freedom, independence, and self government.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Montgomery, April 29, 1861.

—N. O. Picayune, May 2.

MESSAGE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

ACCOMPANYING THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN JUDGE JOHN A. CAMPBELL AND SECRETARY SEWARD, MAY 8.

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS,—In the Message addressed to you on the 29th ultimo, I referred to the course of conduct of the Government of the United States towards the Commissioners of this Government sent to Washington for the purpose of effecting, if possible, a peaceful adjustment of the pending difficulties between the two Governments. I also made allusion to “an intermediary, whose high position and character inspired the hope of success;” but I was not then at liberty to make my communication on the subject as specific as was desirable for a full comprehension of the whole subject. It is now, however, in my power to place before you other papers which I herewith address to you from them. You will perceive that the intermediary referred to was Hon. John A. Campbell, a Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, who made earnest efforts to promote the successful issue of the mission intrusted to our Commissioners, and by whom I was kept advised, in confidential communication, of the measures taken by him to secure so desirable a result. It is due to you, to him, and to history, that a narration of the occurrences with which he was connected should be made known, the more especially as it will be seen by the letters hereto appended, that the correctness and accuracy of the recital have not been questioned by the Secretary of State of the United States, to whom it was addressed.

I avail myself of this opportunity to correct an error in one of the statements made in my Message of the 29th of April. It is there recited that I was prompted to call you together in extraordinary session by reason of the declarations contained in the Proclamation of President Lincoln of the 15th of April. My Proclamation, conveying you, was issued on the 12th of April, and was prompted by the declaration of hostile purposes contained in the Message sent by the President to the Governor of South Carolina, on the 8th of April. As the Proclamation of President Lincoln of the 15th April repeated the same hostile intention in more specific terms, and on a much more extensive scale, it created a stronger impression on my mind, and led to the error above alluded to, and which, however unimportant, I desire to correct.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Montgomery, Wednesday, May 8, 1861.

Following is the correspondence alluded to in the Message:—
Washington City, Saturday, April 13, 1861.

Sir,—On the 15th March, ult., I left with Judge Crawford, one of the Commissioners of the Confederate States, a note in writing to the effect following:—

“I feel entire confidence that Fort Sumter will be evacuated in the next ten days. And this measure is felt as imposing great responsibility on the administration.

“I feel entire confidence that no measure changing the existing status, prejudicially to the Southern Confederate States, is at present contemplated.

“I feel an entire confidence that an immediate demand for an answer to the communication of the Commissioners will be productive of evil, and not of good. I do not believe that it ought at this time to be pressed.”

The substance of this statement I communicated to you the same evening by letter. Five days elapsed, and I called with a telegram from General Beauregard, to the effect that Sumter was not evacuated, but that Major Anderson was at work making repairs.

The next day, after conversing with you, I communicated to Judge Crawford, in writing, that the failure to evacuate Sumter was not the result of bad faith, but was attributable to causes consistent with the intention to fulfil the engagement; and that as regarded Pickens, I should have notice of any design to alter the existing status there. Mr. Justice Nelson was present at these conversations, three in number, and I submitted to him each of my written communications to Judge Crawford, and informed Judge Crawford that they had his (Judge Nelson's) sanction. I gave you, on the 22nd of March, a substantial copy of the statement I had made on the 15th.

The 30th of March arrived, and at that time a telegram came from Governor Pickens inquiring concerning Colonel Lamont, whose visit to Charleston he supposed had a connection with the proposed evacuation of Fort Sumter.

I left that with you, and was to have an answer the following Monday (1st April). On the 1st of April I received from you the statement in writing, “I am satisfied the Government will not undertake to supply Fort Sumter without giving notice to Governor Pickens.” The words “I am satisfied” were for me to use as expressive of confidence in the remainder of the declaration.

The proposition, as originally prepared, was, “The President may desire to supply Sumter, but will not do so,” &c., and your verbal explanation was that you did not believe any such attempt would be made, and that there was no design to reinforce Sumter.

There was a departure here from the pledges of the previous month, but with the verbal explanation I did not consider it a matter then to complain of—I simply stated to you that I had that assurance previously.

On the 7th of April, I addressed you a letter on the subject of the alarm that the preparations by the Government had created, and asked you if the assurances I had given were well or ill founded. In respect to Sumter, your reply was, “Faith as to Sumter, fully kept—wait and see.” In the morning's paper I read, “An authorized messenger from President Lincoln informed Governor Pickens and General Beauregard, that provisions will be sent to Fort Sumter peaceably, or otherwise by force.”

This was the 8th of April, at Charleston, the day following your last assurance, and is the evidence of the full faith I was invited to wait for and see. In the same paper I read that intercepted despatches disclose the fact that Mr. Fox, who had been allowed to visit Major Anderson, on the pledge that his purpose was pacific, employed his opportunity to devise a plan for supplying the fort by force, and that this plan had been adopted by the Washington Government, and was in process of execution.

My recollection of the date of Mr. Fox's visit carries it to a day in March. I learn he is a near connection of a member of the Cabinet.

My connection with the Commissioners and yourself was superinduced by a conversation with Justice Wilson. He informed me of your strong disposition in favour of peace, and that you were oppressed with a demand of the Commissioners of the Confederate States for a reply to their first letter, and that you desired to avoid, if possible, at that time. I told him I might, perhaps, be of some service in arranging the difficulty. I came to your office entirely at his request, and without the knowledge of the Commissioners. Your depression was obvious to both Judge Nelson and myself. I was gratified at the character of the counsels you were desirous of pursuing, and much impressed with your observation that a civil war might be prevented by the success of my mediation. You read a letter of Mr. Weed, to show how irksome and responsible the withdrawal of troops from Fort Sumter was. A portion of my communication to Judge Crawford on the 15th of March was founded upon these remarks, and the pledge to evacuate Sumter is less forcible than the words you employed. Those words were, “Before this letter reaches you (a proposed letter by me to President Davis) Sumter will have been evacuated.”

The Commissioners who received those communications conclude they have been abused and overreached. The Montgomery Government hold the same opinion. The Commissioners have supposed that my communications were with you, and upon the hypothesis prepared to arraign you before the country in connection with the President. I placed a peremptory prohibition upon this, as being contrary to the terms of my communications with them. I pledged myself to them to communicate information upon what I considered as the best authority, and they were to confide in the ability of myself, aided by Judge Nelson, to determine upon the credibility of my informant.

I think no candid man who will read over what I have written, and consider for a moment what is going on at Sumter, will agree that the equivocating conduct of the Administration, as measured and interpreted in connection with these promises, is the proximate cause of the great calamity.

I have a profound conviction that the telegrams of the 8th of April, of General Beauregard, and of the 10th of April, of General Walker, the Secretary of War, can be referred to nothing else than their belief that there has been systematic duplicity practised upon them throughout. It is under an oppressive sense of the weight of this responsibility, that I submit to you these things for your explanation.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. CAMPBELL.

Associate Justice of the Supreme Court.

Hon. WM. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

DESPATCHES.

To L. P. WALKER, Secretary of War:—

An authorized messenger from President Lincoln just informed Governor Pickens and myself that provisions will be sent to Fort Sumter peaceably, or otherwise by force.

General P. G. T. BEAUREGARD:—

If you have no doubt of the authorized character of the agent who communicated to you the intention of the Washington Government to supply Fort Sumter by force, you will at once demand its evacuation; and if this is refused, proceed in such manner as you may determine to reduce it.

WASHINGTON CITY, Saturday, April 20, 1861.

Sir,—I enclose you a letter corresponding very nearly with one I addressed to you one week ago (13th April), to which I have not had any reply. The letter is simply one of inquiry in reference to facts concerning which I think I am entitled to an explanation. I have not adopted any opinion in reference to them which may not be modified by explanation, nor have I affirmed in that letter, nor do I in this, any conclusion of my own unfavourable to your integrity in the whole transaction.

All that I have said, and mean to say, is, that an explanation is due from you to myself. I will not say what I shall do in case this request is not complied with; but I am justified in saying, that I shall feel at liberty to place these letters before any person who is entitled to ask an explanation of myself.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. CAMPBELL.

Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Hon. W. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

No reply has been made to this letter.

April 24, 1861.

Montgomery, Ala., May 7.

Sir:—I submit to you two letters that were addressed by me to Hon. Wm. H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, that contain an explanation of the nature and result of an intervention by me in the intercourse of the Commissioners of the Confederate States with that officer. I considered that I could perform no duty in which the entire American people, whether of the Federal Union or of the Confederate States, were more interested than that of promoting the counsels and the policy that had for their object the preservation of peace. This motive dictated my intervention. Beside the interview referred to in these letters I informed the Assistant Secretary of State of the United States (not being able to see the Secretary), on the 11th April, ultimo, of the existence of a telegram of that date from General Beauregard to the Commissioners, in which he informed the Commissioners that he had demanded the evacuation of Sumter, and, if refused, he would proceed to reduce it. On the same day, I had been told that President Lincoln had said that none of the vessels sent to Charleston were war vessels, and that force was not to be used in the attempt to supply the fort. I had no means of testing the accuracy of this information, but offered that, if the information was accurate, I would send a telegram to the authorities at Charleston, and that it might prevent the disastrous consequences of a collision at that fort between the opposing forces. It was the last effort that I would make to avert the calamity of war. The Assistant Secretary promised to give the matter attention, but I had no other intercourse with him or any other person on the subject, nor have I had any reply to the letters submitted to you.

Very respectfully,

JOHN A. CAMPBELL.

GENERAL DAVIS,

President of the Confederate States.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEED AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rumbold-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C. S. A.
Represented by
Jos. T. Robinson & Co.,
3, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS,
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on most liberal terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES,
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: Houghton, New Bond-street.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful picture of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising pamphlet, our Southern editors can be educated
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION
FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRES INTERNATIONAL DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.
The Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress
International de Bienfaissence, will take place in London from the 5th to the 14th of June.

The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.
The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon, in Burlington House.

A series of Lectures will be given during the period
of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Admission Tickets, price One Guinea each (containing to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to
all the Meetings of the Association and Congress,
and to the Soirées, &c.

Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C., and 12, Old Bond-street, W.

As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions to a special fund.
For every £5 subscribed to this Fund, subscribers
are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City
Office, Guildhall, E.C., by Messrs. Bannister, Jovier, and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Western Bank, Lothbury, E.C.; the Union Bank, Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kemball,
and Co., 4, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George
Ledger, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.

GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.,
and Chairman of Executive Committee.

A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.

G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO and BRITISH COLUMBIA, via Panama—Steamers from
Southampton on the 2nd and 17th of each month.
THROUGH BILLS OF LADING for goods, &c., are
issued by the ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY, in connection with Messrs. Wells, Fargo,
and Co., of San Francisco. Goods should be sent to Southampton, addressed to the care of a shipping
agent there. Jewellery received in London.

For further particulars apply to Captain Vincent,
Superintendent, or to R. T. REEF, Sec.
Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 55, Moorgate-
street, E.C.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Elysees—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under twenty.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

"The Human Face Divine." Eyes, Ears, Nose, Lips, Mouth, Teeth, Chin, Neck, Head, Hair,
Hand, Feet, Temperament, Complexion, Resemblances, Capabilities, &c., in the

NEW ILLUSTRATED SELF-IN-STRUCTOR IN PHRENOLOGY, PHYSIO-LOGY, and PHYSIOGNOMY, with 160 Portraits.
Free by post 2s.—Address Fowler and Wells, 147,
Strand, W.C.

ENGLISH COMMERCIAL
HOTEL, No. 59, LAURENCE-ST. HONORE, 17, RUE MABLEYNE, PARIS.—Excellent accommodation at reasonable charges. Centrally located near the Champs Elysees and Boulevard des Halles.
MRS. BROWN, Proprietress.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees has resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice- President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE...... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profit for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 609,525 70
Amount of Profit for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 865,420 38
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrip of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Fouks.
G. Arnold.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. F. Voorhier.
D. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,576 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets 30th April, 1861..... 1,042,959 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 10th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and
land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primage.

PARTIAL PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, any liquor, oil of vitrol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package, containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcel, the contents of which are of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to VI. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havana. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crown-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—June 5, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 7.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 12, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	97
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET	99
Liverpool Letter	99
Manchester Letter	99
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Latest from New Orleans	100
Further list of killed, wounded, and missing at the Battle of Shiloh	100
Private Letters and Extracts	101
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Washington	102
Paris	102
LEADERS—
An Opportune Moment for Pacification	104
The Evacuation of Corinth	104
The Errors of the Past	105
The Productiveness of the South	105
Editorials	106
THE SOUTH IN THE SOCIAL SCIENCE CONGRESS ..	106
REVIEW OF BOOKS—
A Historical Parallel, No. IV.	108
SOUTHERN PROSPECTS	109
SEIZURE OF THE BERMUDA AND CIRCASSIAN ..	110
ADVERTISEMENTS	112

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

IN our last issue, in commenting on Colonel Kenley's defeat, we observed, "We have no details at present, but in the course of a few mails we shall know more about it, and then 'the driving out the Federal Colonel Kenley's command' will turn out to be an important victory." We were true prophets. The affair at Front Royal resulted in Colonel Kenley being killed, and nearly all his troops cut to pieces or made prisoners. The Northerners confess to the loss of one gun. The remnant of the troops fled towards Winchester in the wildest disorder. The correspondent of the New York World describes the affair as "a miniature Bull Run stampede." General Banks met the fugitives, and entered Winchester with them. It is reported that a few hours previously a small body of Federals, together with their baggage, had been captured in New Town, about eight miles from Winchester. The body-guard of General Banks was engaged in smearing the bridge across Lader Creek with tar, when the Confederates made a sudden swoop, and killed or captured all but five of them. We must remind our readers that our summary of Federal disasters is compiled from Federal accounts, and that it is likely they are toned down, whilst it is quite certain they are not exaggerated. We will quote the letter of the correspondent of the New York World, in reference to the destruction of cavalry, and the seizure of ammunition on this, the second day of General Banks' rout.

The rebel cavalry came up, and more than 100 waggons were taken possession of by the enemy. The cavalry which were behind have suffered much more than I am able now definitely to speak of. They were ordered at daylight, when the infantry and artillery and baggage had started toward Winchester, to make the reconnaissance to Woodstock, to see if anything could be learned of the anticipated attack in the rear. They were cut off by the cavalry of the enemy, and unable to return. More particulars in regard to this I will forward soon. Company A, however, of the Vermont Cavalry were all lost, captured, or killed, except Captain Platt, his lieutenant, and half-a-dozen men, who made good their escape from the toils of the enemy most creditably. Major Collins is among the captured.

The next day, Sunday, May 25, the Confederates, under the command of Generals Jackson and Ewells, attacked General Banks, and drove the Federals out of Winchester. Arms and all things that impeded flight were flung away by the soldiers, who were actively pursued, and found no rest until they had crossed the Potomac at Williamsport; leaving the Confederates in undisputed possession of the Valley of Shenandoah.

The Confederate booty in military stores was very large. We have no accounts of the killed, wounded, and captured, but the Federal loss must have been heavy. According to Northern accounts, "Lieutenant-Colonel Brown, 28th New York, is said to have been killed; Colonel Knipe, 46th Pennsylvania, wounded and taken prisoner; Colonel Murphy, 29th Pennsylvania, killed; and many others." When the truth is known, the "many others" will be found to include a very long list of casualties.

This victory is not only strategically important, but it will produce a great moral effect. It will teach the sane Northern public that the South is not yet crippled, much less conquered, by Federal efforts. Following, too, so closely the naval victory on the Mississippi and the victory at Fort Darling, it affords a striking proof of the admirable tactics of the Southern leaders, and of the heroism and devoted patriotism of the Southern army.

The remnant of General Banks' army must have a vivid recollection of the want of Union feeling in Virginia, and the bitter hostility of the Virginians to the Yankees—the ruthless invaders and cruel spoilers of their homes and country. The correspondent of the New York Times writes that the people with whom he lodged in Winchester were "rejoicing that Jackson was again coming to free them from the Northern yoke." And further that, "while retreating through Winchester, women from the houses opened fire of pistols upon our soldiers, and killed a great many of them."

There was a complete panic at Washington, and, indeed, throughout the North, when the news became known. It was supposed the Confederates would march on the capital. Mr. Lincoln issued a proclamation taking military possession of all the railroads in the United States for the transport of troops. We may observe, that if the Confederates had marched on Washington, the new loaves called for by Mr. Lincoln, and his appropriation of the railroads, would not have impeded their advance. Of course, the chance of getting up a little sensation in New York was not lost. The New York 7th Regiment "marched down Broadway, flags flying and drums beating, amid the enthusiastic plaudits of an immense crowd that lined the thoroughfare, and of a crowd of ladies equally enthusiastic, who filled every window and balcony commanding a view of their march," just as it did a year ago. It is very pleasant to make a demonstration at the cry of "Wolf, wolf!" but it will not be so agreeable if the wolf should come. The Governor of Massachusetts, who had been a little refractory at the first demand for more men, became tractable when he heard that Mr. Lincoln was nervous about the safety of Washington.

The excitement in Baltimore was so intense that it nearly resulted in a conflict. The respectable classes are friendly to the cause of Secession; the rowdy mob is Unionist. When the news of Colonel Kenley's defeat was known, the Secessionists openly expressed their satisfaction at the punishment of Marylanders who had been traitors to the South. The further intelligence of the rout of General Banks increased the feverish excitement. The mob became angry at the joy of the Secessionists. A friend to the South was seized, a rope placed round his neck, and but for the timely interference of the authorities, he would have been hanged. The Secessionists then harricaded their houses and defied the mob.

The Confederates spare no pains to save the aged and women and children from the horrors of warfare. The Virginia Legislature has appropriated 200,000 dollars to remove the women, children, and decrepid persons from Richmond to a place of safety.

The state of affairs before Richmond remained unaltered at the last advices. The Federals were preparing for an engagement, but the Confederates only fight when they can do so with advantage, and not to oblige the enemy.

It was reported by refugees, at Norfolk, that the Confederates were 200,000 strong at Richmond. The reports of refugees, especially after being edited by Mr. Stanton, are not particularly reliable.

We hear, per Great Eastern "that a portion of General Banks' division has advanced beyond Martinsburg, and recaptured Front Royal, taking upwards of 150 prisoners." The capture is possible, for it is likely the Confederates did not attempt to hold the place. The "upwards of 150 prisoners" is merely one of Mr. Stanton's flourishes.

We have been favoured with the following extract from a letter addressed to a Liverpool firm by its New York correspondent, which was received per Niagara. We give it without comment:—

I never meddle with politics, but I am told privately that the Federals have been defeated before Richmond, and the Confederates will probably be in possession of Washington within twenty days. The Confederates have taken the offensive, are most unquestionably far better officered than the Federals, and that the latter are quaking. Federal papers must not be believed, though even they admit of defeat before Richmond.

Reinforcements are still leaving New York; four regiments left this morning.

New York, May 26, 1862.

Despite the reported advance of General Banks, we are told "the Confederates still threaten the Federal lines at Harper's Ferry."

The evacuation of Corinth has been so often reported that its happening does not create any surprise. General Halleck has evidently been befooled and out-generaled. The New York telegram, under date May 30, contained the following paragraph: "General Halleck reports that his position does not warrant his risking anything, hence he moves by regular approaches, fortifying as he goes along. The Federals were expected to open an attack on the 29th." Well, after making roads and erecting fortifications, he arrives at Corinth to find that the Confederates had retired. All public property and stores are destroyed. Where the Confederates have gone to is not known to the Federals. General Halleck officially reports "that the accounts are conflicting as to the enemy's movements, but he believes them to be in strong force on the Federal left flank, four or five miles south of Corinth, near the Mobile and Ohio railroad." And the same telegram states: "Nothing at all definite has been ascertained as to where the Confederates have retreated from Corinth." That is, General Beauregard changed his position without giving the enemy any idea of his movements.

As an amusing example of official bungling, we direct attention to the following summary, per Great Eastern:—

General Halleck telegraphed as follows from Corinth, May 30:—

The enemy's position in front of Corinth was exceedingly strong. He cannot occupy a stronger position in his flight. This morning he destroyed an immense amount of public and private property—stores, provisions, waggons, tents, &c. For miles out of the town the roads are filled with arms, haversacks, &c., which have been thrown away by his fleeing troops.

A large number of prisoners and deserters have been captured. Their number is estimated by General Pope at 2000.

Beauregard evidently distrusts his army, or he would have defended so strong a position. His troops are generally much discouraged and demoralized.

In all the engagements for the last few days their resistance has been slight.

For miles out of town "the roads are filled" (we would suggest, as an improvement, "piled up mountains high") with arms and haversacks thrown away by troops who had been leisurely destroying the public property at Corinth before evacuating the place, and who were not being pursued by the enemy. The Southerners are not such wags as to amuse themselves with the game of Bull Run at the expense of arms and baggage. Is it not also rather, just a trifle, curious that though "for miles out of town the roads are filled with arms," General Halleck is doubtful about the road taken by his enemy? Is it not passing strange that though General Beauregard's "troops are generally much discouraged and demoralized," General Halleck should not have been informed by deserters of their intending flight before the evacuation of Corinth? Is it not marvellous that General Halleck, being so near to the Confederate entrenchments that he occupied them a few hours after the withdrawal of General Beauregard, did not pursue the troops who were throwing away their arms and haversacks, and whose resistance had been slight, "in all the engagements of the last few days"? Perhaps Mr. Stanton, like the people who regularly render false returns of their income, and then send conscience money to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is troubled with an uneasy conscience, and so words his fabrications that if anyone is deceived by them, the dupe can only blame his own shortsightedness.

It is also worthy of remark, that though nothing was known on the 1st of June "as to where the Confederates had retreated from Corinth," yet on the 31st of May we were definitely informed that "the Confederates retreated from Corinth to Grand Junction, and then southward."

General Butler has succeeded in making himself pre-eminently infamous. Not contented with suppressing a newspaper, interfering with the offices of religion, stopping the circulation of the only available currency, and generally governing with "the utmost military rigour," he has issued the following proclamation:—

Head-quarters Department of the Gulf, May 15.

As the officers and soldiers of the United States have been subject to repeated insults from the women calling themselves "ladies of New Orleans," in return for the most scrupulous non-interference and courtesy on our part, it is ordered that hereafter, when any females shall by word, gesture, or movement, insult or show contempt for any officer or soldier of the United States, she shall be regarded and held liable to be treated as a woman of the town plying her avocation.

BUTLER, Major-General.

By command of Geo. C. Strong, A.A.G.

General Beauregard thus refers to the abominable document:—

Men of the South, shall our mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters be thus outraged by the infamously soldiers of the North, to whom is given the right to treat at their pleasure the ladies of the South as common harlots? Arouse, friends, and drive back from our soil these infamous invaders of our homes and disturbers of our family ties.

G. T. BEAUREGARD, General-Commanding.

The Federal press can hardly credit the disgraceful proceeding:—

The New York Times says, if the Federal commander has issued any such order, he should be forthwith dismissed from the army. It would be a disgrace to the service, an infamous outrage upon the morality and decency of the country and the age.

The New York Herald, writing before the report was confirmed, observes:—

In the absence of any official information upon the subject, we take the liberty of doubting that General Butler has ever issued such an order.

But General Butler has issued the proclamation, and by so doing, disgraced the service to which he belongs. Never in any age, or in any state of society, was such a degrading, fiend-like act committed.

The seizure of the Messrs. Hope and Co.'s money is confirmed, as well as the violation of the French and Spanish Consulates. The New York Commercial Advertiser excuses the act on account of the possible illegal conduct of the consuls. General Butler had better confine himself to tyrannizing over the inhabitants of New Orleans and insulting women, for insulting the consuls of European Powers is rather a dangerous game.

General Butler has also done his best to pick a quarrel with England. He has imprisoned some British subjects, upon the ground that they have sent arms and accoutrements to General Beauregard. The British Consul has interfered, but the matter was not decided when the mail left.

The following paragraph occurs in General Butler's proclamations:—"The United States have sent land and naval forces to New Orleans to fight and subdue rebellious armies. They find substantially only fugitive masses, runaway property-owners, a whisky-drinking mob, and starving citizens, with their wives and children. It is our duty to call back the first, punish the second, root out the third, and feed and protect the last." Finding "substantially runaway" property-holders, is rather a pretty "bull."

The Confederates have not evacuated Fort Wright. Advices to the 27th state that the Confederates have been largely reinforced at that place. Two transports had arrived from Memphis, bringing two regiments of infantry and three batteries of artillery. Part of this force landed at Fort Randolph, while the remainder occupy the Arkansas shore, nearly opposite the foot of Island No. 33, where they are reported to be throwing up batteries.

Commodore Tatnall, late commander of the Merrimac officially reports that the reason of her destruction was that the pilots assured him they could take the Merrimac, with a draught of eighteen feet, to within fourteen miles of Richmond. Confiding in these assurances, Tatnall ordered the Merrimac to be lightened and run up James River, for the protection of Richmond. When the Merrimac had been lightened so as to render her unfit for action, the pilots declared their inability to carry her with a draught of eighteen feet above Jamestown Flats, up to which point the Federals occupied the shore on both sides. The Merrimac, at that time, was not in a condition for battle with an enemy of equal force, and the Federal force was overwhelming. It was, therefore, resolved to destroy her.

Maryland is becoming extremely troublesome. Judge Carmichael, of Talbot County, Maryland, has been arrested on a charge of treason. The Federal officials arrested him at the Court-house. Carmichael resisted, and kicked the officer, who thereupon drew his sword and struck the judge on the head. A scene of disorder ensued, ending in Carmichael and three citizens being taken to Fort M'Henry. Arresting a judge in his Court-house, and striking him on the head with a sword, is a startling incident, even in these times. In semi-barbarous countries the office of the judge is respected, and the court of justice deemed inviolable. Was Judge Carmichael arrested at the Court-house for the purpose of teaching the mob not to pay the slightest respect to law and order?

We referred last week to a dispute in Washington in reference to the Fugitive Slave law. It arose between Marshal Lamon and General Wadsworth, for the custody of a fugitive slave who sought refuge in that city. Marshal Lamon, in accordance with the ordinary law of the United States, whose officer he is, decided upon giving up the slave to his owner, on proof of the ownership; but General Wadsworth, in military command of the district, decided that this could not be done, unless he, the General, were satisfied that the owner was a loyal man and no rebel. Hence the dispute, which threatened a breach of the peace, and is not yet decided.

The report that General Burnside had occupied Raleigh, North Carolina, is not true.

General Wool finds the people of Norfolk quite intractable. He has prohibited the publication of the Norfolk Daybook, and stopped the trade of the place. Yet he cannot elicit any Union feeling.

The "obstinacy" of the "rebels" is engaging the attention of the Federal Congress. We take the following from the New York Herald:—

THE CONTUMACIOUSNESS OF DEFEATED REBELS. — Mr. Howe (rep.), of Wis., introduced a bill to aid in restoring order and preserve the public peace within insurrectionary districts. He referred to the answer of the Mayor of New Orleans to Captain Farragut, and of the Mayor of Norfolk to General Wool, and to various letters showing a lack of Union feeling at the South, and treason swaggers everywhere, and their armies recruited by decrepit old men, unchristian ministers, and malignant women. Treason shouts where it can no longer fight, and loyalty implores where it ought to command. The bill was referred.

We could not wish for a more forcible admission of the unanimity of the South.

With regard to "wicked ministers," we notice that the Maryland Episcopal Convention have excluded from their committee nearly all the members who remain loyal to the Federal Government.

The Yankees are fond of confiscating, and if they could, they would confiscate "all creation." The House of Representatives has offered to pass a Bill confiscating the property of men who shall hereafter hold office under the Confederate Government, or who shall not lay down their arms within sixty days after proclamation duly made by the President.

According to the New York Herald, Generals Huger and Holmes have given up 1400 Federal prisoners. We may gather from this that Federal captures have been numerous.

The people of Savannah are anxious to defend their city against the enemy. The Common Council has passed the following resolution:—

Whereas a communication has been received from the Commanding General, stating that he will defend this city to the last extremity; and

Whereas the members of Council unanimously approve the determination of the Commanding General; therefore be it

Resolved, that Council will render all the aid that is in its power to sustain the General, and to carry out his laudable determination.

A Petersburg paper reports that, on the 19th ult., eighteen of the Monitor's crew went ashore at City Point, and were surprised by the Confederates. Nine were made prisoners, and the rest, who reached the boat and pulled for the vessel, were shot. Eight were killed, and the other lost an arm. It is evident that the Monitor and her crew had better keep at a respectful distance from the shore.

General Beauregard's official report of the Battle of Shiloh, according to Northern telegrams, gives 1700 killed, 8000 wounded, and 1000 missing. This includes the two days.

The Federal fleet has captured Natchez, on the Mississippi. No resistance was offered.

The people of Western Tennessee are again taking action. A large force has been assembled to march upon Hickman.

The Times of yesterday remarks, in reference to the article on "mediation," which we publish in another part of our impression:—

The return to France of the French Secretary of Legation at Washington had given rise to conjectures, and the article on "mediation," in the Paris Constitutionnel of this morning, may possibly have been inspired by the information brought home by that personage.

The same journal says:—"The commercial advices from New York this week show that, although the ignorant confidence of the multitude in the paper issues of the Government was still almost undiminished, many of the more shrewd financiers were preparing for the approach of the inevitable crisis. All the hopes of a revival of business from the removal of the blockade of New Orleans appear to have been disappointed. 'There is,' it is said, 'not a sign of our being able to induce the inhabitants to trade.'

The Independence Belge published the following on Tuesday:—"The Constitutionnel has a second leader on the necessity of an European mediation in America. The arguments are pretty nearly the same as before, and we should not mention again this continued effort, if it were not that strong rumours in Paris connect together the publications of the semi-official sheet upon the American question, with the arrival of important despatches, kept entirely secret up to this time, from M. Mercier, French Minister at Washington. "It is repeatedly stated, too, in some well informed circles, that negotiations have been reopened between France and England, with a view to a prompt and decided interference. It is affirmed, moreover, that the two Powers have come to an agreement upon the principle of interfering, and that they are engaged now solely upon the actual time and the extent of that intervention."

Semi-official Washington despatches say that news dated Orizaba, May 9, had been received, stating that 10,000 Mexicans had attacked the French troops three leagues from the city of Mexico, and that the French had been defeated, with a loss of 500 men. The British Minister had, it was reported, concluded a treaty, by which all the difficulties between Mexico and England were settled. The New York papers publish Mexican news, via San Francisco to the 8th May, according to which the French had commenced retreating from Puebla towards Amesa. An official despatch from Ignacio Megia to Juarez, dated Puebla, 8th of May, announces the retreat of the French.

We give the following item, brought by the Niagara, without comment.

The Halifax Express, of the 28th ult., contains the following:—

It is currently reported in this city that his Excellency Vice-Admiral Milne has received a telegraphic despatch from Lord Lyons, her Britannic Majesty's minister at Washington, requesting that none of the ships of war under his command leave the station until further orders. We cannot, of course, vouch for the authenticity of the foregoing, but it is at least very far from being improbable.

The Northern press omits no opportunity of abusing and attacking the Emperor of the French. The New York Herald, in commenting on the affairs of Mexico, observes:—"Now civil war is raging within our own borders, and European despots may safely exercise their brief authority. The day of settlement, however, will come, and sooner, perhaps, than Europe imagines."

The following most important announcement was made in the Patrie yesterday evening:—"It is asserted that negotiations will be shortly opened at London for the drawing up of mediatory proposals to be made simultaneously by England and France to America."

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, June 11, 1862.

Our market continued steady during the latter half of last week, with a daily business doing of about 8000 bales, based upon 12½ for Middling Orleans. Speculations chiefly ran upon Surats "to arrive," and large purchases were made on London account at advancing prices, the transactions on some days being supposed to reach 10,000 bales, or more. On Monday the Niagara's news were to hand, and their tenor was decidedly in favour of the market; the retreat of Banks from the valley of the Shenandoah showed unlooked for strength on the Confederate side, and the whole scope of the news was most adverse to the chance of a settlement or the renewal of cotton shipments from the South. An active demand in consequence sprung up, at fully ½d. per lb. advance, and the market was assisted by the arrival of large orders to purchase for the continent: 2000 bales of Saw-ginned Dharwars were bought that day for Russia, and "to arrive," a very extensive business was also transacted at higher prices. The sales on the spot were about 12,000 bales, and probably as much afloat. On Tuesday the export demand was very active, running more upon American cotton, and about 3000 bales of that class were said to have been bought chiefly for Havre. Some purchases were also made for New York, where Middling is now quoted 31 to 32 cents; the total sales reached 14,000 bales, at a further advance of ¼d., while "to arrive" large operations also took place at a similar advance. To-day the Great Eastern's news is to hand, reporting the evacuation of Corinth, which is rather disappointing to Southern sympathizers, and seems to indicate Confederate weakness in that quarter; but the tone of our market continues good, with sales of 13,000 bales, closing at an advance of ¼ to ½d. for the week, both in American and Surats cotton. Middling Orleans is worth 13½d. to 1½d.; Fair Dhollerahs 8½d. to 9½d.; Omrawuttce 8½d. to 9d.; Comptah 8½d.; Broach 10d., and Sawginned Dharwar 10½d. In cotton to arrive 9½ is now paying for the first shipments of Broach; 9d. has been paid for February shipment of Omrawuttce, and 8½d. is the current price for April and May shipments of Dhollerahs and Omrawuttce. For early shipments of Dharwars 10½d. is offered.

It is important to note that in the last week or two a decided change has passed over the public mind in reference to the position and prospects of the cotton trade, and in connection with this it is curious to observe the fluctuations in public opinion on this subject since first the gravity of the crisis became apparent. During the Autumn of last year intense anxiety was felt on the subject of cotton supply, the press was crowded with discussions respecting it, and appalling consequences were predicted from a suspension of our supplies from the South, even to the present time. Amid a fever of speculative excitement, prices were run up 4d. in the four months ending October, and middling Orleans was quoted 12d. By the end of the year most persons looked for 15d., and by June, if the war continued, it was generally thought the stock would be on the verge of exhaustion, and prices at a fabulous range, certainly not below 18d. for American, and 12d. for the medium qualities of Surats. But the panic caused by the "Trent affair" gave a rude shock to the confidence of holders. Still, on its settlement, the expectation revived that these excessive prices must soon be reached. Middling Orleans was thought a safe investment at 13½d. on the 9th January, and the only question raised by the speculator was the duration of the war, for it was not doubted that, so long as it went on, prices would each month attain a higher level. But these expectations were completely baffled by the strange inertia of Manchester. The surfeited markets of the world refused to respond to the advance in the raw material, business came almost to a dead-lock, spinners and manufacturers found the outlets for their production choked up, and finding their position ruinously bad, threw their mills on hal time, and withdrew as far as possible from the cotton market. Then one political canard after another kept the public in a continual state of ferment. First European intervention was predicted, then the financial exhaustion of the North, afterwards the collapse of the South, and latterly, the re-opening of trade by the Federal occupation of the Southern ports. One panic after another succeeded on these reports; so anxious was the public to see a settlement that it clutched at every straw that afforded a hope; attention was almost withdrawn from the gradual approach of the cotton famine; supplies lasted so much better than was expected, that the former anxiety on that score subsided, and the only point that engaged the public mind was the hope of an early release of the Southern crop.

But during the long interval of suspense, the ground has been clearing for another course of speculative excitement. The reserves both of cotton and goods have been gradually melting away. The tide of demand is now returning in Manchester, and cannot be again staved off, for it springs out of the absolute wants of consumers. But the prospect of receiving supplies from America is more remote than ever, and there is now no reasonable probability of seeing American cotton arrive here in any quantity before the end of the year. We are therefore shut up by the necessity of measuring our scanty stock by the demand that must be made on it, and the public are awaking to its alarming insufficiency.

The following statement may be given as the approximate estimate of the utmost supply that can be reckoned on this year for all Europe, assuming that nothing is received from America; for the small supplies that may be obtained from the South during the continuance of the war, all will be wanted to meet the urgent wants of the Northern spinners.

	Bales.
Stock in Liverpool, about	290,000
do London, do	54,000
do Havre, do	38,000
do All other Continental ports, about	10,000
do Held by English Spinners	40,000
Total Stock existing in Europe	432,000
Bombay cotton afloat for all Europe	250,000
Madras, and other East Indian	20,000
Shipments from Bombay from May 12, to Sept. 1, estimated same as last year ..	300,000
Shipments of Madras, &c., say	40,000
Imports of Brazil, Egyptian, &c., into Europe, about the same as last year	125,000
Total supply.....	1,167,000

Now of this aggregate we cannot assign less than one-third to the Continent, which is considerably below its relative proportion as compared with former years—for previous to this crisis its consumption was fully 30,000 bales per week, against 50,000 in Great Britain, or ⅔ of the total. Nor is it possible to suppose that the stock in this country, including Liverpool, London, and the holding of spinners, can fall below 100,000 bales, so that only

678,000 bales would be available for home consumption as follows:—

	Bales.
Total supply of cotton for Europe	1,167,000
Less one-third for Continent	389,000
Less stock at end of year	100,000
	488,000

Total available for home consumption..... 678,000 being, for a period of twenty-nine weeks, fully 23,000 bales per week; but the great bulk of this, consisting of Surat and long-stapled cotton, it is only equal in weight to 20,000 bales per week as compared with the full consumption of 50,000 bales per week before the crisis, or a supply equal to 2-5ths of the full requirements of the country. We cannot suppose that the demand on Manchester can be restricted for the next six months to only 2-5ths of its former dimensions, without a very great advance in prices. At present, quotations are not 20 per cent. above the average of ordinary seasons, and it is doubtful whether an advance of 100 per cent. would permanently keep the consumption of cotton goods down to half its former rate;—more than this need not be said to show the extraordinary position of the market.

MANCHESTER, June 10, 1862.

The business of the past week in yarn and cloth up to Saturday last has not been equal to that of the previous week, as our largest buyers had in some measure anticipated their requirements, and the accumulation of wants was then satisfied for a time, and also because the firmness of holders in resisting offers below asking prices checked business.

Some stocks of shirtings adapted to the Eastern markets were cleared out in the early part of the week, at prices which would entail a heavy loss on manufacturers. Accumulation of stock and pressing demands for the needful caused needy sellers to accept offers which, under other circumstances, would have been refused. On Friday last, our second market day in the week, buyers of yarns for the Continent were very slow in their operations, and any slight advance asked by spinners checked business. The manufacturers of this district have shown little inclination to buy yarns, especially when spinners asked an advance of ½d to ¾d. per lb.

Rather higher prices have been paid for certain mule yarns, especially 60s. The sellers of two-folds up to 100 were doing rather more than in the early part of the week, and on better terms. All yarns from 120s. upwards continue without improvement. Rather more disposition has shown itself to purchase printing cloths, but business has been restricted by the addition of 1½d. per piece to prices. Heavy domestics remain dull.

On Saturday, owing to private telegrams from Bombay and Calcutta, reporting an active business in both markets at higher prices, buyers who had previously refused to give prices asked were induced to come in and make purchases of yarns and cloths to a considerable extent these advances being made public on Monday, coupled with the news per "Niagara," being interpreted as favourable to holders of cotton, caused a general and extensive inquiry from all classes of buyers, and an advance on some description of cloths was obtained.

Our market to-day is much more cheerful than of late, and a good general buying has set in, causing holders of stocks to obtain prices which they could not have done this day week. The advance in 7th and 8th shirtings ranges from 1½d. to 3d. per piece, and lighter fabrics, 1½d. per piece. Yarns are fully ½d. per lb. dearer.

WILLIAM DICKINSON.

THE APPROACHING BATTLES.

The public mind is rallying from the crushing shock of the great disaster at New Orleans, and feeds confidently on hopes of new victories rather than does penance on painful reflections as to the past. Our eventual success in this revolution, if Southerners are true to themselves, is now no more questionable than it has been from the beginning. The South must be conquered before it is subjugated—the people of the South must be conquered. The enemy have conquered a good deal of our territory, but very few of our people—we mean soldiers. The largest army they have ever whipped was that at Donelson, and then they had the assistance of their gunboats and of the elements. They were four to one in that fight. They have got to whip armies much larger than they have yet met, and to whip them out of reach of their gunboats, before the South is conquered. No one believes that they can do it unless they greatly outnumber us, and this it is almost impossible for them to do, for our main armies are very large. Certainly this belief in the invincibility of our main armies in the open field is justified by the records of the war from the beginning. In no case where considerable forces have been engaged in the open field—and we have had a force approaching the numbers of the enemy—have we been defeated. Therefore, let us await with confidence the issue of the pending battles in Virginia and the Mississippi Valley.

But supposing that we are unsuccessful in these conflicts, we may rest assured that the enemy will not be entirely successful; for if our men are worsted, they will display the splendid traits of the Southern soldier, as manifested in his capacity to endure even defeat without demoralization, and to retrieve that defeat in a measure by the cool intrepidity of orderly retreat before a victorious enemy. Time and again have our Southern soldiers proved their possession of the high qualities of courage and coolness essential to the endurance of disaster undismayed. Therefore, we may trust that though the enemy overpower one of our large armies with numbers, he cannot destroy it. Our men will fall back clinging to their standard, and rally again at a point still more remote in the interior of the South; and present a new front, rendering a still larger army necessary to the enemy.

If the enemy do overpower one of our grand armies in a pitched battle, their victory will be so dearly bought as to be almost equivalent to a defeat. Such victories will ruin them and achieve our triumph in the end. The armies winning them will be destroyed so far as their efficiency for weeks afterwards is concerned. If we do not rout, capture, and utterly destroy an army, it makes little difference whether we or they hold the field, only as to sustaining the claims of a victory won. They will suffer just as much though we retire from the ground as if they did. So we kill, disable, and retard them, we prosper our cause; compelling them to make more exhausting efforts to wage their desperate war, prolonging the sufferings which they force themselves to endure in prosecuting it, and wearing out the patience of an injured world, which has already reached the limit of forbearance.—Mobile Register.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

FROM OUR LIVERPOOL CORRESPONDENT.
BY MAGNETIC TELEGRAPH.

Thursday morning.
Ambr. Lanfar received the 400 bales of cotton, and sold to a Northern purchaser
All cotton in New Orleans, except a few hundred bales, had been burnt.
Also all cotton on the Mississippi, between New Orleans and Memphis.
Mr. Stea. Value and J. Burnside had about 4000 bales on plantation, which they burnt.
All shopkeepers refused Federal notes.
There is no ill-feeling in the Confederate States against England.
John Crickard, teller in Bank of New Orleans, was fired on while in the Jackson railroad cars, by United States' sentinels, and severely wounded.
Captain T. B. Huger, of steamer McRae, died from a wound received near the forts.
General Twigg's and Colonel D. W. Adams' residences occupied by Federal troops.
Sam Smith and Brother, and B. James, dry goods' merchants, and B. Avegno, were arrested.
Have received Orleans papers to 20th May, but too late to send. Nothing of importance in them.
This news received from New Orleans passengers just arrived.

BATTLE OF SHILOH.

(NEAR CORINTH.)

LIST OF KILLED, WOUNDED, & MISSING.

FIRST LOUISIANA REGULARS.
COLONEL ADAMS.

FIELD OFFICERS. WOUNDED—Col. Daniel Adams, of New Orleans, severely but not fatally in the head. Improving, and promises to recover.
COMPANY A—(Capt. Beatty).—KILLED—Sergt. James Carpenter; Privates John Gavin, and David Sexton. Total, 3. WOUNDED—Second Lieut. M. C. Gladden, in thigh; Sergt. John Quirk, thigh; Corporal Martin Knox, both legs; Corporal Edward Virtue, leg slightly; Corporal William A. Foster, leg; Privates Morris Bebb, hand; Thomas Daily, neck slightly; William Eubardt, leg; Gustave Epstein, leg; Adolphe Oppenheim, leg; George Mitten, mouth; David Roth, leg; Joseph Rifle, leg; Thomas Reagan, leg; Joseph Schurte, leg; Edward Sexton, shoulder; Frederick Trabad, shoulder; John Mathison, side slightly. Total 19. MISSING—Thomas Mahan, supposed to be wounded and in hospital; assisting physician. Total in action, 39; killed and wounded, 22.
COMPANY B—(1st Lieut. Thomas Butler).—KILLED—Sergt. Hodges; Privates Andrew Love and John Burke. WOUNDED—1st Lieut. commanding Butler, Corporal Wyman, Privates Brookins, James Dougherty, Samuel Davison, Ernst, Girardin, O'Donnell, W. H. Roger, Dennis Cronan, Michael Quinn, Mullins, Shrite. MISSING—Known to be wounded on the field, James Douglas.
COMPANY C—(Capt. F. M. Kent).—KILLED—Privates Gill and O'Brien. WOUNDED—Capt. F. M. Kent (severely but not dangerously), Lieut. W. P. Grivot, slightly; Sergt. W. Vandergrift; Privates Allen, Brundoll, Bruza, Harley, Hawkins, Lawler, May, McDonald, Murphy, McCluskey, Shea, Gallagher, Goslin. MISSING—Privates Kelley, Evans, Frankie, Servis, Williams, Wheeler, Sullivan.
COMPANY D—(Capt. J. H. Trezevant).—KILLED—Corporal Meyer; Privates Anderson, P. Ryan, W. Jones, J. N. Gates, M. Moore, P. Haggerty—7. WOUNDED—Capt. Trezevant; Sergts. Smith, Regan, O'Sullivan; Corporal McManus; Privates Clark, Fields, Joney, Kilway, McAdams, Nugent, Parsons, Porter, Taylor, Hardin, Garrison, Peffer, Steiner, Cullum, E. Murphy—20. MISSING—Privates Spencer, McCullum, and McDonald—3. Total killed, wounded, and missing, 30. Number of men and officers in action, 56.
COMPANY E—(Capt. E. C. Preston).—KILLED—Sergeant Joseph Lambers, Sergeant James Duno; Privates James M. Butler, McDonald, Edward H. Smith, S. Wood, Sweatman. WOUNDED—Capt. E. C. Preston, severe flesh wound; 1st Sergt. James Plummer, in the thigh; Corporal Ferguson; Privates M. Doovon, William Eppinger, P. Gallagher, slightly; John Grease, severely; — Gerbosh, — Gost, slightly; — Howard, P. Jasmin, W. Knox, W. Mahon, severely; — McDonough, mortally; Charles Miller, slightly; Henry Ross, severely; — Stewart, slightly; J. Schriver, J. Wark, severely; A. Willis, slightly. MISSING—Bartsche, known to have been wounded; P. Caveny.
COMPANY F—(Capt. Strawbridge).—KILLED—J. C. Levy, Francis Clayton, A. Keneman, Peter Norton, Thomas Murphy. WOUNDED—1st Lieutenant W. A. Reid, 3d. Sergt. Edward Burns, 4th Sergt. Charles Johnson, 3d. Corporal Charles Molloy; Privates Thomas Beglan, Thomas Sullivan, Jean Christian, John Wartiff, Lewis Livan, John Gillmore, John McElree, James Syme, John Guerin, Jacob Kyser, Conrad Winke, Pat Cannon, Robert Cula, Charles McCalla, John Madden, Thomas Swannansen, Michael McDermott. MISSING—Sergt. Francis Conroy, and 8 privates.
Total killed, 12; wounded, 21.
COMPANY G—(Captain Wheat).—KILLED—Captain J. T. Wheat, Sergeant Henry Smith, Sergeant William Hickley; Privates John Welcome, and Michael Dwyer. WOUNDED—Lieut. Kennedy, Corporals Landridge and Johnston; Privates Bell, Brown, Connors, Enlow, Edward Hughes, Philip Gilligan, Fishman, McGown, Kenny, J. C. Martin, Miles, Owens, Wittenman, J. D. Williams, J. L. Williams, William Smith, Kearney, Watson, and Colter.
COMPANY H—KILLED—Mathias Albright, Edward Dean, John Hartman, William Herman, Anthony Mailier, Jerry O'Brien, Ferdinand Walker. WOUNDED—Sergt. John Connerly, Corporal John Kelly; Privates James Bell, William Brink-

man, John Doyle, James Donovan, John Haley, Joseph Hepworth, James Kenty, Charles Lerpp, Richard Leslie, Henry Myers, Michael Malloy, Charles Lifort. Patrick Haly, John R. Kurns, George F. Knaus, Albert Vedder. MISSING—Corporal Ashel D. Jarvis, Private James Bennett.
COMPANY K—(Capt. Taylor).—KILLED—Lieut. B. nd, Sergt. Webber, Corporal Perry, Corporal Badley; Privates Fleming, Francy, Kennedy, Lynch, Morris, and Quinn—Total 10. WOUNDED—Lieut. Sparks and Keble; Sergts. McClay, Hinkl, and Pottenger; Corporal Hunter; Privates Arnold, O'Ryan, Dillon, Tonsen, Myer, Nolan, and O'Donnell—13. MISSING—Privates Barges, Clifford, and Price—3.
FOURTH REGIMENT LOUISIANA VOLUNTEERS.
[From the Chaplain, Rev. J. A. Godfrey.]
COMPANY A—(Capt. Charles Betts).—WOUNDED—John Counselman, Michael Hammel, Jerry Mullaghligh, John Nevil, Gus Wolf, Jacob Near, John Caffry, Joseph Gearing, Hector Latile (acting Lieutenant). MISSING—Peter Younger, Francis Martin, William Stein. SUMMARY—Wounded, 9; missing, 3. Total, 12.
COMPANY B—(Capt. W. F. Pennington).—WOUNDED—Capt. W. F. Pennington, Sergt. C. Tucker, Sergt. Hogg; Privates E. S. Alexander, Berker, Gutzmer, W. Grace, Lawler, Leister, Moon, Murphy, Murly, Pride. MISSING—Lieut. D. C. Jenkins; Private Mazoran. SUMMARY—Wounded, 13; missing, 2. Total, 15.
COMPANY C—DELTA RIFLES—(Capt. H. M. Favrot).—WOUNDED—Lieut. O. P. Scofield; Privates B. C. Bradford, Henry Carl, John C. Carl, W. P. Denum, M. S. Bowman, L. Brown, Stephen Henderson, W. H. S. M. Crindle, N. S. Key, Z. P. Yersin, Ben Smith, S. Weatherby, R. D. Prun. MISSING—Corporal W. M. Barrow, Corporal J. B. Stuart; Privates Phil Barnard, J. Brown, William Kepler. SUMMARY—Wounded, 14; missing, 5. Total, 19.
COMPANY D—TIRAILLEURS—(Capt. F. A. Williams).—KILLED—Felix Hebert, R. Hebert, T. Lejeune. WOUNDED—2nd Lieut. B. Landry, Junior 2nd Lieut. Aillet, Sergt. Coutade, Sergt. N. Leblanc, Sergt. L. O. Dupuy, Corporal P. T. Babin; Privates R. Lisle, W. B. McKimmons, L. Martin, A. O. Landry, L. Landry, A. Doiron, E. Henry, M. A. Allen, J. B. Hebert, J. L. Blanchard, P. Tullier, A. Hebert, S. P. Insley, S. Levick. SUMMARY—Killed, 3; wounded, 20. Total, 23.
COMPANY E—WEST FELICIANA RIFLES—(Capt. C. E. Torrotrain).—KILLED—Capt. C. E. Torrotrain, Drummer W. Leavenworth, J. Elliot. WOUNDED—1st Sergt. L. J. Tansey; privates John Brady, T. A. Ohioe, L. K. Collins, John Hobgood, J. B. Riley, J. B. Vicarro, J. Davis, A. Vigoe, A. Reams. MISSING—Private W. T. Wilson. SUMMARY—Killed, 3; wounded, 11; missing, 1. Total, 15.
COMPANY F—ST. HELENA RIFLES—(Capt. J. B. Taylor).—KILLED—Serg. H. T. Amicher; Privates C. C. Thompson, J. R. Clayton. WOUNDED—Capt. J. B. Taylor, 1st Lieut. H. M. Carter; Privates A. P. Richards, G. G. Easley, N. Q. Easley, W. T. Rayburn, J. W. Barron, G. Bridges, W. F. Bennett, L. Carter, Thomas Zachary. M. W. Glascock. MISSING—A. O. Jones, J. C. Watson. SUMMARY—Killed, 3; wounded 12; missing, 2. Total, 17.
COMPANY G—BEAVER CREEK RIFLES—(Capt. J. A. Wingfield).—WOUNDED—Lieut. R. Y. Burton; Serg. H. Ohme; Corporal T. J. Andrews; Privates John Vestler, W. Cornish, J. W. Denmark, W. H. Dyer, C. Gill, M. Johnson, T. Knight, O. M. Lee, L. P. Muse, John McFarland, J. G. Powell, L. C. White, J. W. Roberts, W. L. Ressel, W. A. Smith, J. L. Spring, M. Taylor, John Wigill—22.
COMPANY H—LAFOURCHE GUARDS—(Capt. J. L. Bellin).—KILLED—Corporal Geo. Quicksel; Privates O. Leblanc, Thos. Corbit. WOUNDED—Sergts. E. and L. Allen; Privates A. Babin, C. Beltan, Joseph Desdriane, H. H. Harris, S. Herbert, W. L. Head, Z. Lapeymie, James McDonel, J. Russell, D. P. Morebeau, A. Rossengal, F. Scanlan. MISSING—Sergt. L. F. Morehead; Privates O. Deioene, E. B. Perryman, Thos. Roussel. SUMMARY—Killed, 3; wounded 14; missing, 4. Total, 21.
COMPANY I—HUNTER RIFLES B.—(Capt. J. T. Hilliard).—KILLED—Capt. J. T. Hilliard. WOUNDED—1st Lieut. J. J. Adams, 2nd Lieut. E. C. Holmes; Privates J. Delancy, A. J. Doty, F. Gumble, J. Mills, E. Clark, R. W. Vincent, C. A. Yunger. MISSING—E. Messcy. SUMMARY—Killed, 1, wounded, 9; missing, 1. Total, 11.
COMPANY K—HUNTER RIFLES, A.—(Capt. E. J. Pullen).—KILLED—Corporals J. L. Hickin, C. P. Garrett; Privates J. P. Dupriest, H. L. McDonel, R. F. McKie, J. Mays, J. K. Smith, N. W. Tate, S. T. White. WOUNDED—Sergeant W. A. Knox; Corporal J. A. White; Privates P. Z. Coleson, W. H. Cook, J. Dwyer, G. W. Hamilton, E. W. Hobgood, H. Huntington, H. W. Johnston, T. L. Johnson, J. Kuffer, A. G. M'Donal, S. G. McNeely, W. R. M'Adams, J. A. Morgan, D. Odum, D. C. Thompson, W. A. Thompson, J. D. White, J. Y. D. Richardson, C. J. Parkuan, Z. Lee, F. Webber. MISSING—J. A. Ransom, E. H. Cramer, T. M. Hudson. SUMMARY—Killed, 9; wounded, 23; missing, 3. Total, 35.
FIELD AND STAFF.—Col. H. W. Allen, Adjutant C. Belcher, Colour-bearer B. W. Clark, Fife-Major B. Prun—4.
THIRTEENTH REGIMENT LOUISIANA VOLUNTEERS.
MAJOR AVEGNO.
Major Anatole Avegno, shot through left leg above the ankle, fracture of tibia, acting Colonel during battle; A. Commissary Walter V. Crouch, glanced shot on forehead and leg, not dangerously—2.
COMPANY A.—Capt. Stephen O'Leary, ball in left thigh, contusion of left shoulder and right breast by pieces of shell, not dangerously, acting Lieut.-Colonel during engagement; 1st Lieut. J. Daily, glanced shot on forehead and luxation of left foot, commanding Company A., left in hospital; 1st Sergt. William Cullin, killed; 2d Sergt. Daniel Fitzpatrick, killed; 1st Corporal Philip Prosser, killed; Privates William Dunn, killed; Patrick Maher, killed; Patrick Lacey, large piece of shell entering near right shoulder, cut out under arm, dangerously; Michael Griffin, contusion of knee by piece of shell; Patrick Curley, piece of shell through right shoulder; Philip Cahill, through side and abdomen, very dangerously; Thomas Cranforth, shot through right hand, slightly; John Scott, glancing shot on forehead, not seen after battle; George Patterson, contusion of right hand (musket shattered by a bombshell) slightly; Michael Maher, struck by shell against leg, not seen after battle; Patrick Moore, shot through left thigh; John Stanley, shot through neck and fingers of right hand, not seen after battle. — Killed, 5; wounded, 12, including two officers; missing 2—19.
COMPANY B.—Capt. E. L. Campbell, shot through right arm, fracture of humerus; Privates John Kraft, shot through

left forearm; James Coulter, shot through right arm; Frederic Eisenhardt, shot in left shoulder; John Brother, shot in foot, near ankle, ball lodging in bone; Thomas Powers, shot in right leg, ball lodging in left leg.—Killed, none; wounded, 6, including Captain; missing, 2—8.
COMPANY C.—Corporal W. S. Kirk, mortally through right eye; Privates Patrick Golding, shot through right wrist; Hugh Gunning, shot through left side, slightly.—Killed, none; wounded, 3; missing, 7—10.
COMPANY D.—1st Sergt. Xavier Cook, contusion of left breast; Sergt. Sylvan de Prag, contusion near right eye (spectacles shattered by piece of shell); Privates Lejeune, killed; Talma Moret, killed; Villebois, killed; Picard, killed; Rene Rideau, shot through left arm, fracture of ulna; Boulick, shot through thigh; Alex. Laporte, left leg below knee and right foot taken off by a cannon ball, very dangerously; Auguste Brunet, contusion of right shoulder by piece of shell; Vilars, contusion of lower jaw by piece of shell; Chas. Dupas, contusion of shoulder, slightly; Pierre Rudeau, contusion of breast by shell; Theodore Simon, slight wound by splinter of shell near eye. Killed:—wounded, 10; missing, 7—21.
COMPANY E—Privates John Price, killed; Pierre Gaisne, killed; Corporal Henry Bonicelli, shot through leg; Privates Andrew Fielhaber, shot through thigh, near knee; August Muller, shot through finger; Auguste Felinque, contusion of thigh by piece of shell; Joseph Schilling, shot through right thigh; Michael Bastian, shot through right leg, fracture of tibia, lodging in left knee, dangerously; Gottfried Seibly, shot through right leg; Louis Couturiere, glanced shot at head, slightly; Raymond Laussave, contusion of thigh by grapeshot; Ramon Pastor, penetrated wound of chin by bayonet. Killed, 2; wounded, 10; missing, 6—18.
COMPANY F.—Corporal Augustin Cassard, shot through left thigh, not seriously; Private Francis Houlemont, killed; 1st Sergt. J. M. Johnson, glanced shot at right thigh, slightly; Privates Herman Nauen, shot through leg; David Lux, right arm shattered by bomb shell, amputated below shoulder, going on well; Michael McCollif, shot through lower jaw; Martin Evan, shot through calf of leg, slightly; Vieroig, shot through right arm, slightly; Charles Rushford, contusion of right arm and shoulder, slightly; Richard Rafter, contusion of left leg, slightly. Killed, 1; wounded, 9; missing, 7—17.
COMPANY G—Privates Adam Lollford, J. E. Johnston, Patrick Fleming, Joseph Doty, killed; Sergt. B. E. Allen, shot in leg, missing since, acting Lieutenant during battle; Privates Emanuel Mendiza, shot in right knee; Martin Coleman, shot through left leg; James P. Muggah, shot through both eyes and nose, very dangerously; John Torey, shot through both shoulders; Bern'd Karsten, shot through left side, flesh wound. Killed, 4; wounded, 6; missing, 8—18.
COMPANY H—Private Christopher Quinn, killed (shot through head); Corporal Timothy Booth, shot through knee; Privates John Brown, one finger shot off; Thomas Hennessey, wounded in back by piece of shell, slightly; William McPherson, piece of shell through right thigh; Patrick Ward, piece of shell in right thigh, near knee; Charles Terry, cannon ball through membrane glutens, dislocating and fracturing left femoral, very dangerously; Charles Nolte, shot through abdomen, dangerously; Frank E. Ward, shot through thigh; John Welch, shot through left arm; George Geiger, right hand, slightly; Henry Sheers, glanced shot, right forearm; George Weaver, glanced shot, near shin. Killed, 1; wounded, 12; missing 7—20.
COMPANY I—Privates Chas. Burmaster, Eugene Paul, killed; Chas. Jeffrey, 1st Sergt., shot through arm, near shoulder; Privates Jacob Peiser, shot through mouth and shoulder; Edward Craig (under 15 years of age), left foot taken off by exploded shell, amputated above ankle; Patrick Foley, shot through left side; Joseph Dutrot, shot through spine, mortally; Peter Kelly, shot through right leg, fracture; John Ziegler, glanced shot across chin; Anthony Gardener, glanced shot on foot; Wm. Cashry, contusion of left breast by shell; Alvey Sider, left eye blinded by passing ball. Killed, 2; wounded, 10; missing, 3.—Total, 15.
COMPANY K.—George Cammack, 2d Lieut., glanced shot on leg; Privates James Holohan, killed; Wm. Condon, shot through right lung (died April 7); Wm. Swaddell, bladder, mortally, shot through right thigh; C. A. Bellknop, shot through left eye; Daniel Carbury, shot through calf of left leg; Patrick Sweeney, glanced shot near temple; Cornelius Hagherty, shot through right hand; Matthew Casson, shot through left shoulder. Killed, 1; wounded, 8, including 1 officer; missing, none.—Total, 9—157.
SUMMARY.—Killed, wounded, missing, officers and men of 18th Regular Louisiana Volunteers, C. S. A., during the battle of the 6th and 7th April, 1862:—

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
Major.....	0	1	0	1
Capt. Commissary.....	0	1	0	1
Company A.....	5	12	2	19
Company B.....	0	6	2	8
Company C.....	0	3	7	10
Company D.....	4	10	7	21
Company E.....	2	10	6	18
Company F.....	1	9	7	17
Company G.....	4	6	8	18
Company H.....	1	12	7	20
Company I.....	2	10	3	15
Company K.....	1	8	0	9
	20	88	49	157

DR. CHS. LANGENBECKER,
Surgeon, 13th Regt. Lou. Vols., C. S. A.

EIGHTEENTH LOUISIANA REGIMENT.
Names of the killed, wounded, and missing in the Battle of Shiloh, on the 6th and 7th of April, 1862:—
COMPANY A.—Corporal C. C. Gaudin, wounded, missing; Arthur Sheriot, wounded, missing; E. Lambert, missing; J. Brady, slightly wounded; Corporal J. Schexneider, slightly wounded; F. Donaldson, slightly wounded; J. Desroches, slightly wounded.
COMPANY B.—Lieut. C. D. Bullard, wounded, missing; Sergt. T. Dubourdin, missing; Martin Dillon, missing; E. Lurio, missing; Rodolph Deshotel, missing; R. T. Gardine, missing; Hilarie Hilde, missing; Adolphe Marks, missing; Emile de Meche, missing; Michael Prudhomme, missing; K. W. Scott, missing; Louis Vanhille, missing; Felix Wartelle, missing; Oliver Moran, missing; Adolphe Lastrappe, wounded slightly; A. G. Lastrappe, wounded slightly; Lucien Joubert, wounded slightly; Thorne Dupuchan, wounded slightly; Alex. Gnidry, wounded slightly; Christoval Bellard; Thelis Gnidry, wounded slightly; D. L. Godeau, wounded slightly; Marcel Maboux, wounded slightly; B. S. Mudd.

COMPANY C.—Capt. J. D. Wood, missing; J. A. Kille, missing; J. T. Reid, missing; J. H. Reid, missing; T. Harrison, missing; T. C. Rachee, missing; H. C. Goodman, missing; C. M. Case, missing; N. T. Galtien, missing; M. McClaughlin, missing; M. Procelle, missing; Ovide Ray, missing; J. E. Sers, missing; Adolphe Sers, missing; J. N. Rachal, missing; 1st Lieut. Emile Cloutier, wounded slightly; A. Auty, wounded slightly; H. Alexander, wounded slightly; P. Broset, wounded slightly; F. Hertzog, wounded slightly; T. H. Oliver, wounded slightly; C. A. Payne.

COMPANY D.—Lieut. Dudley Ayre, severely wounded; Sergt. E. R. Field, slightly wounded; Corp. G. Howard, slightly wounded; Corporal T. J. Stansbury, slightly wounded; James Brannon, slightly wounded; P. Batman, slightly wounded; J. O. Chery, missing; T. Coleman, missing; E. Daunt, missing; M. Fletcher, wounded; Pat Hallery, wounded; Thomas Foley, missing; W. Hotel, missing; E. Rahoe, missing; T. Meyers, wounded; W. P. Mooney, missing; J. Munch, missing; M. Nolan, missing; W. P. Reiley, slightly wounded; P. H. Sutter, missing; J. W. Shorocks, missing; Phil Soigne, missing; L. Stansbury, missing; J. Fitzly, wounded; John Walsh, missing, and returned since report; James Wilson, missing; John White, wounded; B. Limmernann, wounded; Sergt. A. A. Crawford, slightly wounded.

COMPANY E.—Lieut. E. Lebusf, missing; Sergt. E. Landry, killed, missing; Sergt. C. Melancon, wounded slightly; Corporal A. Trepagnier, wounded, slightly; S. Loris, killed; E. Brand, wounded; L. Mine, wounded, missing; J. Heydel, wounded, missing; P. Phelan, wounded slightly; Leon Burnel, wounded slightly; G. Hymel, wounded slightly; C. Letalle, missing; A. Melancon, missing, but returned since report.

COMPANY F.—Lieut. O. Broussard, wounded; Corporal P. Martin, killed; Privates A. Broussard, D. Broussard, P. Constantin, C. Cotter, A. Murr, J. C. Mounier, J. McGahey, O. Brasseur, L. E. Mounier, killed; Corporal W. G. Butcher, Privates J. Durie, C. Bernard, T. Hebert, wounded, missing.

COMPANY G.—Capt. J. K. Gourdain, Lieut. Gautraux, Sergt. R. Savon, Corporals Thibodaux, V. Knobok, Privates D. Boudraux, W. Burk, J. Delany, W. Geodray, M. Ledet, A. Legume, J. Badoux, A. Vedros, F. Aueoia, slightly wounded; Privates P. Bannon, W. Bourgeois, A. Boudraux, A. Cheramie, J. B. Falgout, G. Girvir, T. Guidry, T. Guillotte, M. A. Danton, N. Fymel, J. Leonard, J. B. Guillote, A. Lombas, W. White, missing; A. Abadie, J. Brodyen, J. A. Devron, D. L. McVerse, V. Paris, E. Rouvert, killed.

COMPANY H.—Capt. H. Huntigton, Lieut. W. H. Newton, slightly wounded; Privates J. Brohen, P. Keigrou, G. O'Keefe, J. Maguire, L. McCormack, J. Noonan, J. Crossan, H. E. King, missing; Privates P. Goffney, L. Dimeraville, R. Malrey, P. J. Murphy, wounded; Privates A. Foray, D. Gleason, J. McNamee, C. Gleason, wounded, missing; Privates P. Hughes, C. Keane, J. Mehan, C. McMullin, J. Newman, T. Aglo, J. Quinlan, M. Burnas, W. Cody, J. Crowley, P. Kenny, M. McCoy, missing.

COMPANY I.—Capt. J. Collins, wounded slightly; Lieut. J. M. Young, Sergt. C. Friel, missing; Sergt. L. Braux, slightly wounded; Corporal J. Watson, missing; Private G. Brown, killed; Privates A. Avrel, A. N. Anderson, P. Dooley, W. Headon, V. Schreiber, E. Prave, F. P. Upton, J. Watson, missing; Corporal Young, Privates P. Connors, D. Cleany, J. Carroll, C. Fredericks, G. L. Hayne, J. O'Connor, slightly wounded; Privates T. Cushman, W. Pierce, J. A. Deguan, J. J. Payan, seriously wounded; Private J. E. Coulon, slightly wounded.

COMPANY K.—Capt. L. Lastropes, missing; Lieuts. J. G. Hayes, W. Prescott, Private V. S. Bourke, slightly wounded; Privates E. D. Daigle, F. Jooner, killed; Privates W. Deraner, A. Wells, missing; Privates M. White, A. Lee, J. Meldrum, and L. Dejean, slightly wounded.

Losses in the Regiment called :—

GARDE D'ORLEANS (ORLEANS GUARD)

At the Battle of Shiloh.

KILLED.—V. Sobit, S. Gerard, L. Forestier, E. LeBlanc, B. Martel, G. Toree, S. Archinard, D. Conturie, P. Dubauchel, Schrempf, A. Gallot, A. Fleury, J. B. Jagnin, C. Boongard, A. Lapaigne, P. Rourke. WOUNDED.—Octave Forstall, T. Arnaud, L. A. Goelland, E. Nalbetat, B. Lavien Delone. WOUNDED AND MISSING.—J. Moreno, P. A. Vienne, P. Gandel, Opendenager, C. Philippi, J. A. Rash, E. Robin, C. Bromer, P. A. Lacroca, Cararor, P. L. Dieloact, J. Dalhonde. WOUNDED, AND ON THEIR WAY HOME.—V. Prados, J. C. Coiron, T. Bienvenno, G. Bryant, Forestees, W. Forestall, R. A. Hebrard, E. Hernandez, G. Pilot, P. Indice, L. Menard, A. D'Heberant, C. F. Labarre, F. Perey, T. Dubois, A. G. Romain, T. Arnaud, E. S. Audlar, E. Arceneau, H. Boisblanc, H. De Mabry, C. Diaro, L. E. Fazende, L. A. Suidard, L. Gregoire, E. Jordan, J. Lepebore, E. Lafour, Paul Daron, Marine, P. Lacoste, Wolcart, E. Villavaso, H. Franchet, P. Sarrazier, H. Farriat, Calery, J. Thibodeaux, L. B. Delahoussaye, C. Gessler, E. Robert, H. Hertzog, E. Ruffier, E. Dalinage, C. Sertron, P. Rabineau, C. Broupard, S. Bienreno, T. O. Champagne, J. Guillebran, J. H. O'Brien, C. Levoir, B. Carclier, A. Witty. MISSING.—P. Leife, C. Carzean, P. J. Lefebvre, F. Marcotte, A. Poche, L. Villaraso, F. Brugier, E. Fagot, J. Alexander, A. A. Fuesher, L. Schmidt, A. Dicoast, H. David, A. Patin—total 87. Dr. M. Guion, Major Domonteil, and H. Pitot will attend the wounded down the river.

The 1st Louisiana went into the fight with 450 men and 35 officers. The total killed was 50 men and 3 officers; wounded, 18 officers and 164 men, and 40 missing. The wounds are frequently quite severe, but few are dangerous. No amputations, it is believed, will be necessary.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

MOBILE, April 30, 1862.

DEAR T.—I wrote you a hasty scrawl on the 19th of last month, and sent it by a vessel running the blockade. Being somewhat doubtful about its ever reaching you, I take advantage of this most excellent opportunity, and send forward another memento of my remembrance.

Things are in a sad state here. The Federal gunboats are in front of New Orleans. The city must be surrendered or shelled, and we, of course, are looking for these most unwelcome intruders in our own waters. Many families have moved to the interior; others are determined to remain and defend their homes. We are among the latter, and will on no account leave unless the city is bombarded. You have, doubtless, heard of the late battle at Shiloh, near Corinth, Mississippi. The Federals say they "gained the victory," though we drove them to their gunboats on the first day, slept in their camp at night, and on the second day, though they had large reinforcements, it was only a drawn battle. No better proof need be named, than that we still hold our position at that point. A very large force is collecting there. In a few days, a second and more bloody battle must take place—a battle that must probably decide the fate of Tennessee. So many from Mobile are there that we feel deeply anxious about the result. May God be with us, for our cause is certainly just. We lost many from here in the engagement of the 6th and 7th—General Gladden, Robert Armistead, Emile Herpin, Young Ravisses, Spear, Skates, Burns, Jones, Marshall, son of W. P., and many others with whom you were probably unacquainted. Zach. Deas was wounded. John Scott was at Gladden's side when he fell. He and Captain Ketchum were only slightly hurt. Oh, T—, this is such a fearful strife; My heart almost ceases to beat when I hear of the outrages offered our people. The Northern army have the advantage of us in everything except genuine courage; our advantage in this cannot be doubted. Our men march into battle with a simple covering of cloth, or homespun, to meet a force clad in breast-plates of steel. This is no fabrication got up to excite sympathy, but a veritable fact. We have any number of these Yankee courage-preservers, taken from the persons of wounded prisoners now in our hospitals. The Federals admit they lost 20,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners. 2300 of the latter passed through here on their way to the interior—Louisiana and Mississippi were similarly honoured. General Prentiss grew so insolent while here as to say, "There were no honest men in the South, and the women were all prostitutes." Mr. Files, who had charge of him, warned him to make no more such offensive remarks, and told him "His being a prisoner alone saved him from such chastisement as he deserved." It is a wonder to me he was not hung upon the nearest lamp-post, for we have borne so much insolence and outrage that our forbearance is almost exhausted. You must not think, from the fall of New Orleans, or any other seaport city, that we are conquered. No, my dear friend, we are further from it than we were six months ago. We have no navy to compete with their formidable mortar-fleets and numerous gunboats. But just let them meet us in fair fight, or an open field, and we will prove our ability to accomplish what we have undertaken.

The Federal boats which passed up the Tennessee River were in search of cotton, which they offered to pay for, assuring the planters, "if they refused to sell, they would take it by force." This threat has doomed our staple to the flames wherever they approach it. 10,000 bales were burned in New Orleans upon the levee, as the fleet came up. The Mississippi River must be quite sweet, from the vast quantity of sugar thrown into it, and the frogs are no doubt fattening upon the molasses which is running through the streets into the swamps in the rear of the city. There is much, very much, I would like to tell you, but must be brief, as I am busy. Your house is shut up, everything, so far, safe. The negroes are all well. Henry lives with —, his wife keeps house for herself. Henry has had an illness, but is getting over it. Gilbert does nothing that I know of. Nancy and the old mamma look well. Everything is very high here, dry goods scarce, bacon 40 cents per pound. Of course your house cannot be rented—scores stand empty in the city.

My eldest brother was badly wounded at Shiloh; the younger one is at Manassas. Without having said one half I wish to, I must conclude, as the steamer leaves for Savannah at once. Pray for us, dear T—, and if your sympathies are with us, which I cannot doubt, pray for our cause.

MOBILE, May 2.

It is hardly possible for you people in Europe to know what is really going on in our country, much less to form a correct opinion of the spirit or animus of the people of the South. European ideas, opinions, and criticisms are sadly at fault on the subject.

The London Times has occasionally approached the truth nearer than any other journal which has come to view, for thus far we have received intelligence from abroad pretty regularly.

Let me say to you that, in my humble opinion, the war has only just begun in earnest on our side. At the commencement of the struggle there was a seeming listlessness among our people, to be accounted for from a looking for foreign intervention. That idea has been got rid of now, and foreign countries are seldom alluded to—the change is a very marked one. I think the vote on Gregory's motion in Parliament, together with the tone of the French Emperor's speech, had a deal to do with this change, and which I consider a good thing for our country; for if the South is to be independent, let her make herself so from beginning to end! Our people are therefore alive to their work, and are in earnest; and the only business—and I might almost add pleasure—is to war against our enemies, to win or die in the struggle for constitutional liberty!

Do not allow yourself to think for one moment that, should every border town and seacoast place—and which, after all, is only another portion of border territory—be taken possession of by the enemy, that that would end the struggle. We expect them to occupy those places; the occupation of them by the enemy may incommode us, it is true, but they are not essential to our national existence just now. The inhabitants of the border and seacoast cities desert them on the occupancy of them by the Federals, and leave them nothing to profit by; they neither associate nor trade with them, and they are compelled, at great expense of men and means, to keep possession. Meanwhile, everything valuable to the enemy is destroyed, and the strength of the South is concentrating itself for active and earnest action. The vast interior is able to support a large population, and the enemy has not been able to advance from any point where his gunboats are. Their journals are filled with the most astounding falsehoods, in so much, that if the Southern people had the time to spare, they would not attempt to trouble themselves to correct them for the benefit of outside nations. I will just give one example. The Battle of Shiloh is claimed by the Federals as a victory. On the first day's fight the Confederates captured very nearly all their artillery (this some of their journals admit) during the night the Federals were reinforced; however, the result of the two days' fighting was our capturing some four or five thousand prisoners, and a retention of a portion of their artillery; a loss on their side of about 12,000 to 15,000 men, and a heavy loss on our side. The two forces were estimated as follows:—35,000 Confederates, against 40,000, reinforced to 50,000, Federals. Some estimates of the latter have been made at 85,000. I can hardly believe it. Now, how much farther have they advanced, and what have they gained?

New Orleans was evacuated on the approach of the Federal vessels, which steamed past the forts below the city, but their transports with troops are, up to this writing, held in check by the forts. The fall of the city will make an impression, no doubt, on your side, but we do not let it annoy us as much as you might suppose. What cotton was there was burnt before the city was surrendered, together with other articles which might be available to the enemy.

The recent address of General Beauregard, together with the general resolution passed by the Confederate Congress on the subject of destroying cotton, will test the earnestness of the Southern people in their cause. I again beg to impress upon you not to form any opinion of a surrender of our struggle, even under what might appear, at your point of view, a serious disaster. When our people shall not be able to form large masses, then they will go into a partizan war, and other methods, which will make the Government of the United States rue the day they began this war.

The writer had the best opportunities for conversing and being among the prisoners taken at Shiloh. They were men from the Western States, and fine looking soldiers. They admitted that our young fellows fought them, to use their own words, "not like human beings, but more like tiger cats; there was no getting away from them, they flew at us like tiger cats." "They fought well, and no mistake; they gave us h—." We treated them kindly. They are tired of the war; they will not stand the war tax, they say, in those States.

Tell our friends in Europe to keep up a good heart, and never to despair of the Southern Confederacy.

MOBILE, May 3.

One thing is sure, that if the yellow fever, or other sickness of summer, does not decimate the enemy, they will suffer by other means. We are all going to avail ourselves of the new Act of Congress—for partizan and scouting, so much for arms, so much for horses, &c., taken from the enemy; of course, nothing is offered for the killing of the Federal owners! I am of opinion, they are going to have a hard time of it this summer, "down South."

You have no idea of the strong feeling, which has newly broken forth to resist the Lineolnites, and which animates, not only the men and boys, but the women! I really believe they would fight, if they knew how. Like an india-rubber ball, the harder knocked down, the higher it rises; so these Southern people seem to be acted upon in their seeming reverses. The land everywhere is planted in grain. The Yankees are disappointed by the destruction of cotton and other property at New Orleans. Yes, sir, every bale of cotton will be burnt sooner than let them get possession of it. We are preparing for a long and bloody war. Subjugate or conquer the South, they can never do; if they should, it would be at the cost of their own existence as well as ours.

This will be, I expect, the last opportunity I shall avail myself of for a long time, as the defence of our homes and country now alone absorbs all our thoughts, our business, and occupation.

Mobile will not be abandoned without a fight, and if the enemy succeeds, they will only come ashore to a deserted and forsaken city, and will not dare to venture far off from its suburbs.

The following letter was written by an English lady residing in West Florida, and although it has been some time on its way here, and was written prior to the late Federal reverses before Yorktown,—at Williamsburgh, on James River,—and in the West, it may be still of sufficient interest for publication.

W,

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

—WEST FLORIDA.

DEAR FRIEND,—Before the war I was engaged to correspond for a London magazine, and have sent many contributions by various channels within ten months. Probably they were out of date by the time they arrived, or were found congenial to English prejudices.

It is no interested motive, beyond wishing to return home, and know that the war will cease, that prompts me to write for the South. I am detained here amidst privation, danger, great anxiety, and suspense; supporting myself by teaching, and running the risk of losing all I possess at the North, because I cannot communicate with my lawyer there—and leaving my aged mother in sorrow and care in England.

I often wonder at the strange neutrality of England, which denies her subjects here, the opportunity of communicating with their friends in the mother country; and I must speak and exclaim against the harshness and injustice of our lot, and the wonderful pertinacity with which my country voluntarily blinds herself to the affairs of the Southern Confederacy. I wish I could and might write for the papers now, that England could, at least, know as much of the South as of the North. It seems only a cruel mockery for her to say, "The South must prove herself victorious in arms before she is acknowledged," while she is blockaded and prevented from supplying herself with the means of warfare, except by the arrival of a cargo which, perchance, occasionally runs the blockade. The Southern people have never been a manufacturing people; but now factories, foundries, mills, and resources of all kinds are springing, and have sprung, into action with astonishing rapidity; but even with these, how can she compete with the North, and its open ports and overwhelming population? * * * What a horrid war the North is now waging with powerfully-armed flatboats penetrating into every river and creek, and, at the distance of two or three miles, shelling towns, and cutting down small bands of poorly-armed soldiers, who can only bring against them a few home-made field-pieces and experimental ammunition. Surely my country, England, will never permit this savage and revengeful invasion—these horrid massacres to continue! Surely she will never purchase a bale of cotton procured by vile persecution and robbery—the means now made use of by the North! * * *

"A woman has no right to interfere in politics; what can she know about Government?" you in England may exclaim. But here we are all politicians; everyone must be concerned with what is going on around us. To remain neutral here is impossible. I have spent several years in the North, and cannot number fifty people for whom I can feel unlimited respect. I have lived two years in the South, and, though not blind to the weak points and slowness of the Southerners, must confess them an honourable, liberal, truth-loving, and humane people, and religious too. You meet with no "isms" nor "ists" here. They attend their little country churches, and worship God in a simple, primitive manner, and act like Christians towards each other. One is struck just now with the devotional and submissive tone of the public papers—while in one paragraph you find the people urged and encouraged to renewed exertions to atone for the late defeats, you find in another incentives to piety, humility, and a Christian course. How different from the exultant, deceptive descriptions published at the North! * * *

I enclose a few scraps from a variety of Southern papers to show how vain and futile will be the endeavour to subjugate this people. How terrible of Christian Europe to permit the devastation of such a promising territory, and the massacre and sacrifice of so many of its inhabitants?

I entreat you to pardon my enthusiasm, and if there is any means open to enable me to correspond with any of the English newspapers, I hope you will recommend me. My long suffering and experience here will certainly enable me to communicate much useful information.

Yours, &c,

CATHERINE.

NORFOLK, May 18, 1862.

* * * * *

Beauregard has given the Yankees three sound drubbings, the last of which was a terrific slaughter. Johnson has been victorious at West Point; and at Williamsburg, Stone Wall, Jackson was victorious over Banks; and it proved a second Bull Run.

The naval hospital, the academy, all the public, and many of the private buildings, have been seized for their wounded. At the naval hospital alone there are over 800.

Our people are unshaken and unanimous in their loyalty, though bribes and threats are alike used by the Federals to induce perjury among us. No one could be found to fill the public offices. The Federals offered 3500 dollars to the postmaster, 1000 dollars to each of his clerks, 200 dollars a month to an express agent, and 4000 dollars to a collector. When offered to the citizens they were rejected with the most insulting answers.

The Yankee troops are behaving very badly. They have broken into stores, emptied the contents, and when the merchants ask for redress the Provost-Marshal answers, "take the oath, and we may remunerate you after the war."

Because Mr. Wood, a butcher, who has, for many years, had the Government contracts for the victualling of the navy, refused to contract for the provisioning of the Federal troops, they seized 180 head of his cattle, and the next step, the Provost-Marshal says, will be to allow no meat to be sold excepting to loyal citizens, which means those who perjure themselves by taking an infamous oath.

Shortly after taking command here, General Wool assembled the Councilmen and asked them whether the citizens were loyal. Mr. G. W. Cump replied, "Yes, they are, truly and unalterably so, as loyal as the people of New Orleans." General Wool turned away without remark, but a bystander heard him mutter to himself that he would soon teach the Councilmen and the citizens a different meaning of loyalty. He has not taught any of us yet, neither man nor woman.

Foreign Correspondence.

WASHINGTON, May 23, 1862.

Halleck's army is now directly in front of Beauregard, and on the 21st there was continued skirmishing along the entire line; both armies are suffering from sickness, and the ranks are daily thinning. It would appear impossible that the impending battle could be much longer delayed; but since the publication of the order for the expulsion of all the army correspondents from Halleck's army our accounts are very meagre.

There is still considerable speculation as to the probability of the evacuation of Richmond without any battle; I am prepared to hear of such a result. I can see so many important reasons to induce the authorities of the Confederate Government to adopt this movement; because, beyond the prestige of the name, Richmond is of no more value to the military organization of the Confederates than any other point. The principal reason for my doubts of the intended evacuation is, the presence of the army fifty miles north of Richmond which keeps off McDowell; and then, by vigorous movements, Jackson has forced back Banks away up to Strasburg, which is 150 miles north-west of Richmond, and is a retrograde movement of nearly sixty miles; whilst Fremont has been compelled to retire about the same distance, so that neither of these columns,—Fremont's, Banks', or McDowell's—containing, probably, a total of not less than 140,000 men, are at this moment able to assist in the slightest degree in the demonstration of McClellan. As to his force, it is variously estimated; but it is my impression, from all information that I can obtain, that it does not exceed 120,000. Against this army, I should suppose the Confederates have been able to concentrate about 75,000, composed, I believe, of the best drilled, best equipped, and most determined spirits of the Confederate forces, commanded by Johnston, Lee, and Magruder; and, no doubt, if a battle is fought, Davis will be in person on the field.

It will be a terrific contest, as defeat to McClellan will be annihilation. The warm weather is already telling most seriously upon the Federal soldiers, and it is estimated, in reliable quarters, that the loss to the army from sickness and other causes is not less than a brigade each day. This weakness, it is now said, has caused the recent retrograde movements of Banks and Fremont, and the necessity of taking Pope from the Missouri to join Halleck, and has compelled Mitchell to abandon all his North Alabama operations, and likewise unite with the commanding-general; the necessity, therefore, of additional troops has become so manifest, that it is said there has been a quiet call made upon the various Governors for 100,000 men. Already notices have been issued in some of the States. I think, under existing circumstances, the recruiting will be far more difficult than it was six months ago. Northern men have a holy horror of the Southern climate in summer; for which they have good reason.

The accounts from New Orleans represent the distress for provisions as very great, and there was very little coming in from the country. A great many vessels were loading with provisions at New York. No cotton or sugar was permitted to be brought into the city by the railroads, and all river communication had ceased.

We hear that the Federal naval forces have proceeded up the river as far as Vicksburg; and, it is possible, that they will go up to Memphis. Arrangements have been made for the destruction of all the cotton or other produce that could not be carried away.

There is a report that Fort Wright had been evacuated, and that the Confederates now occupy Fort Randolph, a position about ten miles below, whose natural advantages are much greater than those of Fort Wright, and one of the best points of defence in the river. Unless the Federals can reduce these fortifications, they can obtain no supplies from St. Louis or the West, and New Orleans will be in a terrible position for want of food.

There is a statement, but not yet substantiated, that General Butler has seized the Canal Bank and another bank, and also took from the person of the Consul of the Netherlands the key of a bank vault containing 800,000 dollars, which had been transferred by the Citizens Bank to the house of Hope and Co., of Amsterdam. And further, that he had seized and closed the French and Spanish Consulates. There is great difficulty in obtaining, thus far, any veritable news from this place, but in a few days the truth must be disclosed, and we shall know exactly the condition of things. Evidently, however, the entire city is hostile to the Union cause, and the Government seeks in vain for the expected feeling which was to be developed so soon as the Federal flag was planted on the public buildings.

The whole population feel and act like a conquered people, who are only restrained by the pressure of a military force; and if the interior be truly represented, it is in vain that the Government can hope for any resumption of commercial relations. They may buy Northern provisions to avert starvation, but nothing beyond that will be done; at least, from the evidence now before us.

The weather has become exceedingly warm. This is quite unusual so early in the season; and, judging from this, it must be terrible in New Orleans and all other Southern latitudes.

I enclose a slip from the New York Picayune:—

Office of the Picayune, Tuesday evening,
May 6, 1862.

"We hear of some sales of tobacco, comprising, it is stated, from 300 to 400 hogsheds, and said to be at 9 to 10 dollars, but we have been unable to get any definite information in relation to it. We also learn that some small bales of cotton, which were not burned, in consequence of being held on British or European account, have changed hands within a day or two, but none of the particulars have been reported. These are the only indications within our notice of a movement in any branch of trade. The situation of the business community is unchanged. The apprehension of being compelled to sell to the invaders, or having their goods seized, deters many from reopening their stores, and the retail trade appears to be mainly confined to provision dealers and grocers. The counting-rooms of factors and merchants are generally open, and so are the banks, which continue to receive and pay over their counters Confederate treasury notes. If the Federal commander abide by the terms of his proclamation, we can see no good reason why trade should not be resumed, at least among our own citizens. There are thousands who are willing to receive currency for goods and in liquidation of debts, and probably as many who have the currency to spend, but both stand aloof, and nothing is done. In this connection we would refer our readers to the advertisement of parties who offer to sell their merchandise and property at reasonable prices for Confederate notes."

PARIS, June 9, 1862.

The treaty I previously alluded to (as having been passed between the United States and Mexico is now known to be a fait accompli). Messrs. Jurien de la Graviere and Dubois de Saligny have addressed to President Juarez a protest against any and all treaties having for object the pledge of any portion of the Mexican territory, and the Baron Mercier has equally notified President Lincoln that, the treaty concluded between himself and the President of Mexico, on the 28th of April last, being in flagrant opposition to all principles of international law, would be regarded by his Government as null and void.

The fact that the negotiations relative to this treaty were carried on by Mr. Seward in presence of the invitation made by France to the United States to join the Mexican expedition, and that it was perfected, since the landing of the French troops at Vera Cruz, is very significant. It shows plainly that President Lincoln has no intention whatever of giving up the principles of the Monroe doctrine, and that his Administration covets more than ever the final possession of Mexico. It indicates also that the Cabinet of Washington has determined to defy France itself, notwithstanding the kindness bestowed upon it by the Emperor.

It is currently reported that the Bureau of the Corps Legislatif, highly incensed at this course of the United States, and at the infamous treatment which the French Consul of New Orleans is said to have suffered at the hands of General Butler, are preparing a petition praying the Emperor to put a stop to the numerous acts of piracy committed in the West India seas by the officers of the Federal navy against the French merchantmen; and to check the arrogant attitude of the United States, which, in their opinion, can but imminently endanger the peace and general tranquility of Europe.

But what is it that has so developed all the vices inherent to Yankee nature—vanity, self-conceit, arrogance, cruelty and avarice—that all sentiment of self-respect and dignity has disappeared from the national councils of the United States? What is it that has blindly led the Washington demagogues to ruthlessly overthrow the free Government of their ancestors, to enthrone in its stead ruffianism, pillage, carnage, and slaughter? What is it that has so suddenly transformed that once proud people into humbled and cowed varlets of the Yankee Nero who dishonours the White House with his presence? It must be clear to all sober minds that the Yankees have become the docile tools of a supernatural power which is working their destruction and perdition through their own iniquitous hands. Quos celi perdere Jupiter dement.

But who is it that has so infuriated them upon the true worth of their national strength, that they now presume to bid defiance to civilized Europe? Read the newspapers which have never ceased to be devoted adherents to the French monarchy of 1830, and see how they rejoice at the troubles which they think the Mexican expedition pregnant with. Let anyone observe the mischievous smiles of the Orleansists, and it will be no difficult matter for him to detect the working of the Princes of Orleans upon the Lincolnite Administration.

Scattered in England, Spain, and America, the Princes of Orleans, faithful to the traditions of the Bourbon blood, are now pulling the wires which they believe capable of injuring the popularity of the Imperial dynasty. Regardless of consequences, they have, no doubt, promised to Lincoln the aid of Spain and England against France, their own country; and already dream for their native soil the possible return of 1815. But until their selfish, ambitious, and unpatriotic aspirations be for ever thwarted by the powerful genius of Napoleon III., what is the position of the Princes of Orleans?

Driven from the throne of their ancestors, the fallen and degenerate Bourbons wander, like the hero of Cervantes, in quest of military fame, without regard for the principles to which they lend their powerless and ungrateful sword.

Fighting in Italy in defence of liberalism, in America they are found helping despotism and vandalism to smother liberty, freedom, and civilization. But if, as an excuse for forgetting even their own personal dignity in becoming mere snalturns under a Yankee general, it was pleaded in their behalf that they were seduced by the captivating power of humanitarian doctrines, it may be asked, why should one of them, the head of the family, the brother-in-law of the Emperor of Brazil, leave that more natural channel for the exercise of his philanthropic propensities, to join his nephews in America, and become a cool spectator of the flowing blood of those who, sympathizing with the political misfortunes of the Duke of Orleans, accorded him a cordial greeting, offered him a home, and alleviated the exile of his father by a lavish and generous hospitality?

Indeed, it looks as though a merciless fatality continually leads the Bourbons in the very path which must exclude them from all hearts, and estrange them for ever from their own native soil. France will not readily forget, much less forgive, their gratuitous participation in the fall of a great city, bearing their once honoured name, and which was crimsoned with the blood of the descendants of their own great progenitor.

Their plans, already foiled in Europe, will meet with the same fate in America. A nation which has given birth to such patriots as Mayor Brown, of Baltimore; Mayor Monroe, of New Orleans, and Messrs. J. Teakle Wallis, T. Parkin Scott, Charles Howard, T. Key Howard, and George P. Kane, of Maryland; such a nation, when fighting under such a leader as Jefferson Davis, is not to be conquered even with the aid and influence of foreign princes.

If there is a class of men now on earth to whom the appellation of martyrs is applicable, it is certainly that noble, self-sacrificing, indomitable band of patriots from the State of Maryland, who, up to this hour, are held as prisoners at Fort Warren, in the State of Massachusetts.

Illegally arrested, cruelly persecuted, malignantly and falsely accused, these gentlemen, after an arbitrary captivity of six months, are now offered their liberty on terms such as every one of them would at any time have indignantly refused to accept.

What right have their oppressors—what right has this Lincoln Administration to demand, as a condition of his discharge from custody, that Mr. Brown, the Mayor of Baltimore, should resign his office of mayor? Mr. Brown had been elected by an overwhelming majority of the people of Baltimore; he had performed his duties with ability, propriety, and strict impartiality. He is a man of unblemished character—a pure and christian gentleman—above all reproach, and, as it has been now discovered by his foul oppressors, above all fear. He will not resign the office entrusted to him by the will of the people, nor will he desert his brethren in confinement with him on any terms which can separate him from them. The cause of one is the holy cause of all, and they are determined to stand or fall together.

History will do justice to this noble band of patriots. A man could not desire a better fate than that his name should be coupled on the same page with theirs.

The Constitutionnel, under the title of "Mediation," has published a very remarkable article upon the ultimate consequences of the American war as connected with the European interests. The situation is so masterly and so ably pictured, that I cannot refrain from quoting its conclusion:—"En dehors this mediation so opportune, if we consider the European interests; so legitimate, if we look to the cause of humanity and civilization,—the American war foretells nothing but catastrophes, the end of which the most penetrating mind cannot foresee.

The fall of Richmond would no more advance the American affairs than the occupation of New Orleans. The South drowned in blood, the North plunged in anarchy and bankruptcy, industrial Europe groaning under its daily increasing sufferings—such are the consequences of the continuation of the war. Mediation, on the contrary, in putting a term to this fratricidal war, and consecrating an accomplished separation, without permitting one of the belligerents to destroy the other, and to spread desolation under the pretext of re-establishing peace, would render a most eminent service both to America and to Europe."

Why does not the Times muster the courage to join the Constitutionnel, to persuade the British Government to adopt also a policy of prompt and energetic mediation? In doing so the Times would better serve the interests of civilization, nay, of England itself, than in losing its time, breath, and talent in expatiating over England's loyalty towards the United States, and enumerating the United States' wrongs and ingratitude towards England.

The Times ought to know this day, or it will never know it hereafter, that each act of British forbearance, instead of abating the growing hostility of the United States, has but called forth from them other more violent insults and outrages towards England.

By this unaccountable weakness of her Government, England is fast losing her prestige, without even averting the danger of a war with the United States; for, either triumphant or vanquished, the Lincoln Administration will be under the imperious necessity of throwing the American troops in Canada, as the only means of getting rid of their undisciplined soldiery, whose presence in the States would seriously threaten personal security after the restoration of peace.

Each day, therefore, that elapses but increases this danger. The fortune of war seems now to smile upon the Confederates. Banks' army is annihilated and thrown over the Potomac, M'Dowell is by no means in a safe situation, Jackson and Ewell are hotly pursuing the disbanded and flying Federals. Another victory may soon bring the Southern armies before Washington, and enable them to dictate the terms of peace, thus leaving England solitary and alone to face her deadly foe, both in Canada and on the ocean.

From another Correspondent.

PARIS, June 9, 1862.

Since the departure of Said Pacha from Paris, the high official world speaks of nothing but of the favourable impression produced by the Egyptian Prince upon the Emperor and Empress. His liberality far exceeds that of all the kings and princes who visited Paris before him. On taking leave of the court, the Vice-King has remunerated the attentions extended to him with numerous and costly presents, some of which are valued at no less than 80,000 francs.

The precarious position of the Pope has by no means checked the intolerant dispositions of the high clergy of Paris. It has, on the contrary, provoked on their part an act of religious despotism without example in modern times.

The Italians residing in Paris wishing to commemorate the anniversary of the death of the Comte de Cavour by the celebration of a grand Mass, obtained the assent of M. de Nigra, their Minister-Plenipotentiary; raised the necessary funds, and appointed M. de Ferrari to organize this melancholy ceremony. Having called at the archbishopric to solicit the authorization required in such case, M. Ferrari was put off to the next day, when he was informed that a meeting of the vicars, held expressly to deliberate upon the matter, had unanimously decided to refuse his demand.

The clergy of Paris, in forgetting so readily this first command of the Lord, "Love one another," can hardly benefit the cause of the Pope. This denial to the friends of M. de Cavour evidently emanates from the highest quarters, for it is reported in Paris, upon the most undoubted authority, that the question of pronouncing an excommunication in the highest degree against Victor Emmanuel and his adherents, is now under discussion in the council of prelates assembled in Rome. It is further asserted, that the subjects of the King of Italy are to be freed from their oaths of allegiance to the crown.

The Baron de Rothschild has closed the dancing season with a grand and magnificent ball, given in honour of the bride, Madame Salomon de Rothschild, in his splendid villa of Boulogne. Illuminations, fireworks, flowers, decorations, gondolas, sliding on the Seine, which runs through his pleasure-grounds; nothing had been spared to give to this ball the aspect of an oriental and fairy fête.

The Moniteur, of the 5th instant, contains an official notification, to the effect that the Mexican ports of Campico and Alvarado are blockaded by the French navy, from and since the 1st day of last May.

Among the despatches brought to the French Government by the last United States' steamer, figures a most remarkable memoir, emanating from the Baron Mercier, the French Minister at Washington. It is said that the reading of this document has produced a deep impression upon the last Council of State held under the presidency of the Emperor. It enumerates, at length, the commercial advantages which France is to derive from its intervention in Mexico, and from the recognition of the Confederate States—the two wealthiest countries of the American continent. I heard, from a pretty good source, that the article of the Constitutionnel, of last Sunday, was but the echo of the sentiments expressed in the memoir of the Baron Mercier.

I understand that several petitions have already been sent to the Marechal Randon, Secretary of War, by individuals, praying to be allowed the privilege of opening several theatres in Mexico. One of the fortunate petitioners is said to be on his way to the Mexican capital with all the materials necessary to establish a magnificent circus. The others are soon to follow.

We certainly live in the age of discoveries; one succeeds to the other with such a rapidity that the scientific world is continually kept breathless.

The celebrated naval combat between the Monitor and the Virginia in Hampton Roads has hardly tested the real value of iron-cased ships; the military and naval officers have scarcely made their reports in the all-important case of gunboats versus fortifications, than out comes a new discovery, which is said to completely overthrow all the principles and ideas so far admitted with regard to the invulnerability of men-of-war.

This discovery is due to a mere artisan. This invention dispenses with iron sheeting. All the floating materiel now in use can be made available. Instead of burdening the ships with a heavy coat of iron, the inventor assumes to make them thoroughly impervious by the mere application of a thick coat of electro-chemical composition, to which he gives the name of repulsive coating, on account of its peculiar property to paralyze and deaden the shock of projectiles, even of the largest size.

The Duke of Montebello has left for Rome much earlier than was expected; his sudden departure is said to have been caused by the political character which the consistories are assuming.

Since the candidature of the Archduke Maximilian has been abandoned, it is now asserted that Mexico is to be placed under the protectorship of France. Mexico would thus become a sort of French colony. Whatever be the value of the different rumours now in circulation, one thing is certain—staff and topographical officers are daily leaving for Mexico, and orders have been issued from the War Department to several corps to hold themselves in readiness to embark at a moment's notice. Several regiments have also been ordered back from Africa to Brest and Toulon. The answer of Mr. Lincoln to the French Minister at Washington, with regard to the Mexico-American treaty, is presumed to have determined the French Government to ship to Mexico an army sufficiently strong to meet all future emergencies. Since the orders for reinforcements have been given, the recognition of the Confederate States by the Emperor seems to be generally considered as more and more probable. Indeed, some persons believe that it will be officially announced before the adjournment of the Corps Legislatif.

Nous verrons.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY ROTZ, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JUNE 12, 1862.

An Opportune Moment for Pacification.

FOURTEEN months ago, the whole North was effervescing with excitement at the sudden danger in which the capital was supposed to be from a rebel coup de main. The telegraphic wires flashed over the land appeals for troops, and the Governors of the States culminated proclamations for volunteers to defend Washington. After fourteen months of war, with hundreds of thousands on either side, we have an exact repetition of the same scene. Again the North quakes with alarm for the safety of its capital: again the wires flash appeal for immediate aid of troops: again the Governors of the States issue proclamations to the young men that may still be left behind to take up arms in defence of the seat of Government.

Is this not the time for the North to strike a balance of its losses and gains in the undertaking in which it so rashly engaged? What has been purchased with this frightful outlay of blood and treasure? A precarious foothold, which can be maintained only at the cost of continued victory, in a few border States of divided allegiance, and a few widely remote towns, the possession of which affords no promise of any political or commercial advantage. The main armies of the Confederates are still in the field, selecting their own vantage ground to inflict decisive blows. The main armies of the invaders are in a more critical situation than at any previous time during the war. Their very existence depends on the chances of a battle. After more than a twelvemonth of unparalleled efforts, the North is further from its goal than it was at the beginning. It is weaker in actual strength and recuperative resources; it is weaker in self-confidence, and its energy is rather that of despair than that of hope. It has burdened itself with a debt which it is alike ruinous to pay or to repudiate. It has sacrificed its own liberties in the vain attempt to subjugate those of others; and has undermined its political institutions as effectually as its material prosperity. The first symptoms of exhaustion have appeared, and the commercial barometer indicates, with unerring certainty, that the laws of finance and trade cannot be longer violated with impunity.

At this distance, we can only judge from aggregate results of the progress and prospects of the war. The accounts from the North have long since ceased to be a guide to an intelligent opinion. The accounts from the South, when they do come, come only when the interest felt in any particular event has been transferred to another. It is in the nature of all wars, and especially of a war on so exaggerated a scale, that there should be alternate successes and reverses. Armies advance and retreat according to the exigencies of their positions or strategic combinations, which are not intelligible to the imperfectly informed spectator thousands of miles away. As the North has the exclusive monopoly of furnishing us our periodical quantum of war news, we shall continue to hear of brilliant victories by the Federals, and disgraceful "flights" of the Confederates. Every Northern reverse which cannot be wholly concealed will be palliated by some Northern success, which needs but a slight foundation in truth, and this it can never be difficult to find on so vast a theatre of operations. Thus, by its own voice, the North will always be proclaimed victorious, always marching onward, though never nearer to the end. It is only by some such lightning flash, as at rare intervals breaks through the darkness, that Europe can obtain a momentary glimpse of the relative position of the combatants. Such a glimpse is afforded by the recent panic at the North. Not that the capital was in any danger, though it soon may be by the defeat of McClellan; but it shows the consciousness of the Northern Government and people of the want of solidity of their past successes and the precarious chances of the future. They feel and are like a chess-player whose opponent is within one move of check-mating him, and whose sole hope is in constantly giving check to that opponent. McClellan and Halleck not only attack the South, they at the same time defend the North. Behind them lies no reserve. No bulwark remains should they be swept away, to stay a retaliatory invasion. To what amount the boasted victories of the North so long as its fortunes are so perilously pendent on the chance of a battle? The additional levy of 50,000 men will not fill up the gaps in the regiments already in the field. Can it hope now to accomplish, with diminished strength and vigour, what appeared hopeless when its energies and credit were unimpaired?

The opportune moment, so often allowed to pass, has now recurred. Europe has it in its power by a single word firmly spoken, to stop the clash of arms. Surely Europe has the right, nay, it is a solemn duty, to speak that word. Let the united voice of the Great Powers say to the Government of Washington, "After fourteen months of sanguinary strife by which we were the patient sufferers, you still tremble for your capital before an enemy whom you represent to us as on the very brink of annihilation. The event has proved, beyond a doubt, that you are not warring against a body of rebels resisting a lawful authority, but against a brave and determined people with the same rights as yourselves, and with the same claims upon our humanity and justice. Humanity revolts at a causeless and resultless war; justice is outraged by the attempt at conquest of one people by another. The Confederate States have won the title to admission into the family of nations. That title you cannot longer dispute, except against the unanimous verdict of all Europe."

There are those who attach sufficient weight to the silly boasts of the Northern press to believe the North mad enough to defy the power of Europe, and challenge her to resort to force. This assumption is not worthy of refutation. The true friends of the North might well pray, and, no doubt, do pray, for an intervention that might stop the country in that headlong career to ruin in which it is powerless to stop itself. There are those, also, who believe that the more complete the ruin of both North and South might be, the more secure would be the peace of Europe. These forget that the true political interests of Europe lie in the formation of two States, each powerful enough to check the other, but its material interests demand the prosperity of both. We have heard the argument advanced that the North would be a more formidable foe if its vast armies were suddenly withdrawn from the South, than if a perfect conquest compelled the expenditure of those armies in a wholesale military occupation. It is suggested in the former case that the North might seek to compensate itself for its Southern losses by the acquisition of Canada. It is a somewhat bold stretch of the imagination to suppose that a government which has just failed in an attempt which no European Power opposed, would follow up that failure by a new attempt upon a territory equally vast and impenetrable, upon a people equally numerous and determined to resist, and against the most powerful monarchy in Europe. On the other hand, it is undeniable that the North dearly cherishes this chimera, and if successful at the South would undoubtedly lose no time in venturing upon the dangerous experiment. But the military strength of the South has proved itself, despite enormous disadvantages, a fair match for that of the North. With the South for her ally, England need fear nothing for her American dependencies; the more vulnerable these possessions are, the more necessary do they render the only alliance which can permanently ensure them against danger; the more pressing the danger, the greater the reason for seizing the opportune moment to enable the South to form the alliance.

Evacuation of Corinth.

THE War Department at Washington is ingenious and inventive. Every defeat sustained must be counterpoised by a victory; and if a real one is not obtainable, fictitious triumphs are always to be manufactured to order. The army of Halleck was long screened with extraordinary precautions from the inquisitive gaze of the public eye, in the vain hope that the expected disaster in that quarter might be counterpoised by some success in the East. Banks' defeat was known to leading banking firms in London and in Paris by the steamer preceding that which gave the news to the public. Nothing having "turned up" in the East to palliate the reverses there, a sudden change of tactics has become necessary, and it is from the West, from the distrusted army of Halleck, that comes the glorification in which the people of the North are to drown the mortification, and Europe to forget the disgrace, of yesterday's panic for the capital.

Halleck's despatches are proverbial. He reported "Island No. 10 is ours," a full month before the Federal gunboats dared venture within full range of its batteries. He reported the capture of a whole army at that place, with immense warlike stores; when the island had been quietly evacuated, all that was valuable removed or destroyed, and his prisoners numbered a little less than 400 sick and wounded. More recently he reported a naval victory near Fort Pillow, with glorious details, when the Federal fleet had been repulsed, with the destruction of two of its vessels. He now reports a tremendous victory of his own; the Confederate army, with Beauregard at its head, fleeing before his redoubtable presence without striking a blow, and strewing the roads with knapsacks and muskets from mere fright, though no one pursued. Strange that the valiant General does not even know where the fleeing army is, and has no thought of pursuit.

These evacuations are becoming familiar to us. They resemble each other as one egg another egg. They always take place when the Federal commanders have spent months in elaborate siege works, "fortifying as they advance," (vide Halleck's own despatches a few days previous to the evacuation becoming known, and McClellan's before Manassas, and afterwards before Yorktown); and when they have thus fortified themselves, ready to fall back within their trenches at the slightest reverse, they suddenly find the enemy "fled," without having given the slightest sign of his intention, or left word of his present whereabouts. His outpost fighting, it is then remembered, had of late become feeble. Strange, that the Federal generals should never have suspected the truth, until days after the retreat had taken place, and the outposts themselves followed the main body. It was so at Manassas, at Island No. 10, at Yorktown; and the event at Corinth proves that Halleck is not more acute than McClellan. Are there, then, no deserters from the Confederate army to betray the important secret—no stragglers to reveal whither the retreat has been directed? Perhaps those knapsacks and muskets which strew the road might indicate the way to Halleck, but he evidently distrusts that sign.

By a perverseness altogether their own, the "rebels" will never fight when the Federals have made up their minds to fight them, and industriously prepared themselves for the deed. So soon as the eye of the North is anxiously bent on a chosen battle-field, so soon as they have cautiously advanced, "fortifying themselves as they advanced," so soon as the heavy guns have been dragged to the spot, everything is ready for the spring—the mouse is gone,—“fled.” To an impartial spectator it does not appear wonderful that the Confederates should decline battle where victory would be fruitless, and only lead into ambushade; that they should delay their enemy by faint resistance, and evade him when all his preparations are complete, to meet him again on a more favourable ground; these tactics are not new, though they have never before been so successfully executed; but the North always affects on such occasions to go into frantic ecstasies of delight and triumph, and only interrupts its pœans to hurl threats and insults at Europe.

We considered Halleck doomed before; we have now arrived at absolute certainty. Just as a series of Confederate victories followed upon the evacuation of Yorktown, so will a series of victories follow that of Corinth. As in the former instance, the evacuation is the signal that the train is laid, and the match applied.

The Errors of the Past.

DURING its brief existence, it has been the object of this Journal, to the exclusion of many other topics with which we should gladly have shared our space, to prove, not by mere assertions or violent declamation, but by sober argument founded upon incontestable facts, that every motive of self-interest and of public policy combined to make England the friend and ally of the Southern States, that her attitude as a passive spectator of the contest in America was unworthy of her position among the nations of the earth, and that foreign Powers were impatiently awaiting her signal to add their moral and material weight to hers. We believe that public opinion is rapidly approaching, if it has not already ripened into, a concurrence with these views. The most influential of our British contemporaries a few days since spoke in terms of unmistakable significance. We quote from the Times of Saturday, 7th inst.

We have, to our own great and heavy loss, to the impoverishment of our revenue, to the crippling of our manufacturing interest, to the grievous want and misery of an innocent and heroic population, maintained between North and South a strict and honourable neutrality. Everybody knows that had we been disposed to interfere we should not have lacked the aid of the most valiant and powerful ally; that the wrong which we did would, for the moment at least, have been attended with the most perfect impunity. Everybody knows that for many years it has been the policy of the United States to compose their domestic difficulties by fastening a series of unprovoked quarrels on England. The Civil War offered us an opportunity to avenge the past and to invest ourselves with ample security for the future. It cannot be denied that it rested with this country to perpetuate the division of America into two Confederacies, and thus, in case of aggression from the one, to provide ourselves with a perpetual ally in the other. Pecuniary interest, resentment for past injuries, and the desire for security against future wrongs, all summoned us to intervene, and the misconduct of an American officer, and the culpable approbation given to his acts by Congress and the Government, furnished us with a complete pretext, according to the morality of the law of nations as hitherto practised and understood. But England seemed to avail herself of any such pretexts, and her moderation has enabled the North to gain those victories which have raised her people from despondency to the highest state of exultation.

The Times finds the reasons for the inaction of this country in a generous forbearing to the heavy misfortunes of a kindred people, and takes pride in what it considers the self-denying magnanimity of British policy. It concludes, however:—

We may possibly live to repeat our generosity. We may possibly live to find that our moderation has been displayed towards those who have no power to appreciate it. It might have been wiser to take security for ourselves instead of putting so much confidence in the fairness and good feeling of others. If this fact be established the error is still reparable. The North cannot see that we have done anything to entitle us, we do not say to gratitude or goodwill, but to abstinence from hatred and reviling. A change of policy on the part of this country would very speedily alter their opinion, and convince them of that which they seem now unable to conceive, that they have been treated by England as they never have treated her, and as, if she had thought more of her own interests and less of their misfortunes, she never would have treated them.

It is not our province to question the motives, though to us inexplicable, which have actuated the Government in remaining deaf alike to the appeals of obvious self-interest, and of that “most valiant and powerful ally,” who is even now reiterating his remonstrances against persistence in the same policy. If magnanimity was one of these motives, it seems strangely misplaced and misdirected. That magnanimity, our contemporary admits, has had for its effect to strengthen the strong and to weaken the weak. It has encouraged aggression, and would, but for a firm reliance in God and His justice, have disheartened the victim of that aggression. If the North is a kindred people, so is the South, and if favours could be claimed by that title, the South has a much better one than the North. Great Britain could be magnanimous in forgetting her own interests and declining to resent injuries done to herself, but she cannot be called magnanimous in permitting a great wrong to be perpetuated upon others.

It is strange how wholly the moral considerations involved in this American war have been kept out of the public view. Either the people of the Confederate States are mere riotous disturbers of public peace and order, whom it is a right and a duty to put down by force of arms; or they are a unanimous and determined people, asserting rights which they never forfeited by word or deed, which the British nation has often asserted, and which have never been disputed to any people in modern times. If the former, they should never have been recognized as belligerents, and the whole moral and, if necessary, the material force of Europe, should have arrayed itself on the side of order and of right. If the latter, then the North is engaged in an unholy undertaking, in which, for the sake of humanity and justice, it should be forbidden to proceed. The Great Powers are the constituted guardians of the world's peace. They are the supreme tribunal before which all international causes of right or wrong must be tried in the last resort. Their moral jurisdiction is not bounded by their political frontiers; but they have the right, and it is their duty to interfere to protect the weak, and to restrain the strong from usurpation. A country which confines itself wholly to its own material interests, and neglects this right, abdicates its pre-eminence as a first-class Power. Now, there has not been for 300 years, an international question on which the decision of the Great Powers of Europe has approached so near to unanimity. France, after long waiting for her tardy ally, has already taken the preliminary steps. Prussia and Austria are for once agreed in policy. Russia is ready to follow. England alone, the Power most interested, most competent for a decision, hesitates and retards the others.

It is now said, upon good authority, that the Government at last concurs with those of the other Powers about the necessity of intervention, but still differs as to the time and manner. Further delays, then, are to be interposed, and again they come from England. The errors of the past are thus to be repeated. The often-falsified promises of Mr. Seward are still to outweigh the evidence of facts. The insidious diplomacy of the Washington Government is, for the hundredth time, to prevail over the dictates of common sense and the counsels of all Europe.

The Productiveness of the South.

A CAREFULLY prepared and most instructive paper, under this title, was read before the Social Science Congress, on Monday last, by Mr. John B. Hopkins, of London. We give it elsewhere in extenso, with a summary of the discussion which ensued, and the result of which appears to have been a general assent to the correctness of Mr. Hopkins' figures, though not to all his deductions from them.

Mr. Hopkins has evidently studied, with conscientious care, the Census and Trade Returns of the late United States, and the fruit of his labour is a compilation, within a compendious form, and in striking juxtaposition, of most valuable and important statistics, which go far towards explaining the superhuman efforts of the North to retain within its grasp so invaluable a possession. This is probably the first time that an English audience has heard from the lips of an Englishman the full truth as to the relative position of the North and the South, as contributors to the wealth and grandeur of the American Republic. It had been commonly supposed that the North played the only really important part, and that its feverish energy and untiring activity were the sole causes of the progress which amazed Europe, while the South was considered as an inert and comparatively insignificant appendage.

Mr. Hopkins' undisputed and indisputable facts, which he states without colouring, with the dry mathematical logic of the statistician, prove the truth to be almost the precise opposite of this supposition. He shows that not only has the South furnished the great bulk of exportable productions which made the foreign commerce of the North what it came to be, but that she formed the chief basis of that lucrative internal commerce to which the United States were even more indebted for their material prosperity. He explodes the almost universal error that the South is as dependent upon the North for food, as the North is on her for the cargoes of her ships, and proves, by simple figures, that the Southern States—thanks to a more genial climate, or to a more economical system of labour, or to both—actually produce largely more food per head of its population than does the North, and is an exporter of grain, as well as of cotton, and tobacco, and naval stores.

The South has never been a large direct importer of European goods, because she naturally derived her foreign importations through the same agency which disposed of her exports. To what an enormous extent the North has, by a cunning commercial legislation, supplanted European goods in the Southern market by its own at higher price, we can only conjecture by our knowledge of the wants of a purely agricultural country almost wholly destitute of manufactures. Mr. Hopkins finds in the Census Returns the data for an approximate estimate, which the Trade Returns, devoted to foreign commerce alone, do not adequately afford. The Census proves, in a striking manner, the difference in the vocations of the two peoples. At the South certain trades are almost unknown, which abound in the other section. The number of shoemakers, tailors, hatters, cabinet-makers, and other artisans, is insignificant in the former, and vastly below the needs of the population, judged by known proportions. In the population of the North these crafts are unduly represented, and enormously beyond its own requirements. He therefore concludes, and rightly—as everyone will admit who is practically conversant with the facts—that the North in the past has not only been the general factor and banker of the South, but its tradesman and artisan as well. Hence every class of the Northern population, from the highest to the lowest, has a direct material interest that the South should not become a foreign country in the only sense in which it has not long been so to them.

But it is not to the Northern States of America alone that the South is a source of wealth; the whole of mankind have an interest in its peace and prosperity. Mr. Hopkins directs attention to the fact that in the products of which the South is the principal producer it also enjoys a peculiar excellence over all competitors. Its tobacco is not the most delicate in flavour, yet its flavour is that best adapted to the tastes of the mass of consumers. Tobacco is grown in almost every part of the world, yet every effort to imitate American tobacco, and thus to contest with it the place it now occupies in the world's commerce, has proved futile. Its wheat is the only Transatlantic grain the flour from which can be transported undamaged to tropical countries. The persistent efforts of twenty-five years, and a lavish expenditure in costly experiments, have demonstrated the fact that its monopoly of cotton production is as confirmed in regard to quality as it is in regard to quantity. Of all these great staples of commerce the South produces an immense surplus over its own wants, and this surplus, Mr. Hopkins rightly argues, enriches not itself alone, but all mankind. Suppose this region, on which nature has so bounteously bestowed her favours to lie waste and unproductive for even a series of years, can anyone point out what great interest of humanity would be the gainer thereby, or which one would not be a loser? Is there a branch of commerce or of industry which would not feel the shock, the chief source of supply of its principal staples being thus suddenly dried up?

Without adverting to the humanitarian aspects of the labour system of the South, Mr. Hopkins throws considerable light upon a question which has often puzzled the political economists. How is it that a country with a system of labour admitted to be the most wasteful can excel all other countries in the aggregate productions of its labour? Mr. Hopkins argues that the economy of consumption more than counterbalances the waste; that slave labour, if not cheaper to the individual employer, is cheaper to the community at large. Where the labourer receives his wages in money, a large non-producing class must act as the intermediary between himself and capital, to bring the necessities of life within his grasp. Slave labour, if it has no other merit, has at least this, that it dispenses with this non-productive class of petty traders in the necessities of life, since the labourer receives his wages in kind, and on the most favourable and economical terms. Besides, the community at large is saved from the burden of pauperism, unknown where the labourer receives according to his needs, and not according to his earnings, and where the sick, the aged, the crippled, the helpless, must be fed and clothed by the same hands which feed and clothe the young and strong. That Mr. Hopkins' idea is not an illusory one, is demonstrated by the rapid progress which the so-called co-operative system is rapidly making in various forms in every country of Europe.

We invite perusal of this paper, as sober and moderate in its statements, reliable in its facts and figures, and sound in its reasoning. Mr. Hopkins deserves the thanks of all who honestly desire the truth, whether it goes with or against preconceived opinions, by his painstaking and well-timed labour.

THE Federals endeavour to conceal the glorious Confederate triumph at Shiloh by asserting that comparatively few prisoners were captured. The number of officers taken is an excellent criterion of the number of men. We presume that Federal officers, like the officers in other services, do not give up their swords whilst they have men to command. First on the list of prisoners is Brigadier-General Prentiss, who said he would dine in Memphis, and has done so. The General was accompanied by quite a nice little corps of brother officers. The Confederates took into safe keeping four colonels, three lieutenant-colonels, three majors, three adjutants, thirty-seven captains, fifty-nine lieutenants, an orderly sergeant, a quartermaster, and a sergeant-major. The list we have summarized is not complete; but still it is large enough to show that the victory of Shiloh involved the capture of a large body of Federal troops.

NONE are so blind as those who will not use their eyes. Some weeks since, when the most absurd rumours were in circulation as to the object of M. Mercier's visit to Richmond, we gave a true and simple version of the affair. As we recited the main incidents upon the highest authority, it is not a matter of surprise that so far our statements should be verified by subsequent revelations; but it is somewhat curious that, in reference to details, and which were to some extent deductions, if not speculations, we were verbally accurate. On the 22nd May we published a leader on "French Diplomacy in America," in which occurred the following passages:—

We have a theory of our own, which seems to us the only one that can make these apparent absurdities intelligible. According to this theory, M. Mercier acted upon instructions received direct from the Emperor, and not transmitted through the usual diplomatic channels. This would enable M. Thouvenel to reply truthfully to the inquiries which could not fail to be made by the English Ambassador at Paris, that he knew nothing of M. Mercier's object or intentions, and that no instructions had been forwarded to him from the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. M. Mercier's report would necessarily go to the same quarter from which his instructions were received.

So far, our theory of the play is consistent with the known characters of the dramatis personæ. To apply it to the second act, we must endeavour to borrow a little Scotch second sight. Let us then imagine M. Mercier, having received his instructions, to cast about for a plausible pretence to carry them out. He has an interview with Mr. Seward. With true French candour, he represents to the Federal Secretary of State that Europe begins to entertain great doubts about the speedy termination of the war; that the accounts from the South are unsatisfactory and contradictory; and that he is seriously meditating to ascertain in person what the true condition of the "rebels" is, and what the real policy of their leaders. Mr. Seward, putting the best face on a disagreeable matter, assures the French Ambassador that the Government of the United States can have no possible objection to his giving himself so much unnecessary trouble.

A semi-official Washington despatch has been published, which says:—

Permission has been given to state the facts in regard to the French Minister's visit to Richmond. M. Mercier had no instructions from his Government, nor had it the least knowledge of his intention to go to Richmond. M. Mercier, in conversing with Mr. Seward, expressed his regret that he could not see Richmond, and judge for himself the views and expectations of the insurgents. Mr. Seward said he could go without any objection from this Government; that he wished every foreign Minister would go and see for himself how hopeless the insurrection was.

We were correct in assuming M. Mercier's course of action; and we could hardly have been more precise if we had been present at the interview between the French Minister and Mr. Seward.

As to our assertion that M. Mercier received his instructions direct from the Emperor, we quote the following from the Savannah Republican of May 14:—

Various and conflicting are the speculations with regard to the object of the French Minister to the United States in his recent visit to the Confederate capital. From a source higher, perhaps, than any from which the various remarks afloat have been drawn, we learn the following:—

"The visit of M. Mercier to Richmond was at the instance of the French Emperor, and its object was to bring about a pacification between the Confederate States and the United States."

We may further remark that the Times looks upon the semi-official article on "Mediation," which has appeared in the Constitutionnel as a result of M. Mercier's mission.

IN our notes will be found the text of an order issued by General Butler, licensing the Federal soldiers to treat the ladies of New Orleans as prostitutes if their "words, gestures, or movements" are displeasing to Yankee taste. Language is too poor to adequately stigmatize conduct that has caused a universal thrill of disgust, that degrades humanity, and that would be deemed execrable by savages. Why did General Butler promulgate such an edict? Not to increase the animosity of the South, for he knows as well as we do it needs no stimulus. We can suggest no other motive than the gratification of an insane, fiendish malignity. The Northern press, on the first intimation of the order, denounced it, and we believe the Federals will unanimously condemn the diabolical proceeding. We trust it may be promptly annulled, and its author degraded, for otherwise, it will call for deadly, lasting, and yet sanctified, vengeance on the part of the men of the South.

IN the Paris correspondence, in our last issue, the name of the French translator of Mr. Spence's admirable book, "The American Union," was misprinted. It should have been Mr. Edmond Begouen.

"THREE Months in the Confederate Army" will be continued next week. The publication of "The Cruise of the Sumter" is, for the present, unavoidably postponed.

The South in the Social Science Congress.

THE following Paper, by Mr. John B. Hopkins, was read at the meeting of the Social Science Congress on Monday last, in the Sixth Department. Dr. Travers Twiss, the eminent Civilian, presided:—

I believe in this paper I have written nothing but the truth, but I cannot add the whole truth. If any Southerners are present, or any persons acquainted with the resources of the South, I shall, doubtless, be accused of grave sins of omission. I unhesitatingly plead guilty. The time I am privileged to address you is necessarily so short that I cannot even allude to many matters having an important bearing on the subject. Still, despite the vastness of my theme, and the imperfectness of my treatment of it, I doubt not I shall be favoured with your earnest attention, seeing that I have to discuss a question which concerns all classes of all communities, but which in a special manner concerns the welfare of English artisans and of English commerce.

The area of the Southern States is equal to 1,094,571 square miles. Putting aside the Border States, now held by military occupation, I may observe that the Confederate States—having an area of 833,144 square miles—are rather more than seven times larger than the United Kingdom. I have heard persons, who, perhaps, were looking at America through her population, speak of the States as though they were comparable to English counties or French departments. Yet surely with regard to their territorial claims to sovereignty there can be no dispute. Alabama and Florida are severally as large as England. Texas is nearly five times as large as England, three times the size of Great Britain, and nearly twice the size of the United Kingdom. The smallest of the States, as to territorial proportions, is equal to an important European kingdom. And let it be remembered that this vast area does not include sterile wastes and arid deserts. The proportion of unprofitable land is unsurpassedly small. The uncultivated lands teem with latent plenty, and only wait for the labour of man to yield abundant harvests.

The population of the Southern States is about fourteen millions. Unfortunately, the census for 1860 has not been published, and therefore I can only give the probable population. Taking the census of 1850, the census of some of the States made since then, and allowing for the usual rate of increase, the estimate exceeds rather than falls short of thirteen millions and a half. I may here observe that the special fecundity of the South extends to the human race. The population of the South increases more rapidly than that of the North, excluding, of course, the hordes of emigrants that are attracted to the latter. The population of the territory under the sway of the Confederate Government, has been variously stated. I estimate it at ten millions and a half, of which rather more than seven millions are whites, and rather less than three millions and a half are negroes. Two hundred millions must be added to the population of the Southern States before it equals in density the present population of the United Kingdom. We marvel at the wealth of the South, yet it is in the infancy of its development.

I need not dwell on the variety of climate in the South. For example, since the commencement of the war, the South has supplied herself with ice, and she can, and does, produce all the necessities and many of the luxuries of life abundantly, and in a high degree of perfection.

It has been supposed, because the South grows so much cotton that she produces little else. It has further been assumed that the South depended on the North for her supplies of grain and other articles of food. These conclusions are completely false, as I propose to show by a reference to the United States' census for 1850, and before doing so, I should remark, that the absolute and relative productiveness of the South has wonderfully increased in the last twelve years.

In 1850, the population of the South was nine millions and a half, and of the North (I include the West), thirteen millions and a half. In that year the South produced grains which constitute food to the value of 307,328,112 dollars; of other produce (not including cotton) 46,305,950 dollars; value of slaughtered animals, 54,398,015 dollars; giving a total value of 408,030,077 dollars. The North and West produced in grains which constitute food to the value of 305,769,963 dollars; that is, 1,557,149 dollars less than the South; but, allowing for the difference of population, the North and West produced of grains which constitute food nearly 50 per cent. less than the South. The consumption per head of bread-stuff's in the North and West is equal to, if not rather in excess of, the consumption per head in the South. What, then, becomes of the surplus of the South, or how is the Northern deficiency supplied? Why, instead of the South being dependent on the North, the latter section receives sufficient from the former to supply its deficiency for home consumption, and to enable it to do a considerable export trade in grain and flour.

Of other agricultural products, the North and West raised, in 1850, to the value of 178,904,527 dollars, being 132,600,577 dollars more than the South, which, even allowing for the difference of population, is a large excess. But observe, that hay is included in this return, of which the Northern and Western production was valued at 127,008,580 dollars, and the Southern at 11,377,846 dollars. At the same time, the number of head of live stock in the South was 40,823,727, and in the other sections, 36,409,134. That is, the value of hay in the North exceeded the value of hay in the South by 132,600,577 dollars, whilst the South had 4,414,000 head of live stock more than the North. Animals in the South do not eat less than in the North, but in the South there is no need to make hay, in consequence of the continued mildness of the seasons and the unceasing verdure. I therefore maintain, hay ought not to be estimated as wealth by the Northern States. The necessity of haymaking is a heavy tax upon Northern labour, which the South escapes. Deducting, then, from both sides the value of hay crops, the agricultural produce (excluding grains which constitute food) of the South (excluding cotton) was 34,426,104 dollars, and of the North and West, 46,303,950 dollars. Correcting these results by population, it makes the return of North and West deficient by about 16,000,000 dollars. The value of animals slaughtered in the North and West was 56,990,237 dollars, being 2,592,222 dollars more than the South. Correcting these returns by population, the North and West show a comparative deficiency of about 21,000,000 dollars. Permit me now to sum up these statements and treat them in the aggregate. The total value of the agricultural products of the South (not including cotton), was 408,030,077 dollars; of the North and West, 541,663,717 dollars, being nearly a dollar per head of the population in favour of the South. But these returns are inaccurate until we have deducted the returns for hay, or allowed an equivalent for Southern grass, that needs neither mowing nor storing. Well, then, less the hay, the returns are;—for the South, 396,652,231 dollars; for the North and West, 409,063,140 dollars, giving for the latter an average of thirty dollars per head, and to the former forty-two dollars per head. The average for the North alone is twenty-four dollars, and of grain which constitutes food only fifteen dollars per head. These figures are, I presume, conclusive. Allow the absurd fallacy that the necessity, the compulsion, to make hay is a source of wealth, and making no allowance for the winter food, the perennial grass of the South, not taking into account the cotton crop, which, in 1859, sold for 233,500,000 dollars, still the South is more productive than the North and West. It is true, for the convenience of transit, the West supplies the South with grain, but the South, to a much greater extent, sends grain to the North.

The North is a manufacturing, trading country; and it is idle to pretend to the character of an agricultural country. The North has not only done the shipping and brokering of the South, but it has been its bootmaker, its hatter, its tailor, its cabinet maker, &c. It has not only been its factor, but its tradesman. The South, of course, has had to pay an import profit; and the Southerners are periodical absentees, and when away from home, are profuse in their expenditure. They have also managed to build 9000 miles of railroad without getting into debt. I think, besides, the productiveness of the South, there is another reason for the rapid accumulation of wealth, despite her extravagance. Slave labour is undeniably the most wasteful of all labour. If white men could be employed on cotton plantations, they would accomplish, at least, twice as much work as negroes, and the work would be better done. A cotton field after being picked by negroes, looks white with harvest, and, I am told by planters, the waste is serious. On the other hand, slave labour is economical in consumption. In the South the remuneration of the labourer does not include the profits of shopkeepers, who are de facto non-producers, and stand between the merchant and the consumer. The planter buys his pork, whisky, and tobacco, &c., at the wholesale prices; and in the South, sweet potatoes, melons, and other articles of food, are produced abundantly, on land and with labour, that would otherwise remain unemployed. Slave labour, then, I repeat, is wasteful in production, but economical in consumption, because it does not need or foster a large non-producing class. The establishment of co-operative stores in this country is an attempt to effect a like saving.

The United States exports, in 1859, amounted to 278,392,080 dollars. The following were of Southern origin:—

	Dollars.
Cotton...	161,434,923
Tobacco ...	21,074,038
Rice ...	2,207,148
Naval Stores ...	3,695,474
Sugar ...	196,735
Molasses ...	75,699
Hemp ...	9,227
	188,693,496

Leaving the exports of Northern origin equal to 89,698,584 dollars. That is, with a population nearly 50 per cent. greater, the exports of the North are more than 100 per cent. less than those of the South. If I am asked what becomes of Northern industry, I reply that it finds a market in the South. In 1850, the sales of domestic manufactures to the South exceeded 146,000,000 dollars. Since then the manufactures of the North have risen 50 per cent., and the demand of the South has made equal, if not superior, progress. It is, then, not hazardous to put down the Southern consumption of Northern manufactures in 1859 at 240,000,000 dollars. Still it must not be supposed that the South does not manufacture. According to the census of 1850, the value of Southern manufactures in that year amounted to 164,579,937 dollars. It must also be remembered that high protective duties have given the Northern manufacturers the monopoly of the Southern market.

I now come to Cotton, the great staple of the South. We have lately been pressed with these questions—"Is Cotton King? Can we make ourselves independent of the cotton-fields of the Southern States?"

What is the genius of modern civilization? What is its motive power? What has covered the seas with ships, the land with railroads and telegraphs, and made heretofore distant nations near neighbours? What has caused the vast difference between the state of society in the sixteenth and nineteenth centuries? I reply, commerce. I say, reverently, that commerce is the chosen apostle of Christianity and civilization. And have you reflected on what is commerce? It means the trade in cotton, sugar, tea, coffee, and tobacco. Our forefathers did without these articles, and so there is reason for saying they are not prime necessities of life; but they are the necessities of modern commerce and civilization. Do away with them, and the world must return to the status of the sixteenth century. Cotton, sugar, tea, coffee, and tobacco, are the kings of commerce—and the greatest of them is cotton. Bread is the staff of life, and cotton is the staff of civilization. We might exist without one or the other, but not without deterioration. Cotton is a king whom it is difficult to depose, and impossible to replace.

Can we make ourselves independent of the Southern States of America? Can we give up that source of supply without permanent detriment to our manufacturing interests? There are two things that prevent an affirmative reply. The first is the quality, and the second the quantity, of cotton produced in America.

The South is remarkable for the specialty of its products. The Carolina rice has never been reproduced in other parts of the earth. The wheat of Virginia, besides yielding more flour than any other American wheat, has a quality that preserves it sweet in warm climates. So with tobacco. It may be grown almost anywhere. It is grown in the East Indies, in Germany, and but for the excise laws it would be cultivated in England. But do what you will, you cannot reproduce the Southern States' tobacco. You get much finer tobacco at Havannah, but Maryland, Virginia, and Kentucky tobaccos suit the taste of the million, and, whatever their price, they command a market. It is precisely the same with cotton. I know it can be grown in the East Indies, in the West Indies, in Africa, and other places; but I also know that till now, despite the most costly and painstaking experiments, cotton similar to the cotton of the Southern States has not been produced out of the Southern States. The Jamaica Cotton Company has lately shown specimens of cotton which they say is peculiarly fine. That does not solve the difficulty. They have not reproduced the American cotton—the cotton that meets the requirements of the million.

But quantity is a still stronger barrier than quality against the world ever becoming independent of the cotton fields of the Southern States. The Southern States only produce more cotton than they consume. Those who talk about a supply of cotton from India, to compensate for the loss of the supplies from America, do not read or consider those invaluable statistics—trade returns. In 1857, Great Britain received from the United States 654,758,048 pounds of cotton, and shipped to the United States 154,818,134 yards of plain and dyed goods. In the same year Great Britain received 250,338,144 pounds of cotton from the East Indies, and shipped to the East Indies 791,537,041 yards of plain and dyed goods. That is, Great Britain received 150 per cent. more cotton from America than from India, and yet exported five times as much cotton fabric to India as to America.

In 1853, our receipts of cotton from India were 132,722,575 pounds, and the same year we sent to India 223,000,000 pounds of cotton fabrics. So that cotton producing countries, as well as those countries that do not grow cotton, are dependent on the American supplies.

A very singular suggestion has been made in reference to the surplus production of the Southern States. It has been hinted, rather than argued, that we should be gainers if the States consumed a much cotton as they grew. To state the proposition is enough to refute it. Our manufacturers may reasonably regret and complain that the Southern markets have been closed against them by prohibitory tariffs; but I am at a loss to understand how we should be gainers if the South produced no more cotton than she consumed. We certainly should not have a pound of cotton more to manufacture, and we should not get more profit by selling to America than to India and China. Besides, the foundation of commerce is an exchange of over-productiveness. The business of the merchant is to exchange surplus productions. However large the quantity of cotton produced by the South, it will be bartered for the surplus productions of other countries; for the gold that pays for it is only the representative of those surplus productions. Would it be better if countries that now export wheat grew no more than they consume? The more cotton or the more wheat produced, the better it is for the whole world. Supply, as well as demand, governs price, and abundance means cheapness.

I see no objection to extensively cultivate cotton in India, or elsewhere, but it appears to me absurd in the last degree to think that it is possible to alter providential arrangements, and I think we cannot avoid the conclusion that the South is the destined cotton field of the world. I say this not only in regard to the quality of cotton produced, or even with regard to its present immense production; but because the productiveness of the Southern States is practically unlimited. The area of the cotton-growing States (North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Tennessee, Arkansas, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas), is 452,024,320 acres, and it is estimated that at least half is suitable for the cultivation of cotton. The average production of cotton is 250 pounds per acre. If, then, the whole of the available area was cultivated, it would yield a crop of 56,506,000,000 pounds of cotton. The consumption of cotton in England is not quite ten pounds per head, and in France it is about four pounds per head. Assuming, then, that there are 1,200,000,000 of people on the earth, and that the general consumption of cotton equalled the present unsurpassed consumption of England, it would only require about a fifth of the produce of the Southern States to supply the whole world. I repeat, that one-fifth of the cotton lands of the Southern States, being cultivated, would supply the demands of the whole world, even if the consumption was everywhere equal to our large consumption in England.

Make ourselves independent of the Southern States! Rather let us return hearty thanks to the Creator for His goodness in so abundantly supplying the needs of His creatures. Imagine the Southern States, by some means or other, reduced to an unproductive waste; or, if you will, engulfed in the ocean. What then? Why, man would lose one of the fairest portions of his patrimony. Mankind at large would become poorer. The sun would not rise on a homestead that did not suffer from the catastrophe. Commerce would dwindle; the onward course of civilization would be rudely stopped.

You cannot imagine the Southern States being permanently lost to the world? Well, suppose for ten, or even five, years the Southern States do not yield their harvest. What, I ask, would be the consequence of five years eclipse of the Southern States? I cannot adequately answer the question. It would mortally wound the commerce of this country, of Europe, and of the world. We should have in our midst a large army of paupers. We should see an end to the prosperity with which we have been so greatly blessed. In the train of poverty would come demoralization and anarchy. May God avert the dire calamity, of which we have even now a terrible foretaste! Five years of cotton famine, and no Egypt to assist us! We may well pray for the end of a sanguinary conflict, which harms the whole world, but especially afflicts us.

The Rev. E. LACHLIN TAYLOR, Toronto, Canada, said he would be very willing to speak for a few minutes on this subject, but the ground was somewhat dangerous, as the people of Canada felt very strongly on the present American differences, and he was afraid to trust himself on an occasion like this, lest he should be tempted to diverge into politics, which he knew were foreign to the objects of the department.

Dr. MACCOWAN, M.D., expressed his opinion that the integrity of the Union would secure to England a better supply of cotton than the dismemberment of the Union. He knew that Mr. Hopkins would not adduce statistics that were not reliable. He presumed that in the returns of tobacco, &c., Mr. Hopkins included the productions of the Border States.

Mr. POLLARD URQUHART, M.P., understood the scope of Mr. Hopkins's observations to be that the productiveness of the North was much less than that of the South. South America might produce more raw material than North America; but the North, by exchanging the products of their manufacturing industry, could procure more raw material than if they attempted to raise it themselves.

Mr. J. H. RAPLE, Manchester, wished to know from Mr. Hopkins to what extent slave labour was cheaper than free labour. The Manchester people were all of opinion that it would be a desirable thing if every man was free; but it was also very desirable to know how much a pound additional this freedom would cost the Manchester men for their cotton.

Mr. HOPKINS said that from the calculations he had made, which he thought were very near the truth, slave labour would be 15 per cent. cheaper than free labour.

Mr. J. H. RAPLE believed that was a fair calculation.

A GENTLEMAN wished to know if free labour was possible in the Southern States of America?

Mr. HOPKINS: White labour is utterly impossible in the South American cotton fields. He was not, however, prepared to say whether free black labour could not be made available.

Several speakers alluded to the capabilities of India to supply Europe with cotton.

Mr. HOPKINS was surprised to hear a gentleman speak of the cultivation of cotton in India being in its infancy. Such a remark, in point of time, was more applicable to America. Admitting that there was an immense area in India fitted for the cultivation of cotton, and that cotton suitable for the English market could be grown; that there was an abundant supply of labour at hand, and, as Mr. Raple had stated, the water communication of India was as good as in the Southern States, how was it India had not, ere this, produced the requisite supplies? There had been no lack of encouragement. There had always been the premium of high prices, if India could produce the article. As with all the means, India had not, it was but reasonable to conclude she could not, and would not, supply Europe with cotton.

After a brief conversation, Mr. Hopkins received the thanks of the meeting.

ACCOUNT OF THE GUNBOAT FIGHT AT FORT HUGER.

(From the Richmond Dispatch, May 10.)

FORT HUGER, HANOR'S BLUFF, May 8, 1862.

Three of the enemy's gunboats, two of them iron-clad, came up at eight o'clock this morning to Fort Boykin (commanded by Captain John U. Shivers), and opened fire, discharging about 300 rounds of shell and rifle shot. The fort, which had only five mounted guns, returned the fire until ten o'clock, when orders were given to spike the guns and burn the quarters. A fine company of light artillery and infantry had started from Smithfield, Isle of Wight county, to participate in the fight; but learning that the above orders had been given they returned. The three gunboats then moved up the river eight miles to the fort on Hardy's Bluff, and at eleven o'clock the guns at this fort opened fire, which was returned by the boats continually until two o'clock. After firing over 200 rounds of shell and rifle, they passed up the river out of range of the guns at the fort, we having fired the first and last gun. Our flag waved gloriously throughout the engagement. Not a man was killed in the fort, and only three were wounded.

Captain J. M. Maury (Captain of the Fort), during the entire engagement of three hours and a half, was as cool and collected as if only performing the daily practising of his guns on the fort; also, Captain J. H. Aikin, of the Varina Artillery, and Captain Branch, of White's Artillery, and their respective officers; all their names I did not learn; nor can too much praise be given to the men in each company, obeying every order from their officers bravely and cheerfully, as if they had faced a hundred battles instead of this their first battle. It would have pleased their friends to have witnessed how gallantly they fought. After the battle, Captain Maury caused the men to be drawn up in a line in the fort, and stated if there was a man that did not wish to remain in the fort and fight with him, to step out of the ranks, and he would allow him to leave the fort and get out of the range of the guns. Not a man moved, not an eye quivered; but they replied with one universal cry of "No! no! no! we'll fight!" Can such men be conquered?

Reviews.

A HISTORICAL PARALLEL. *

No. iv.

IN 1575, there was an abortive attempt to put an end to hostilities. Philip was heartily tired of a war from which he derived no glory, and which was a heavy and continuous drain upon the Imperial Exchequer; and, therefore, his Majesty would consent to the departure of the Spanish soldiery, provided the Estates would simultaneously disband their own foreign troops; but his Majesty would not concede liberty of conscience, and bargained for the exile of dissenters. In short, the King would make peace, provided the people would give up the liberty for which they had been so vehemently contending. The States declined the royal terms, and the negotiations were closed. When a nation determines to be independent, a peace that does not include independence is impossible. A rebellion may be compromised, but when the political union between distant races is severed, reunion is an idle dream; for reunion implies the serfdom of one side or the other.

The same year the Spaniards possessed themselves of Duiveland, and laid siege to Zierikzee, thus cutting off the communication between Walcheren and the rest of Zeland. The position was harassing, and William determined to make another effort to get foreign aid to contend against the enormous power of Spain. To do this, it became necessary to throw off their allegiance to Philip. It was resolved unanimously by the nobles and cities "that they would forsake the King, and seek foreign assistance; referring the choice to the Prince, who in regard to the Government was to take the opinion of the Estates." Even this step was singularly conservative in its character. It involved no change in the form of government. The King was abandoned, because he was "a tyrant who sought to oppress and destroy his subjects, and that it behoved them to seek another protector." The severance from Spain was not the result of a desire for new privileges, but for the preservation of old privileges. So with the Southern States of America. They left the Union because the Union had proved unfaithful to the Federal compact. The seceded States, in the due exercise of their Sovereignty, formed a Confederacy for the maintenance of their rights. As long as possible secession was delayed, perhaps too long; and when it came, so far from being regarded as a revolution, so far from being a conspiracy, it was looked upon as such an unmistakably constitutional proceeding that warfare was not contemplated, and no preparations were made to defend the sovereign independence of the States. If the Southerners had contemplated the probability of a Northern invasion, they might, by organization and by furnishing themselves with the munitions of war, have prevented hostilities. It was the unpreparedness of the South that suggested to the North the scheme of spoliation. A dastardly advantage has been taken of constitutional and generous confidence.

Philip, being discarded, there was witnessed the curious spectacle of a kingdom going begging. The Queen of England would not give a decided answer. The sovereignty of Holland and Zeland was tempting, but then the wrath of the King of Spain was not to be incurred for the sake of a dominion that must at first be a source of expenditure. But for the jealousy lest France should accept the sovereignty, the Queen would, in all probability have granted the prayer of Requesens, "to give no heed to the prayers of the rebels, to enter into no negotiations with them, and to expel them at once from her kingdom." Finally, all the States could get from Elizabeth was the promise of reconsidering the offer if she found it impossible to reconcile the provinces to Philip; and at the same time she gave them "permission to defend Holland at their own expense, with the privilege of surrendering its sovereignty, if they liked, to Queen Elizabeth—and this was all."

And, in our opinion, enough for the provinces; the Queen of England, not Holland, lost honour and strength by the non-success of the negotiation. The little provinces had to win their independence, and it was better that, for awhile, they should stand alone.

In 1576, a new and stronger union was formed by the Estates of the two provinces.

Those Estates, consisting of the knights and nobles of Holland, with the deputies from the cities and countships of Holland and Zeland, had been duly summoned by the Prince of Orange. They as fairly included all the political capacities, and furnished as copious a representation of the national will, as could be expected, for it is apparent, upon every page of his history, that the Prince, upon all occasions, chose to refer his policy to the approval and confirmation of as large a portion of the people as any man in those days considered capable or desirous of exercising political functions.

* The Rise of the Dutch Republic. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. History of the United Netherlands. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. London: John Murray.

And we venture to add, that if William the Silent had lived in these days, and been called upon to form a Government for his country, he would not have resorted to universal suffrage. He would not have consulted men who were incapable, however desirous, of exercising political functions. He would not have thought it wise to give ignorance a voice in the Government of the country. Mr. Motley admits that the provincial liberties "were practical and substantial," and we presume such liberties are better than a charter of freedom which consigns a country to the tyranny of the mob.

We now come to an event which deserves the serious consideration of Mr. Motley's countrymen.

No sooner was Zierickzee captured than a mutiny broke forth among several companies of Spaniards and Walloons, belonging to the army in Schouwen. A large number of the most influential officers had gone to Brussels, to make arrangements, if possible, for the payment of the troops. In their absence there was more scope for the arguments of the leading mutineers;—arguments assuredly not entirely destitute of justice or logical precision. If ever labourers were worthy of their hire, certainly it was the Spanish soldiery. Had they not done the work of demons for nine years long? Could Philip or Alva have found in the wide world men to execute their decrees with more unhesitating docility, with more sympathizing eagerness? What obstacle had ever given them pause in their career of duty? What element had they not braved? Had not they fought within the bowels of the earth, beneath the depths of the sea, within blazing cities, and upon fields of ice? Where was the work which had been too dark and bloody for their performance? Had they not slaughtered unarmed human beings by townfuls, at the word of command? Had they not eaten the flesh and drank the hearts' blood of their enemies? Had they not stained the house of God with wholesale massacre? What altar and what hearthstone had they not profaned? What fatigue, what danger, what crime, had ever checked them for a moment? And for all this obedience, labour, and bloodshed, were they not even to be paid such wages as the commonest clown, who only tore the earth at home, received? Did Philip believe that a few thousand Spaniards were to execute his sentence of death against 3,000,000 of Netherlands, and be cheated out of their pay at last?

Neither expostulations nor threats could allay the mutinous spirit of the soldiery. The officers were imprisoned. Alost, in Flanders, was captured; the inhabitants were butchered, and, of course, the town was pillaged. At length the Spanish officers began to side with the mutinous troops. Jerome de Roda assumed the governorship of the Netherlands, until the arrival of Don John; "being called upon to choose between rebellious Netherlands and mutinous Spaniards, he was not long in making up his mind." The consummation of the mutiny was the capture of Antwerp, and such a massacre as defies description.

Never was there a more monstrous massacre, even in the blood-stained history of the Netherlands. It was estimated that, in the course of this and the two following days, not less than 8000 human beings were murdered. The Spaniards seemed to cast off even the vizard of humanity. Hell seemed emptied of its fiends. Night fell upon the scene before the soldiers were masters of the city; but worse horrors began after the contest was ended. This army of brigands had come thither with a definite, practical purpose, for it was not blood-thirst, nor lust, nor revenge, which had impelled them, but it was greediness for gold. The fire, spreading more extensively and more rapidly than had been desired through the wealthiest quarter of the city, had unfortunately devoured a vast amount of property. Six millions, at least, had thus been swallowed; destruction by which no one had profited. There was, however, much left. The strong boxes of the merchants, the gold, silver, and precious jewellery, the velvets, satins, brocades, laces, and similar well-concentrated and portable plunder, were rapidly appropriated. So far the course was plain and easy, but in private houses it was more difficult. The cash, plate, and other valuables of individuals were not so easily discovered. Torture was, therefore, at once employed to discover the hidden treasures. After all had been given, if the sum seemed too little, the proprietors were brutally punished for their poverty or their supposed dissimulation.

On the morning of the 5th of November, Antwerp presented a ghastly sight. The magnificent marble Town-house, celebrated as a "world's wonder," even in that age and country, in which so much splendour was lavished on municipal palaces, stood a blackened ruin—all but the walls destroyed, while its archives, accounts, and other valuable contents, had perished. The more splendid portion of the city had been consumed; at least five hundred palaces, mostly of marble or hammered stone, being a smouldering mass of destruction. The dead bodies of those fallen in the massacre were on every side, in greatest profusion around the Place de Meer, among the Gothic pillars of the Exchange, and in the streets near the Town-house. The German soldiers lay in their armour, some with their heads burned from their bodies, some with legs and arms consumed by the flames through which they had fought. The Margrave Goswin Vreycck, the burgomaster Van der Merre, the magistrates Lancelot Van Urselen, Nicholas Van Boekholt, and other leading citizens, lay among piles of less distinguished slain. They remained unburied until the overseers of the poor, on whom the living had then more important claims than the dead, were compelled by Roda to bury them out of the pauper fund. The murderers were too thrifty to be at funeral charges for their victims. The ceremony was not hastily performed, for the number of corpses had not been completed. Two days longer the havoc lasted in the city. Of all the crimes which men can commit, whether from deliberate calculation or in the frenzy of passion, hardly one was omitted, for riot, gaming, rape, which had been positioned to the more stringent claims of robbery and murder, were now rapidly added to the sum of atrocities. History has recorded the account indelibly on her brazen tablets; it can be adjusted only at the judgment-seat above.

How long will the Government of the United States be able to restrain the license of its soldiery? Already the most savage edicts are issued by Federal commanders, and which must utterly demoralize the Federal soldiers. The most ruthless Spanish general in the sixteenth century would rather have cut off his right hand than have signed such an infamous proclamation as that issued by General Butler, authorizing his soldiers to treat the Southern women as harlots. The whole history of Spanish cruelty in the Netherlands does not afford such an instance of cold-blooded infamy. Well, when the war is over, what will the Federal Government do with its soldiers, who are being thus made as inhumanly savage as it is possible? There cannot be a statesman in the United States who believes that they can be quartered on the South. If the three millions in the Netherlands could not be subjugated by the power of Spain—a power which at that period overawed the world—there cannot be the most distant prospect of the seven millions of the South being subjugated by the Yankees. A foreign war will be tried, but that, though the only, will prove but a temporary expedient. In the end there will be the clamorous, mutinous demand for pay and plunder. And what guarantee is there that the mutiny will not end by the conquest of the civil Government, and the erection of a military despotism—not, as some of the Northerners are prepared for, the military despotism of a successful commander, but the despotism of soldiery? But when men's passions are excited by unjust war, there is no chance of their listening to warnings, be they ever so significant.

Whilst Antwerp was in the power of the insurgent troops, the Congress at Ghent, which had been brought about by the Prince, was stimulated by the massacre at Antwerp, and forthwith a treaty was concluded between all the States.

This important instrument, by which the sacrifices and exertions of the Prince were, for a brief season, at least, rewarded, contained twenty-five articles. The Prince of Orange, with the Estates of Holland and Zealand, on the one side, and the provinces signing, or thereafter to sign the treaty, on the other, agreed that there should be a mutual forgiving and forgetting, as regarded the past. They vowed a close and faithful friendship for the future. They plighted a mutual promise to expel the Spaniards from the Netherlands without delay. As soon as this great deed should be done, there was to be a convocation of the States-general, on the basis of that assembly before which the abdication of the Emperor had taken place.

The arrival of Don John gave rise to fresh intrigues. The new Captain-General adopted a conciliatory tone, and, to some extent, succeeded in impressing the people with the conviction that his aim was peaceful, and that the troubles of the Netherlands were over. But he could not impose upon the Prince of Orange, and therefore he felt that his work was incomplete. William warned the Estates not to trust Spanish pretences, and ultimately Don John was obliged to consent to the departure of the Spanish troops by land instead of by water as he had ardently desired, in furtherance of his own romantic schemes.

All obstacles having been thus removed, the memorable treaty called the Perpetual Edict was signed at Marche en Famie, on the 12th, and at Brussels on the 17th of February, 1577. This document, issued in the name of the King, contained nineteen articles. It approved and ratified the peace of Ghent, in consideration that the prelates and clergy, with the doctors utriusque juris of Louvain, had decided that nothing in that treaty conflicted either with the supremacy of the Catholic Church or the authority of the King, but, on the contrary, that it advanced the interests of both. It promised that the soldiery should depart "freely and frankly without delay, by land, never to return except in case of foreign war"—the Spaniards to set forth within forty days, the Germans and others so soon as arrangements had been made by the States-general for their payment. It settled that all prisoners, on both sides, should be released, excepting the Count van Buren, who was to be set free as soon as the States-general having been convoked, the Prince of Orange should have fulfilled the resolutions to be passed by that assembly. It promised the maintenance of all the privileges, charters, and constitutions of the Netherlands. It required of the states an oath to maintain the Catholic religion. It recorded their agreement to disband their troops. It settled that Don John should be received as Governor-General, immediately upon the departure of the Spaniards, Italians, and Burgundians from the provinces.

By the end of April 1577, the Netherlands were cleared of Spanish soldiers. The struggle was not yet concluded, but the people had won a victory, the moral effects of which were mighty and durable.

(To be continued.)

THE Corinth correspondent of the Memphis Appeal deplors the death of Colonel Ingraham, of Van Dorn's staff, who was, it says, inhumanly butchered by the Federals in a skirmish on the 9th inst.

THE same correspondent says that General Beauregard is about to confer the Order of the Southern Cross of Honour on the privates of the 9th Texas regiment for gallant conduct. They will be the first to receive this coveted badge of distinction.

SOUTHERN PROSPECTS.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—The more one has the more one wants, is a rule of human desires, and the daily nutriment supplied to the appetite of curiosity has been carefully apportioned to this known axiom. New York is fed from telegrams, and by the authorities who, in addition to the labour of creating and paying an army of nearly a million of men, have undertaken to arrange the public information allowed to be given by the press. We all know what the result of that arrangement has been—the public in England look upon every single line telegraphed for transmission to Europe as a lie, until confirmed by subsequent facts, which, as we have seen in numberless instances until quite lately, has never been the case. However, the late information accorded to us has been so justified, and upon that is founded all the reasoning which pervades both the press and the general public at present. It is unfavourable to the success of the South, there is no doubt; but I am firmly persuaded that in this, as in all other cases, what is called public opinion, when influenced by powerful party bias, means only the expression of a majority of noses, and not heads. The heads wait till they are better informed, and when they are so, act. Sometimes at once and palpably, but more often gently, and, as it were imperceptibly, public opinion veers round, often to the very opposite point of the compass. Now that an undue bias has been and is powerfully evinced in England, there is not the shadow of a doubt the overlaying of the great causes of quarrel between the North and South by the question of slavery, which has nothing to do with it, the peculiar reticence of her Majesty's Government, and the general endurance of the present inactivity of foreign nations, notwithstanding the sympathy with the cause of the Confederacy, and still more, the crying necessity of relieving the awful suffering prevailing in the Northern Districts, from the consequences of this wicked internecine war, are all chargeable to the emissaries of the Cabinet of Washington, who have poisoned, as it were, the head waters of the fountain of public information. It is only the man who calmly views the bearings of the solemn questions involved in this great constitutional struggle for freedom, and digests the various facts as they arise on the theatre of events without bias or undue prejudice, who can arrive at a safe conclusion. I do not pretend to such philosophical powers and acumen; but, in common with you, Sir, I hope to be humbly instrumental in laying before the British public some means of forming a sound opinion amidst the universal declamation and abuse which is poured out upon the cause we have both so much at heart. In England, all parties have given up the idea of any possible reconstruction of the Union; so far that is a point gained, for the material and physical argument must naturally draw after it the moral. It is so repugnant to British views of constitutional government to compel men to endure a rule they abhor, that the wickedness of this monstrous attempt to enslave nine millions of freemen cannot long remain without signal repudiation from all who are just and honourable. It remains only to combat the fears and to reanimate the hopes of those who are cowed by the overwhelming accounts of the victories achieved by the Northern arms. What do they amount to? We, who are used to matches are careful to guard, in the most cautious manner, against the preponderance of one over another in any contest. So, in horse-racing, weights are carefully balanced to age; in yachting, time is arranged proportionably to tonnage, and so on through the whole round. Now the weight and the tonnage are incontestably on the side of the North. Can we wonder, therefore, that the South has been careful to withdraw from those contests where the balance would tell against her? To have done so without a struggle would have been unlike the brave and noble hearts who direct the energies of the Confederacy. They have yielded to pressure, but in doing so have shown all the qualities of daring, of industry, and strategic ability, which those who knew them expected. The check of the full tide of the first Northern invasion at Bull Run—the onslaught of Corinth, or rather Shiloh, the full details of which were so long concealed from European cognizance, show the vigour of action—the masterly retreat from Manassas, when, for three days, McClellan's outposts were totally ignorant that the great hosts which had confronted them for months had only left their quaker guns to guard their positions, and now the cautious and unflinching front that the retiring Southern army at Richmond shows to its exultant foe, evidence, to my mind satisfactorily, that there is no reason to fear, but much to hope from men who can fight so well and retire in such order, when commanded by generals like Beauregard and Lee. It is the fashion to look to Generals Fever and Heat. They are much in the consideration—but I, for one, do not despair—may,

I am ashamed of the word—I confidently expect that the men of the South will not belie their ancient lineage; that at the proper time, and on the field chosen by their leaders, they will face this horde of German and Irish refugees, and in the sight of sympathizing England—

Their fathers' blood before their fathers' face
Boils up, and proves them truly of their race.

AN ENGLISH SYMPATHIZER.

THE SEIZURE OF THE BERMUDA AND CIRCASSIAN.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—I have been waiting for the people of England, and the House of Commons, to express their indignation at the seizure of the Bermuda and Circassian, and other steamers, when in their legitimate voyages from England to neutral ports, and before these ships had in any way deviated from their course, and when within a few miles only of such port of destination; and when, steaming along in perfect security, believing they were under the protection of the British flag, they were captured by American captains.

The Bermuda was actually within five miles of a British island, directly en route for Nassau, forty miles distant, on her way from England; and the Circassian twenty miles from Havannah. Now, whatever may have been the ultimate intention of these vessels after reaching the ports for which they had cleared from England, or the ultimate destination of portions of their cargoes, it cannot be stated that these ships were attempting to run the blockade at that time, as they were hundreds of miles from the American coast, and they could only have been proceeding to their respective ports at that time, by all the laws of maritime experience. Now, I have no interest in these vessels, and I understand their owners assert they were truly intended to be really discharged at Nassau; and as it is now a place of large commerce in such articles, I can well believe it to have been so intended; and I wish to know if the English nation intend tamely to submit to such interference with British commerce? Are British ports in the West India Islands to be blockaded? Are British vessels to be intercepted in their legitimate voyages to British possessions and neutral ports? Is British trade generally, and especially the trade of our West India Islands, to be suspended at the will of a few American captains anxious for prize-money, or, it may be, of a Government relying upon her pusillanimity, and unscrupulous as to what private interests they may ruin, provided they can delay, by illegal acts, for a short time the receiving of any stores by their Southern opponents at a most critical time in the campaign? If these presumptuous interferences with British commerce are to be permitted, what, then, is to hinder an American vessel from being stationed outside of our principal ports, and capturing, on suspicion, any vessels indicated by the spies of the American Consul as possibly intending, some day or another, to carry arms for the Confederates? And if this is tamely submitted to, I suppose we shall have our ships overhauled in our navy docks, and rifles stopped on their way from Birmingham to the outports, upon the mere suspicion of an American Consul or his spy. There is an infamous spy system in all our ports, endeavouring to learn what goods are going to the South. Clerks, sailors, and stewards of ships have been suborned and bribed to betray their employers, and it only requires to be known in free England to meet with universal execration. What is to hinder such base tools, or their masters, from insuring a doubtful vessel in Lloyd's room for a few hundreds, to run the blockade, on the chance of sharing in the prize-money. It might be done by an enemy, or a spy, or any interested party, and would give a colour for her detention, and, perhaps, condemnation. If our dealers in England had only supplied war stores to the South, it might be said it was not a perfect neutrality; but when statistics will prove that British dealers have actually supplied far more than ten times the quantity of arms, &c., to the North, than they were enabled to the South, this shows our neutrality, as all being in favour of the North.

It seems to me, the people having before heard of the Bermuda's exploits at the beginning of the blockade, hesitate to speak, supposing it would shut her out from their protection; but such is not the case; and it is asserted they have orders to stop every steamer bound to Nassau.

It is not a wicked thing to run the blockade; a man is not a malefactor for so doing, and the odium does not stick to him for ever. It is only a hazardous game; you try to catch me within certain bounds, and I try to get past you. Out of these bounds I am free, and no penalty attaches to me for having outwitted you, if the game is played fairly. But is it to be permitted, before a ship has even reached the port after leaving which she would play this game, or, it may be, before she has left Liverpool docks on some future occasion—I, who am really a shipper sending part of her cargo to the neutral port of her primary destination, am I to be injured, and my property seized, and my market ruined—I who am sending goods to my own house at Nassau—simply because certain parties suspect that, after reaching the port of Nassau, part of her cargo may be valuable to the Confederates, and may be intended to run the blockade, when it may have changed hands? No! If our English people are what they used to be, and our English flag gives the protection to an English subject it used to give, and each English ship is an integral part of the British Empire, we shall have no more over-riding of our commerce by the insolent officials of the most arrogant nation in the world.—I am, Sir,

A BRITISH MERCHANT.

Liverpool, June 1862.

HONOUR TO THE DEAD AND LIVING.

THE battle-field of Shiloh will be memorable in the annals of Mobile, because it has been stained by the blood and illustrated by the gallantry of her sons. That name, like the music of Carroll, will be sweet yet mournful to her soul, and when the appointed pen shall come to weave the strands of its stirring incidents into the enduring cord of history, the laurel and the cypress will be found closely blended. Alas! that military fame must be dappled in the blood of the brave! Alas! that the shouts of victory and the noble exaltation which stirs generous minds to praise and admiration of heroic action, should be mingled with the wail of bereaved hearts over their loved ones lost!

The bright and bloody record stands before us, and names "familiar as household words" in our community are engraved upon it in deathless characters. Martyrs and heroes stand side by side. Armistead, Shepherd, Skates, Burns, Stone, Marshall, Ortella, Herpin, Carlen, Connel, Ledyard, and McGuire; Deas, Smith, Hagan, and Ketchum, the dead and living representatives of Mobile's patriotic chivalry. We note their names as they come uppermost in our passing thought, as the exemplars of a class. The roll of their comrades in death is long and sad, and of their companions in honour bright and glorious. Kind friends, through these columns, have pronounced merited eulogiums upon the patriotic virtues of the dead—full justice yet remains to be done to the deeds of the living.

Col. Zach. Deas bore a distinguished part in the field and fought his regiment with the greatest gallantry. His hat and clothes were riddled with bullets, and he now lies disabled at his father's house in this city from a severe wound in the knee.

Major Hagan, of Colonel Wirt Adams' Cavalry Regiment, led the Twenty-first Infantry in one assault, and on Tuesday rode at the head of a brilliant cavalry charge, dispersing a corps of the enemy, horse and foot, and taking fifty prisoners.

Captain Ketchum, of State Artillery, Co. A, was in the thickest of the fight, and received the compliments and thanks of General Bragg, in the midst of the action, for brave and meritorious services.

Captain R. W. Smith, with his "Crocheron Dragoons," acted as the body-guard of General Bragg, and was by that General's side during the whole battle. He was his special aid, and his conduct drew from his chief a marked and special compliment. The day after the battle General Bragg sent for him, and said:—"Sir, I address you as Colonel of Cavalry, a position you have won by meritorious conduct on the field of battle. Your company has done noble service to our cause, and you must have it kept together." Colonel Smith was appointed Civil and Military Governor of Corinth immediately after the battle.

We delight to record these honours fallen so suddenly and richly upon our old friends and acquaintances. Long may they live to enjoy them!—The Mobile Register.

FRANCE AND AMERICA.

The Constitutionnel on Tuesday published the following article as its first leader:—

MEDIATION.

Battles, great battles, are about to be fought in America, and perhaps have been fought already at the very moment we are writing. It is impossible, in fact, for the armies of the North and the armies of the South, in presence of each other at Corinth and at Richmond, not to come to blows. Deluges of blood will be shed, and what is more sad to contemplate, whatever the issue may be, these terrible encounters do not promise a solution to the actual crisis either for America or for Europe. The victory, no matter on what side, will not be attended with any final result.

Violence, hatred, passions of every description, of which the first war of independence has given us the recital, are nothing compared to the hatred which now animates the South against the North; but they may give an idea of the resistance, and of the obstacles which the Federal armies will have to meet from the Confederates. Let history, whose lessons are so rarely listened to, serve at least in some measure to give a material eloquence under such circumstances. We are willing to grant to those who do not share our opinion anything they wish; we will grant to the Federals superiority by land and by sea; we will accept proximate triumphs for the North. The question which the positive spirit of modern civilization is so fond of putting, still remains: "And what afterwards?" Will the triumph of the Federal arms produce miracles? Will it change the seasons? Will it dissipate the hot weather and the sickness which must ensue? Can it manage that the extent of territory conquered, and consequently to be occupied, is not equal to the whole extent of France, England, and Austria put together? Where are the armies to occupy such an extent, and where is the moral strength which could dispense with occupying them and hold the place of soldiers?

We simply wish to touch upon facts—nothing but facts. What do we see on the side of the Confederates? They burn their produce; they burn their provisions; they destroy their railways; they blow up their dockyards, their arsenals, and their ships; they leave their wives and children to fight in battle. When, in a proclamation of savage energy, General Beauregard recommends the planters to destroy their crops which are within the reach of the enemy, and to apply the torch to them without delay or hesitation, it is not simply a captain excited by the drunkenness of war who speaks—it is the general sentiment loudly expressed. Had not numerous meetings already expressed their opinion? Once again, let us observe, we do not wish to express our own ideas on such acts; we simply wish to give facts.

On the other hand, what are the Federals doing? What at once strikes us is, that the country of freedom par excellence has commenced by suppressing freedom. Military directors have seized upon all the telegraphic lines which traverse America in every direction. The same censorship compels the newspapers to publish only what is favourable to the North and unfavourable to the South. And what is the result of this? The North speaks to the whole world by the electric wires, while information from the South, when it does come, comes tardily. In fact, the journals and correspondence from the South, which reach us by way of the Havannah or St. Thomas, are sometimes five weeks behind hand, and thus lose all interest.

The North proclaims martial law with all its severities; it suppresses every independent voice; it threatens the suspected with death. In presence of such despotism the English press has not been able to remain silent.

In the midst of such a struggle between such desperate opponents, who dare say that a spontaneous or likely pacification is possible? Peace can only come from without, and the word which we have placed at the head of this article can alone put an end to a war which has desolated, steeped in blood, and decimated America already too long, and, what is more, caused Europe to suffer too long. The word we allude to is "Mediation!"

But whence is this mediation to come, and on what basis can it be founded? Whence it will come we have already stated. As regards the basis it may easily be found.

First of all, it is evident that as "mediation," in principle, must be accepted by both belligerents, it can only represent ideas of justice and of moderation, and that consequently it cannot be addressed to those who would like to engraft a slave war on a civil war, or to those who consider the institution of slavery as an institution of Divine right.

This mediation, a point most singularly overlooked, corresponds not only to the most vital interests of commercial Europe, but also to the most sensible minds that represent the interests of America. Let us remember that President Lincoln has pronounced himself in the same sense as, before him, Generals Burnside and Butler did, against an excitement to a slave war, and that, in his last proclamation, he called to mind his special message, quoting the following resolution, adopted by large majorities by both Houses of Congress:—

"The United States must co-operate with that State which might adopt the gradual abolition of slavery, by giving to such State, in its judgment, such a compensation as required for public or private inconveniences resulting from such a change of system."

Let us bring to bear upon this passage another solemn declaration made by President Lincoln in his inauguration address of the 4th March, 1861:—

"I have no intention to interfere, directly or indirectly, in the question of slavery where it exists; I do not think that I have the right to do so legally, and I am by no means inclined to do so."

It is thus that the North speaks, in the spirit of moderation and of justice. Will the South be less accessible to this spirit of conciliation and of wisdom? We do not think so, and we have a proof at hand. A man of consideration of the South, Mr. Yancey, a Commissioner of the Southern States, at a banquet given at the Fishmongers' Hall, on the 9th November last, at London, spoke as follows:—

"When our adversary shall have become sufficiently calm to treat us as belligerents, the aura of peace will appear in the horizon. When that hour has struck, I think I may say that the Confederate Government will not show itself inflexible, except upon one point: the care of our honour and of our independence. As regards the great interests of peace and of humanity, our Government will know how to make concessions in everything simply material or of secondary importance."

Those words were hailed with immense applause; and here, evidently, are to be found the basis of a possible arrangement—of an arrangement such as may be proposed in the name of Europe by a great and free nation.

Beyond this—beyond this most opportune mediation is the point of view of European interests; so legitimate is the point of view of humanity and civilization, there remain only catastrophes the extent of which no human eye can penetrate. The capture of Richmond would not advance the affairs of America one whit more than the capture of New Orleans. The South bled in blood, the North plunged in bankruptcy and anarchy, commercial Europe seeing its sufferings increase—such are the consequences of the continuation of this war.

Mediation, on the contrary, by putting an end to a fratricidal struggle, and by consecrating a separation already accomplished, without allowing one of the belligerents to crush the other, and cause desolation instead of peace, would render the most eminent service to America as well as to Europe.

One year ago, when the war broke out, France offered her mediation to America. That offer was not accepted. What an immense amount of bloodshed, what sad catastrophes, what desolation across the Atlantic, what suffering in our own homes, might have been spared if the voice of France had then been listened to!

THE FALL OF NEW ORLEANS—GENERAL LOVELL IN HIS OWN DEFENCE.

(From the New Orleans Delta, May 1.)

NEW ORLEANS, April 29, 1862.

TO JUDGE WALKER:—

DEAR SIR,—In the Evening Delta, in an article headed "Fallen, but not Disgraced," this expression occurs:—"The lack of energy and earnestness on the part of the agents of the Confederate Government," &c.

This includes me in its sweep, and I think unjustly. When I came here, but a few short months since, I found the State defenceless, its ports blockaded, and its young men gone to other parts of the Confederacy in the army. Without anything but what was created, every inlet was put in position to offer a protracted and gallant defence. Forts were armed, powder and munitions of every description were made, and a gallant body of troops organized and drilled. Guns were cast and materials of all kinds extemporized by incessant labour and activity. The river at the forts was twice bridged by obstructions which would have resisted anything but the formidable rush of the great Mississippi in its swollen wrath.

My troops, at the call of their country, rushed to Corinth, and the deeds of the Louisiana regiments, on the 6th and 7th of April, indicated their courage and their training. Our foundries were beginning to turn out heavy guns of the best quality, and a newly-erected arsenal furnished us with various implements of war. All this has been done since October, besides preparing sixteen vessels for river defence, eight of which are now defending the upper river, and eight have been destroyed in the vain attempt to keep back the enemy's fleet of war vessels below. This has been done with no host of generals and staff officers of experience to assist.

In a short time more I should have had guns enough and men enough to defend the numerous approaches by that element on which the enemy is so pre-eminently powerful; and I therefore beg that you will do me the justice to say to the people of New Orleans that I did all that one man could do to preserve them from an insolent and powerful foe. When their fleets passed all our batteries, I withdrew my infantry forces beyond the city limits, in order to permit the people of New Orleans to decide whether they would subject themselves and their property to bombardment, in the endeavour to maintain their freedom intact; and returned to the city to-day to learn their decision, and to offer myself and my command to stand by them to the last moment in case they should decide to undergo a bombardment.

I know that there are many gentlemen here who will bear me witness that all that is here set forth, and much more, has been done to avert this sad disaster. An examination of my letter and order-books and telegraphic despatches will show that no stone has been left unturned by me to save New Orleans from this humiliation; and I feel well convinced that a few short weeks would have rendered the position impregnable. All I ask is simply justice, and nothing more. In conclusion, I will add that, terrible as the blow has been, I am neither disheartened nor in despair. This war of independence is not yet fought out. Our ancestors struggled against the massive power of Great Britain when Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston, and Savannah were all in possession of the enemy, and gained their liberty.

It is a moral and physical impossibility that we can be conquered. Let us be true to ourselves and our cause—never tiring, never despairing—but rising, Actæon like, with renewed vigour from every fall, and we shall yet be rewarded with success. Above all, we should not crush down the spirit and the energies of those who are using all the faculties, mental and physical, that God has given them, by making light of their labour, because, with limited means and under adverse circumstances, they have not been successful in resisting at all points a great, wealthy, and powerful enemy, with all the appliances of modern warfare, both military and naval, in dark abundance at his control. We have never yet seen such dark days as those which environed George Washington at Valley Forge; and should such be our lot, I trust that the same spirit will animate us to work out the same successful results. Respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. LOVELL, Major General, C. S. A.

THE DEATH OF A TRUE MAN.

A correspondent of the Mobile Register, from the battle-field of Shiloh, thus writes of the death of a well known Mobilian:—

MAJOR R. B. ARMISTEAD.—Among the many gallant dead who gave their lives to our struggling country at the great battle of Shiloh, none were more conspicuously brave than Major Armistead. Up to the time of the reception of his fatal wound, he coolly sat on his horse, encouraging and cheering his men, while the enemy's balls flew thick around him. He seemed unconscious of personal danger, and bravely exposed himself to the death-dealing missiles of the enemy's artillery, while his men were lying down, impatiently waiting for the order to charge a battery. About half-past ten on Sunday morning, during the fiercest of the fight, he was struck by a grape-shot in the body, which passed through from side to side, believed to be fired from the same battery that wounded General Gladden. The Major coolly dismounted from his horse, and walked leisurely back to the hospital, making no complaint of the terrible wound he had received. After calmly taking off his sash, sword, and coat, and exhibiting his wound to Captain Turner, surgeon of the regiment, he inquired of him what he thought of his condition. The surgeon replied, "Major, you are going to die." He then said, "I thought so," and called for pen, ink, and paper, sat down and wrote his will, signed and handed it to the surgeon, with the request that he would give it to his brother, Captain Armistead, if he should come out of the battle alive.

From that time he never spoke of his wound or complained of the terrible agony he was enduring, but seemed quite cheerful, and made constant inquiries of the wounded as they were brought into the hospital one by one, of the progress of the fight, and expressed much joy and gratification at the intelligence that our army was everywhere victorious on the field. About ten o'clock on Sunday night, twelve hours after he received this mortal wound, he breathed his last.

When the first intelligence reached us that hostile armies were about to tread Southern soil, Major Armistead was among the first to seize his arms and rush to the defence of our young Confederacy. He left Mobile in April, 1861, a private in the Mobile Cadets, which was subsequently attached to the Third Alabama Regiment, stationed in the vicinity of Norfolk. He served there for about seven months, and then obtained a Major's commission from the Confederate Government, and in connection with Col. Deas and others, raised the 22nd Alabama Regiment which fought so nobly and gallantly in the battle of Shiloh.

By the untimely death of Major Armistead, the country has lost one of its chivalrous and gallant defenders—Mobile one of her most beloved and cherished young men, and the profession of the law one of its most gifted and promising followers.

AS TO THE FUTURE OF THE SOUTH.

The grand prize for which the South is struggling in this deadly conflict with a powerful enemy is the right of self-government. The secondary prize is that she may enjoy the full privilege and results of her intrinsic power to create wealth. That, with her independence achieved, the South will enter upon a grand and unexampled career of progress, and an unprecedented existence of substantial wealth is no Utopian dream, no bright, intoxicating fallacy, all who have pursued a common sense investigation know beyond a peradventure. The main staple of our agricultural industry will always make the world our tributary. Cotton has betrayed our too overweening confidence that it would fight our battles promptly, but we may nevertheless confidently trust that it will always fill our pockets. Our cotton fields are mines of wealth from which we will always dig gold by the hundred millions annually—enough to far overpay our indebtedness incurred with the outside world, and leave a grand balance to be poured into the cornucopia of the nation's accumulating wealth. It was the agriculture of the South which was the chief agency in bearing the whole country onward and upward in its splendid career of progress. It created the foreign commerce and sustained the navigation of the North, which through these mediums succeeded in securing the larger share of the profits of our industry, leaving us still, however, ample returns for our support and moderate increase. As an independent nation, none will share with us what justly belongs all to us, and if that could render the whole country prosperous and progressive as never a country was before, how much more will it do so when its benefits are confined to the South alone.

This war, too, is teaching us valuable lessons—at a present extravagant price, it is true, but which, in the end, may not prove so expensive. It is teaching us to subsist within ourselves. How much money we have been in the habit of paying out for the necessities of life is now taught us by the extra prices we have to pay when depending upon our own resources. The bitter lesson, learned amid toil, privation and blood, will not be lost, and in this war we shall achieve not only our political but our industrial or material independence. This latter will be of twofold value to us, for it will retain a great amount of wealth in the country, and render the provision supply steady and assured amid all chances and changes; and it will tend to cripple those whom this war will leave our hereditary enemies, the people of the provision producing sections of the West, as well as the whole North. With the Southern market cut off, their bacon sells at four cents per pound, and their corn at ten cents per bushel—our bacon at forty cents per pound, and our corn at prices as much beyond what it should. Destroy its produce market, and you sap the vital strength of the powerful West, and assure a rupture between it and the Eastern States, whose high protective system will be too oppressive for the West to bear without the support of the Southern market. The disunion of the Northern and Western States will alone relieve us of the disagreeable awe with which we must recognize the power of a United North. We may not fear it, but we must dread the trouble to which it can put us, and must be in some sort deferential to its management of the affairs of the continent.

There are those, doubtless, who are apprehensive that the cost of war for our independence will be a terrible drawback on the future prosperity of the South. We set aside the truism that liberty is priceless at any imaginable cost of blood and treasure, and come down to figures, but briefly. It is feared that this war will leave the nation oppressed with such a debt as will be an effectual incubus upon its progress. Let us see: suppose that peace finds the Confederacy with a debt of five hundred million dollars worth of paper out, which will be funded into eight per cent bonds; the interest on this public debt will be forty million of dollars per annum. To pay this interest a tax of perhaps one-third or one-half of one per cent on all property usually considered within the term taxable property would be necessary. This would be no great burden for a nation to bear which has such intrinsic sources of wealth as ours. These national debt bonds, indeed, paying their attractive interest would be a valuable item of national wealth, and being made taxable property themselves, would pay their share of the tax for their interest. A light additional tax would regularly sink a portion, and in a few decades extinguish the whole war debt which we are incurring so cheerfully for so inestimable an object. It is to be hoped that the whole amount of these bonds will remain in the hands of our own people, and thus the money disbursed for their interest will be retained in the country. So soon as our independence is accomplished, there will be an eager rush for securities so undoubted, and paying an interest so munificent in the eyes of European capitalists. But possibly the national debt may become a thousand millions ere the war is closed. In that case, our rough estimate of the tax would be doubled, and it will then be no very terrible matter. The payment of the tax will become easier and easier with every year of peace and prosperity.—Mobile Register.

SEIZURE OF ST. CHARLES HOTEL.

(From the New Orleans Delta, May 4, 1862.)

General Butler sent an officer yesterday to secure rooms for himself and staff at the St. Charles Hotel. The agent of the proprietors, who are absent, informed the officer that the hotel was closed—that the proprietors and all their boarders had left. He was informed that if he opened the house willingly to General Butler and staff, that they would take care of the property, and compensate the proprietors for what they used; that if they did not, General Butler and staff would occupy it anyhow. We do not know what was the conclusion of the agent, but at two o'clock General Butler and staff, accompanied by H. M. Summers, formerly of this city, but who, for some time past, resided on the Jackson Railroad, rode up to the hotel in carriages, accompanied by a guard. They went into the hotel and took possession. Meantime, an immense crowd of persons assembled around the hotel, and hurraed for "Beauregard," "Davis," "the South," and groaned various parties who seemed obnoxious to them. A Federal officer left the hotel and proceeded to the Custom House, the chief rendezvous of the United States' troops, and returned with a squad of soldiers, who formed a cordon around the hotel. Several arrests were made by the Federal soldiers of citizens in the crowd for giving expression to their feelings. Among those was Mr. Daniel Edwards, an old citizen and proprietor of the large foundry on the levee.

We seize the occasion again to counsel and urge upon our citizens the impolicy of large assemblies, and of all violent manifestations of feeling. They should remain as much as possible at home, and afford no provocation for severe and violent proceedings on the part of those who have military occupation of the city.

PERMANENT GOVERNMENT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES. FIRST CONGRESS.

Jefferson Davis—PRESIDENT.

Alexander H. Stephens—VICE-PRESIDENT.

J. P. Benjamin, Louisiana—SECRETARY OF STATE.

C. G. Memminger, South Carolina—SECRETARY OF TREASURY.

Geo. W. Randolph, Virginia—SECRETARY OF WAR.

S. R. Mallory, Florida—SECRETARY OF NAVY.

John H. H. Reagan, Texas—POST MASTER GENERAL.

Thos. H. Watts, Alabama—ATTORNEY GENERAL.

SENATE.

ALABAMA—Clement C. Clay, William L. Yancey.

ARKANSAS—Robt. W. Johnson, Charles B. Mitchell.

FLORIDA—James M. Baker, Augustus E. Maxwell.

GEORGIA—Benjamin B. Hill, Robert Toombs.

KENTUCKY—Henry C. Burnett, William E. Simms.

LOUISIANA—Thomas J. Semmes, Edward Sparrow.

MISSISSIPPI—Albert G. Brown, James Phelan.

MISSOURI—John B. Clark, R. L. Y. Peyton.

NORTH CAROLINA—George Davis, Wm. T. Dortch.

SOUTH CAROLINA—Robert W. Barnwell, Jas. L. Orr.

TENNESSEE—Langdon C. Haynes, Gustavus A. Henry.

TEXAS—William S. Oldham, Louis T. Wigfall.

VIRGINIA—Robt. M. T. Hunter, William Ballard Preston.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

ALABAMA. MISSOURI. (continued)

1. Thomas J. Foster

3. Casper W. Bell

2. William R. Smith

4. A. H. Condon

3. John P. Ralls

5. George G. Vest

4. J. L. M. Curry

6. Thomas W. Freeman

5. Francis S. Lyon

7. John Hyer

6. Wm. P. Chilton

NORTH CAROLINA.

7. David Clopton

1. W. N. H. Smith

8. James L. Pugh

2. Robert R. Bridgers

9. Edw. L. Dargan

3. Owen R. Keenan

ARKANSAS.

4. T. D. McDowell

1. Felix I. Batson

5. Thomas S. Ashe

2. Grandison D. Royston

6. Arch. H. Arrington

3. J. P. Johnson

7. Robert McLean

4. Thomas B. Hanly

8. William Lander

FLORIDA.

9. B. S. Gaither

1. James B. Dawkins

10. A. T. Davidson

2. Robert B. Hilton

SOUTH CAROLINA.

GEORGIA.

1. John McQueen

1. Julian Hartridge

2. W. Porcher Miles

2. C. J. Munnerlyn

3. L. M. Ayer

3. Hines Holt

4. Milledge L. Bonham

4. Augustus H. Keuan

5. James Farrow

5. David W. Lewis

6. Wm. V. Boyce

6. William W. Clark

TENNESSEE.

7. Robert P. Fripp

1. Joseph T. Heiskell

8. Lucius J. Gartrell

2. William G. Swan

9. Hardy Strickland

3. W. H. Tebbs

10. Augustus R. Wright

4. E. L. Gardenhire

KENTUCKY.

5. Henry S. Foote

1. Alfred Boyd

6. Meredith P. Gentry

2. John W. Crockett

7. George W. Jones

3. H. E. Read

8. Thomas Meneese

4. George W. Ewing

9. J. D. C. Atkins

5. James S. Chrisman

10. John V. Wright

6. T. L. Burnett

11. David M. Currin

7. H. W. Bruce

TEXAS.

8. S. S. Scott

1. John A. Wilcox

9. E. M. Bruce

2. C. C. Herbert

10. J. W. Moore

3. Peter W. Gray

11. Robt. J. Breckinridge

4. B. E. Sexton

12. John M. Elliott

5. D. M. Graham

LOUISIANA.

6. Wm. B. Wright

1. Chas. J. Villere

VIRGINIA.

2. Chas. M. Conrad

1. M. R. H. Garnett

3. Duncan F. Kenner

2. John R. Chambliss

4. Lucien J. Dobre

3. James Lyons.

5. Henry Marshall

4. Roger A. Pryor

6. John Perkins, J.

5. Thos. S. Bocock

MISSISSIPPI.

6. John Goode, Jr.

1. J. W. Clapp

7. J. P. Holcombe

2. Reubin Davis

8. C. D. de Jarnatt

3. Israel Welch

9. Wm. Smith

4. H. C. Chambers

10. A. R. Boteler

5. O. R. Singleton

11. John B. Baldwin

6. E. Barksdale

12. Walter R. Staples

7. John J. McRae

13. Walter Preston

MISSOURI.

14. Albert G. Jenkins

1. W. M. Cook

15. Robt. Johnston

2. Thos. A. Harris

16. Chas. W. Russell

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES-GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rumford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C. S. A.
Represented by
Jos. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
3, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS,
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Demies, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron-street, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES;
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: HOGGTON, New Bond-street.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDER-ICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—
1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law,
&c.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books.—Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAPS. Catalogue of Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee merchant. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cause of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.
We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION
FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRESS INTERNATIONAL
DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.
THE Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress
International de Bienfaisance, will take place in London from the 1st to the 14th of June.
The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.
The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon, in Burlington House.

A series of Science will be given during the period
of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entitled to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to
all the Meetings of the Association and Congress,
and to the Soirees, &c.
Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C.; and 12, Old Bond-street, W.
As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association
has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting
will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.
For every 45 subscribed to this fund, subscribers
are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City
office, Guildhall, E.C.; by Messrs. Ransom, Bouverie, and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Westminster Bank, Leadenhall-street, E.C.; the Union Bank, Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Keanard,
and Co., 4, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George
Ledger, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.
GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.
and Chairman of Executive Committee.
A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.
G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Lohs.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
N. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Behn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 88
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,808 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHIER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 609,925 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 806,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1862.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrip of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Puck.
G. H. Ward.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Siocomb.
B. F. Voorhies.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861;
Twenty per cent. 30th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861 deliverable on and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and
land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PARTIAL PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to the weight and bulk of the Goods.
Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made
up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.
Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquarioris, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty of one-hundred pounds; and the master or owner of any ship who refuses to take on board
any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to VII. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexed subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havana. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—June 12, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 8.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 19, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	113
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET	115
Liverpool Letter	115
Manchester Letter	115
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Private Letters and Extracts	115
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Washington	110
Paris	117
LEADERS—
The Recent Battles	120
Recognition versus Mediation	120
The Defence of Canada	121
The French Defeat at Mexico	122
Editorials	123
REVIEW OF BOOKS—
A Historical Parallel, No. V.	123
Precis of the Wars in Canada	124
SPEECH OF THE HON. BENJAMIN WOOD, OF NEW YORK, ON THE STATE OF THE UNION	125
LETTER TO THE EDITOR—
General Butler	127
THE MEXICAN ACCOUNT OF THE FRENCH DEFEAT	127
ADVERTISEMENTS	123

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

THE BATTLE OF RICHMOND.—The brilliant tactics of the Confederate generals, and the heroism of the Confederate soldiers, have again been crowned by a glorious triumph. The advantages of the enemy in numbers, in resources, and in ammunition, are more than balanced by that resolution which is inspired by the consciousness of fighting in a cause, that appeals so strongly to the favour of Heaven.

Our summary of facts is mainly derived from Northern sources. There is something ghastly, as well as ridiculous, in the Federal general, the Federal newsmongers, and the Federal Secretary of War, vividly painting a Federal defeat, and calling the picture a Federal victory; but the favourable testimony wrung by force of circumstances from an enemy is reasonably [and universally accepted. A very peculiar feature of Northern intelligence is, that it is not only false, but it is self-branded with falsehood. By the time constant exposure has taught the Federal Government how to fabricate plausibly and consistently, Europe will no longer be dependent on, or pay the slightest heed to, Northern intelligence.

The Federal army was between the Chickahominy and Pamunkey Rivers, both of which pass Richmond to the north. With one wing resting on the Chickahominy, the Federal line was extended in a north-westerly direction. So that, instead of being vis a vis, one wing was more westerly, as well as further north, than the other. The Confederates, crossing the Chickahominy to the north of Richmond, would find themselves opposite to one of the enemy's wings, and which, from the slanting direction of the Federal lines, was probably, to some extent, isolated from the main supports.

It must be remembered that, except under peculiarly advantageous circumstances, an entrenched and besieged army does not offer battle; but, whenever an opportunity occurs, makes a sortie on the weak points of the enemy. This is exactly what the Confederates did on the 31st of May. The weakness and partial isolation of the wing under the command of General Casey, was perceived, and it was determined to make an attack at that quarter. If the sortie had led to a general battle on advantageous terms, it would not have been declined; but the direct object of the movement was to operate against a particular division of the enemy's army, to disperse it, and, if possible, capture its guns, ammunition, and baggage.

The following is General McClellan's account of the battle. A more unintelligible despatch was never penned; and familiar as we are with Federal bungling, we have found it difficult to fathom its meaning. At present "the Young Napoleon" has given no proof of his vaunted generalship, but he has demonstrated his utter inability to write an intelligible despatch:—

FIELD OF BATTLE, Sunday, June 1, Noon.

We have had a desperate battle, in which the corps of Generals Sumner, Heintzelman, and Keyes have been engaged against greatly superior numbers.

Yesterday, at one, the enemy, taking advantage of a terrible storm, which had flooded the valley of the Chickahominy, attacked our troops on the right flank. General Casey's division, which was in the first line, gave way unaccountably and disunitedly. This caused a temporary confusion, during which the guns and baggage were lost, but Generals Heintzelman and Keyes most gallantly brought up their troops, which checked the enemy. At the same time, however, I succeeded, by great exertion, in bringing across Generals Sedgewick's and Richardson's divisions, who drove back the enemy at the point of the bayonet, covering the ground with his dead.

This morning the enemy attempted to renew the conflict, but was everywhere repulsed. We have taken many prisoners, among whom are General Pettigrew and Colonel Loring. Our loss is heavy, but that of the enemy must be enormous. With the exception of General Casey's division, the men behaved splendidly.

Several fine bayonet charges have been made; the 2nd Excelsior Regiment made two to-day.

GEORGE B. MCCLELLAN, Major-General Commanding.

The Confederates advanced along three roads to the attack, and after a very short contest General Casey's division was utterly routed. It "gave way unaccountably and disunitedly," which in plain English means it was beaten, and fled in disorder. The guns, baggage, and camp of the division were captured. The object of the attack had been brilliantly attained. We are then informed "that Generals Heintzelman and Keyes most gallantly brought up their troops, which checked the enemy." The sortie had succeeded in routing a wing, and capturing the guns, baggage, and camp; that is, a complete victory had been gained. What, then, was there to check? The Confederates contemplated no further advance, and all that is signified by "checking the enemy" is, that the victory of the Confederates necessitated some movements to protect the rest of the Federal army.

The next paragraph of this memorable despatch is the pièce de resistance. It is susceptible of more constructions than there are days in a month. "At the same time, however, I succeeded, by great exertion, in bringing across Generals Sedgewick's and Richardson's divisions, who drove back the enemy at the point of the bayonet, covering the ground with his dead." The word "however" means that Heintzelman's and Keyes' divisions could not check the enemy, and therefore other troops were brought up; or it means nothing.

General McClellan says, "I succeeded." We will not comment on the generalship that needed so much exertion to check a sortie but are we to understand that General McClellan was present with the divisions of Generals Sedgewick and Richardson? If so, we do not hesitate to charge him with gross misrepresentation, or with idiotic obtuseness. Anyone reading the passage we have last quoted can only assume that General McClellan intends it to be understood that on the Saturday, as soon as he brought up the fresh divisions, the Confederates were driven from the ground they had gained. We defy even Mr. Stanton to invent a more unadulterated falsehood. Not less than nineteen guns, all the baggage, and ammunition were conveyed to Richmond. Such operations could not have been carried out by troops retreating at the point of the bayonet. We have, too, superabundant evidence from Northern sources that the Confederates kept possession of the Federal camping ground during the night succeeding the battle. The correspondent of the New York Times says:—"Besides the guns, General Casey lost all his camp equipage." "The rebels ran a train down near Fair Oak Station, and carried away our commissary stores, guns, &c., to Richmond. The rebels destroyed what they could not conveniently carry away, including the new tents of Casey's and Couch's divisions." "I rode out upon the battlefield on Sunday afternoon at four o'clock. The scene witnessed here baffles all description. Caissons, with horses shot dead in their traces, ambulances, waggons, &c., filled the road in front of Casey's camp. There were about 200 of our wounded still lying where they fell on Saturday. Some of them spoke kindly of the rebels, saying they treated them very well." These statements and facts give the lie direct to the despatch of General McClellan.

Of course, as soon as the division of General Casey was routed, and its ground possessed, skirmishers were thrown out by the Confederates, and these were checked by the Federals and fell back on the main body. We gather, too, from the report of the correspondent of the New York Times, that the advance of the Confederates was not arrested until seven p.m.; that is, nearly six hours after the attack.

General Sumner was obliged to depend upon a single shaky structure for the passage of his troops, who nearly all, however, succeeded in crossing that night, the head of the column reaching the Nine-mile road, along which the rebels were pressing our troops, at about seven o'clock; holding the enemy in check for the night, and preventing them from following up in that direction the advantage they had gained during the day.

We trust we shall be forgiven a little recapitulation. A sortie was made by the Confederates; a Federal division was routed; at least nineteen guns, baggage, ammunition, stores, &c., were taken and conveyed to Richmond; what could not be conveniently removed was destroyed; the wounded of the enemy received kindly attention; during the night of the battle the camping ground of the Federals was occupied by the Confederates. And the Federals claim, or perhaps claimed, a victory. May they have many such victories!

On the next day, Sunday, the Confederate forces withdrew to their entrenchments. The idea of their attempting a second attack is monstrous. A weak point was surprised on the Saturday, and they knew that next day McClellan would concentrate a large force on it. The affair of Sunday was a skirmish kept up by the Confederates to cover their homeward movement. As soon as the Confederates were without the lines of the enemy, the skirmishing was discontinued.

We have no particulars as to the Confederate losses. General McClellan says, "they must be enormous," and for no better reason than that the Federal loss was heavy. The correspondent of the New York Times asserts that "the enemy's dead left on the field amounts to 1200." This definite statement is not very trustworthy. The correspondent did not count the dead himself, but either recorded a mere rumour, or gives the estimate of the Federal commander; and it is strange—at least, it would be strange if it were true—that though the number of Confederates killed was known to a man, yet only a guess could be hazarded about the Federal loss. "Our loss in two days' engagement, in killed and wounded, will amount to about 3000." Even this reckoning is rather wide of the truth, for by June 7, it was discovered that, "the late engagement before Richmond was more severe than was first reported, the Federal loss being now estimated at 7000 men."

The latest advices from New York state, "the Confederates claim the victory;" and we submit, with very good reason. We have not the slightest objection to the arrangement of the Federals being defeated in the battle-field, and the Confederates being defeated in the Northern newspapers. However, we confess we are curious to know what the Yankees understand by a Confederate victory, since routing the wing of an army with terrific slaughter, carrying away at least nineteen guns, capturing a large booty of stores, baggage, and ammunition, and burning the enemy's camp, is considered a Confederate defeat.

The mail that brought the news of the Battle of Richmond informed us of some gallant doings on the part of General Fremont. The New York Shipping List stated:—"The triumph of the Confederate forces under General Jackson, in the Shenandoah Valley, has proved short-lived, and the prospect is now brighter than ever. General Fremont's forces, after a forced march of over 100 miles across the Shenandoah Mountains, have occupied Strasburg without resistance, having encountered the main body under Jackson, who refused battle." Simultaneously, we were informed General Jackson had made a successful retreat. Before the news is a week old we hear that General Fremont "came upon General Jackson, fell into an ambuscade, and suffered heavy loss." This is another Federal left-hand victory. For "suffered heavy loss" read "completely defeated."

General Halleck does not know the whereabouts of General Beauregard, but he "reports that General Pope is thirty miles south of Corinth, and is pushing the enemy hard. He had captured a large number of prisoners." General Halleck is not a great commander, but it would be unfair to deny that he has a very glowing imagination.

Once more we are informed that Fort Wright is evacuated. We also learn that Vicksburg has not been taken.

It is reported, via New York, that

A naval engagement has taken place on the Mississippi, near Memphis, resulting in the destruction of the Confederate fleet.

All the Confederate vessels were destroyed but one.

Memphis surrendered immediately afterwards, and is now in possession of the Federals.

Remembering that the naval engagement at Fort Pillow was reported by the North as a Federal victory, and that the Confederate gunboats were sunk and injured, and as it turned out it was a Confederate victory, and that the Federal gunboats were sunk and injured, we are very sceptical about the destruction of all the Confederate vessels but one.

The evacuation or surrender of Memphis will neither surprise nor dishearten the South. The temporary loss of cities within reach of the enemy's gunboats is looked upon as a probable contingency.

It is rumoured that Fort Morgan was attacked on the 4th instant.

The Southern papers record another Confederate victory. It appears 2000 Federals landed on James Island, opposite Charleston; that an engagement ensued, and the invaders were defeated.

The infamous edict of General Butler has not been disowned by his Government. The report of his recall is false. He has appointed General Shepley as commandant of New Orleans, and the reasons are thus stated by the correspondent of a New York paper:—

"The appointment of a military commandant of this city has become a necessity, owing to the numerous amount of business devolving upon General Butler, aside from the movement of troops in and about the city. General Butler's time is almost constantly employed in arranging matters of public policy, in conferring with prominent citizens, and in attending to the requirements of his position as Commander of the Gulf Department. The selection of General Shepley as the commandant of the city is heartily applauded."

In another part of our impression will be found an account of the arrest of British subjects, and of the insults offered to the Dutch Consul.

It is rumoured that Mr. Seward has proposed an amicable settlement of affairs between General Butler and the Dutch Consul at New Orleans. It is possible the Federal Secretary may find that the amicable settlement of outrageous insults is not an easy task.

At length the United States' Senate has passed the Tax Bill. It is anticipated that in some of the States the collection of the taxes will not be very readily effected, even if the Bill passes the House of Representatives.

Cotton has been taxed by the Senate at one half-cent per pound. The European manufacturers may learn by this how necessary Secession was for the interests of commerce. Not content with a duty on the import of cotton fabrics, a tax is likewise levied on the raw material. This is not likely to be productive, because very little cotton will pass through Federal hands; but the act shows the avarice and greed of the Yankees.

The assertions about the speedy termination of the war are not now so frequent or so positive. Indeed, it tries even Yankee assurance to reiterate such predictions when the Government has called for more men, and ordered the construction of more gunboats.

Mr. Sumner has offered a resolution in the Senate, that the appointment of military governors for Southern States was contrary to the Federal constitution and laws.

We have printed in extenso an interesting speech of the Hon. Benj. Wood, Member of Congress for New York, upon the state of the Union.

The grain prospects of the North are not favourable. In summarizing the commercial advices from New York, the Times remarks:—

There were discouraging accounts from some of the principal grain districts in Ohio of the prospects of the wheat crop, the damage from fly in several instances being such that the farmers were ploughing up the wheat to sow Indian corn.

In the House of Lords, on Friday last, the Earl of Carnarvon questioned Earl Russell as to General Butler's proclamation, and as to the authenticity of the rumour of mediation in the American war.

Earl Russell denounced the edict of General Butler, and hoped the United States' Government would disavow it. The noble Earl (Carnarvon) had asked him a question with reference to a rumour which had obtained currency, that the two Governments of France and England intended to offer their mediation between the belligerents. The spreading of these rumours might do a great deal of mischief, and therefore he was glad the noble earl had put the question, as it gave him an opportunity of informing the House what was the true state of the case. Her Majesty's Government had made no proposal of the kind to the Government of France, and the Government of France had made no such proposal to them. Moreover, the French ambassador in this country had stated that he had no instructions on the subject; and he (Earl Russell) need not say, therefore, that there had been no communication between the two Governments of the tenour which had been alleged. Without giving any opinion as to the propriety at some time or other of offering the good offices of her Majesty's Government, he must say that he thought the present time was most inopportune for such mediation. He thought that no good could come of it, and in the present state of the war, and in the present embittered state of feeling on both sides, such an offer would rather tend to prevent any good result from being attained if a similar step should be hereafter taken. Certainly there was no intention on the part of her Majesty's Government to interfere at the present moment.

In the House of Commons, in answer to Mr. Hopwood, Lord Palmerston said:—

Sir, her Majesty's Government have received no communication from the Government of France on the subject of mediation, and we have no intention at present to offer mediation between the combatants.

Sir James Elphinstone inquired whether the Government had received any information that an English and two French steamers had been fired into by American vessels on the coast of America, and that the captain of the French vessel was killed. Lord Palmerston, in reply, said the Government had not received any information of the kind.

Sir John Walsh, after expressing a strong opinion in reference to the recent proclamation issued by the Federal General Butler, asked whether any official information had been received authenticating the proclamation. Mr. Gregory also commented upon this document, which he characterized as repugnant to common sense, and the greatest outrage that had been perpetrated against decency, civilization, and humanity in modern times, and called upon Lord Palmerston to unite with the chivalrous Ruler of France in denouncing the outrage.

Lord Palmerston rose, amidst loud cheers, and said:—

Sir, appealed to by my hon. friend, I am quite prepared to say, that I think no man can have read that proclamation to which notice has been drawn without feeling the deepest indignation. (Loud cheers.) It is a proclamation to which I do not scruple to attach the epithet "infamous." (Loud and renewed cheers.) Sir, an Englishman must blush to think that such an act has been committed by a man belonging to the Anglo-Saxon race. If it had sprung from some barbarian tribe that was not within the pale of civilization, one might have regretted, but no one could have been surprised at it. But that such an order should have been issued by a soldier—(cheers)—by a man who had raised himself to the rank of general—is a subject undoubtedly not less of astonishment than of pain. Sir, I cannot bring myself to believe that the Government of the United States will not, when it has got notice of the fact, of its own accord stamp it with its censure and condemnation. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") We have received yesterday a despatch from Lord Lyons, communicating to us, from an American newspaper, the paragraph which has been read by the hon. baronet, and the general order of General Beauregard, aimed at giving the text of the order. There can be no objection to produce that paper. With regard to the course which her Majesty's Government may on consideration adopt, I trust the House will see that that is a matter for reflection; but I am quite persuaded that there is not a man in England who will not share in those feelings which have been so well expressed by the hon. baronet and by my hon. friend. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Hopwood has given notice that on the 1st of July he will move the following resolution:—"That it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to use every means consistent with the maintenance of peace, either in concert with the Great Powers or otherwise, as they may think it expedient, to endeavour to terminate the civil war now raging in America."

Reports from Key West, to the 30th ult., state that a Federal frigate from Vera Cruz had brought information that the French had been repulsed by the Mexicans, and were retreating on Vera Cruz, with heavy loss. We need hardly remind our readers that all Northern reports likely to be unpleasant to France, must be received with reservation.

The French force in Mexico is to be largely reinforced.

The report of the committee on the credits for the Mexican expedition was read on Tuesday in the Corps Legislatif. The committee "identifying itself with the patriotic sentiment which dictated the demand of the Government," proposes voting the bill for the necessary supplies. The conclusions of the committee were unanimously adopted by the Chamber.

Lord Lyons is on his way to England.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, June 18, 1862.

The buoyancy noted in our last report received a momentary check, on Thursday and Friday last, in consequence of revived discussion in the press on the subject of mediation. The report has originated in Paris that France and England had agreed to address overtures of conciliation to the Washington Government, and though little credence was attached to it, it served to damp the tone of our market slightly. On Saturday, however, this suspicion was set at rest by the declaration of Government in the House on the previous night. Both Earl Russell and Lord Palmerston disclaimed any intention of mediating in American affairs at present, while the former pronounced the present time most inopportune for acting. The Scotia's news were also to hand that day, reporting a severe engagement at Richmond, without decided result, and no important change in the relative position of the belligerents, and our market, under this double stimulus, resumed its buoyancy with sales of 12,000 bales at fully $\frac{3}{4}$ d. advance. On Monday, the trade attended in large numbers, and a very extensive business was transacted, both by spinners, speculators, and exporters, the sales reaching 18,000 bales, at a further advance of fully $\frac{1}{4}$ d. On Tuesday the excitement continued, and the sales again reached 18,000 bales, adding another $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to the price. In Manchester, that day, considerable transactions occurred, and extensive orders to buy cotton were telegraphed in the afternoon, increasing the dearthness of the market. To-day, a very active demand again prevails at higher prices, the news by the Hibernian sustaining the confidence of speculators; the sales amount to 15,000 bales, and the quotations for middling American may be given at $13\frac{3}{4}$ d. for Uplands, $13\frac{1}{2}$ d. for Mobiles, and $13\frac{3}{4}$ d. to $13\frac{1}{2}$ d. for Orleans.

The chief feature of the week's business has been the enormous demand for Surat cotton, about two-thirds of the daily sales have been in that class, and the returns on Friday will probably show that two-thirds of the stock in the port has changed hands within the week. The advance has in consequence been very heavy, amounting in Dhollerahs and cotton generally below $9\frac{1}{2}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. since Friday. The market is now almost swept of desirable parcels of Surat cotton, and is worse supplied than has been known for years. It is curious to observe that the scale of prices ruling to-day is $\frac{3}{4}$ d. to $\frac{1}{2}$ d. above the highest point reached on January 9th, whereas the middling and better grades of American Cotton have just returned to the point touched then. Our quotations for Surat Cotton on the spot to-day may be given as $9\frac{1}{4}$ d. for fair Dhollerahs, $9\frac{1}{2}$ d. for Omrawuttees, $9\frac{3}{4}$ d. for Comptahs, $10\frac{1}{2}$ d. for Broach, and $11\frac{1}{4}$ d. for Lawginned Dharwar. "To arrive," a very large business has again been done, the sales on some days probably reaching 10,000 bales, or more. For new Broach of early shipment $9\frac{1}{2}$ d. has been paid, and possibly $10\frac{1}{2}$ d., though it has not transpired; $9\frac{3}{4}$ d. has been paid for March shipment of Omrawuttee, sample guaranteed; and $9\frac{1}{2}$ d. may be considered the value of the first shipments of that class, guaranteed fair.

April and May sailing are worth $9\frac{3}{4}$ d. The first shipments of Dhollerah are nominally worth $9\frac{1}{2}$ d., though it is doubtful whether that price has been obtained; but May sailing is not saleable at more than $9\frac{1}{4}$ d., and business has been done to-day at $9\frac{3}{4}$ d. Old crop Comptahs, close at hand, are worth $9\frac{1}{2}$ d.

In the last few days a strong speculative demand has sprung up for Egyptian, the sales of which, yesterday and to-day, reach 6000 bales, and prices are fully $\frac{3}{4}$ d. up since Friday. This description of cotton has long been below its relative value to American, and is now attracting much attention. It is believed that from three-fourths to seven-eighths of the last crop has now been received, and therefore comparatively little can be expected till near the end of the year. Brazils have been equally cheap in sympathy with Egyptian, and are now moving up along with them.

The latest news from America is not supposed in commercial circles to throw any light on the question of cotton supply; gentlemen arriving in town, who left New Orleans on the 20th May, report that no cotton had reached that city, except a single parcel of 400 bales, under very exceptional circumstances.

It seems that it belonged to an Englishman, and had been brought in the interior and transported by him to his sugar plantation a few miles above the city, and being in a region where no other cotton was stored, it escaped the general destruction that ensued at the taking of New Orleans, and as soon as the Federal forces entered the town it was placed under their protection and brought to market.

The general impression there was, that no cotton worth mentioning would arrive while the war went on, and the amount already destroyed was variously estimated at 250,000 to 500,000 bales.

MANCHESTER, June 17, 1862.

Notwithstanding that Whitsuntide holidays involved a partial closing of the warehouses during the past week, there has been a large speculative business done in our leading staples for India and China, and considerable quantities of cloth have been cleared off at $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per piece advance, and of yarn $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. higher for all markets, induced in a great measure by the better accounts from the East, reporting large sales both in Bombay and Calcutta at advancing prices.

The extensive transactions in cotton, founded on views of protracted warfare, aided by the clearance of goods now effected in the East, have also inspired general confidence. Shirtings made from the old American material, some of which had been bought on speculation some ten months ago, have been sold at an advance of $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb. more money than the previous week.

Our market to-day has been influenced by the large business doing in Liverpool, establishing an advance in the raw material of $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb., and a general and decided rise in the quotations for goods and yarns has been the result.

Yarns, as compared with this day week, are fully $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. dearer, and in some instances an advance of $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. has been paid; but this applies more especially to higher counts, from 60s. upwards.

Although at these extreme rates very little business has been done.

There has been a fair inquiry for India Mules from 30s. to 50s., and transactions to a moderate extent are reported; but in continental spinings buyers still hold back from purchasing anything beyond immediate wants. This has been a characteristic feature amongst our continental buyers since the commencement of the American struggle, as the German merchants have generally held an opinion of some sudden termination of hostilities, and consequent influx of cotton, they have thus acted with great caution, and do not wish to be caught with heavy stocks on hand. The cloth market, although very firm, does not keep pace with that of yarn, and in this department only a limited amount of business seems to have been done.

India shirtings are now very firmly held; stocks are not heavy, and holders will not sell except at an advance of $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per piece.

Some few transactions are reported in printers on rather better terms, and the lighter makes of T cloths have been in more request for the home-trade at $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per piece advance on last Tuesday's prices.

For long cloths and domestics the demand is slow, and the business doing is very limited.

The following have been exported from Liverpool, London, and the Clyde for six months, ending June 17, 1861-62:—

	Plain cotton	Coloured cottons	Printed cottons.
1862	136,419,992	11,596,679	15,501,443	yards.
1861	159,677,888	15,262,232	9,783,798	"
Bombay
1862	62,272,275	7,792,500	4,271,596	"
1861	111,082,065	9,103,765	7,219,179	"

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRIVATE intelligence received by recent arrivals from New Orleans estimates the quantity of cotton destroyed along the banks of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, as well as along the navigable water-courses in the interior, as not less than 500,000 bales, or nearly one-sixth of the entire crop of 1861. This estimate will not appear exaggerated to those who know that the most productive cotton plantations of the South lie in the "river bottoms," that is, the alluvial deposits of the Mississippi and its vast ramifications of tributaries.

A large quantity of cotton in all parts of the country had been destroyed by the exposure to the weather, as the greater portion of the crop is neither ginned nor baled, but simply stowed in heaps on the plantations.

Two other names, George C. Swanson and Judge John W. Andrews are added to the list of arrests by General Butler, which we gave in our last.

General Butler had appointed a Military Governor over the city to relieve himself of the onerous task of personally governing the unruly women and children of New Orleans; but at last advices retained the command of his department.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

— CONFEDERATE STATES, April 29, 1862.

You will see by the date of this that I am once more at home, where I arrived on Sunday evening, the 27th. I wrote you from Nassau, that I had taken passage by the —. We sailed on the 22nd; on the 23rd were chased by a steam-ship of war, but outran her; got off the coast at — (I think it best not to insert the name), on Friday morning, but could not cross the bar. As there were no blockaders in sight, put the ship in a position to run, if necessary, and waited for the next tide. At four on Friday afternoon attempted to run in, but got ashore on the breakers, and lay there all night. During the evening a large sailing man-of-war ran within three miles of us. We expected every moment that she would fire into us, but for some cause unexplained, she tacked about and ran off without doing so. If she had fired and hit us, it would have put an end to the —, as she had, amongst other stores, 1000 barrels of powder on board. In the course of the night we got a small steamer alongside, and transferred as much cargo as she could take, and at high tide on Saturday morning the ship was afloat and was towed in. I got to — late in the afternoon, delivered my despatches, and at nine started for home.

CONFEDERATE STATES, THE OAKS,

May 1, 1862.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—Were I only certain that my letters would reach you, without passing through the hands of our detestable foe, I should write you often, and at length. I know that now your anxiety is so great to hear from our beloved home, and also to hear from T—, that, though I am such a poor writer, I feel constantly a desire to tell you of all that is passing here. Soon after I wrote you the great Battle of Shiloh took place, and though the Yankees claim it as a victory, every day brings proof how dearly-bought it was for them. On Sunday, the 6th of April, we whipped them all day, and, though on Monday we were compelled by their immense reinforcements of fresh troops, and in the vicinity of their gunboats to retire from the field, it was anything but a victory to them. The attack was made by us, and we only retired from the ground that we had taken from them the day before, to our old position. When we consider how they outnumbered us, the superiority of their equipment, the profusion of their provisions, and every other comfort, the ease of their transportation, so that their troops came into the battle perfectly fresh, it is as great a victory to us as ever a nation won. T— was there, and Mr. W—, who was on General Gladden's staff, says that he acquitted himself most gallantly. I have had two letters from him since, and in the last, which was written hurriedly, he asked me to write you, and tell you as much of his whereabouts as I deemed prudent. He has been made Assistant-surgeon to the celebrated Colonel Jack Morgan's command, and when he wrote would leave Corinth in an hour, on a secret expedition, entrusted to Colonel Morgan by the President. I am afraid to write you the number of horsemen in the expedition, or the direction which they have taken, for fear this might fall into other hands than yours. But should they be successful, you will probably see some account of it first in the Northern papers; and you will know that T— was with them. They have learned to fear Captain Jack, as he is called, and I hope this will give them cause to fear and hate him still more. You must not believe what you see in their papers, if it is anything bad for us, till you hear from our side. Our men fought with the greatest bravery at Shiloh, and numbers of them were killed or wounded; but the loss of the Yankees was much greater than ours in number—and how far greater our loss when the noble Southern men are compared with their hireling hosts! General Gladden, our much loved friend, was wounded, lost an arm, and died a week after from the effects. We cannot estimate his loss to our army; and General Bragg, in his order to the soldiers concerning his death, expressed the general feeling in most beautiful language: "His country has lost a hero, his commanding officer a general, and his soldiers, a father." His loss as a friend is great to Mrs. B— and myself, and his daughter is broken-hearted. I do hope you will receive my letter written in March, but fearing you may not, I must repeat how much pleased we all were with T—'s frank and affectionate manner. We know that your anxiety will be great about him, but you must bear it bravely; and rest assured that he is as earnest in his country's service as you could wish him to be. If it is in our power to serve him in any way we will certainly do it, and I know he will not hesitate to call upon us. I know you will feel discouraged when you find that we have to give up so much of our land, but you must not feel disheartened till you find that we are defeated in the interior. Wherever their gunboats can get, they have us in their power; but I cannot believe that they ever will be able to make a stand out of their reach. I have been sick in bed for ten days with one of my bad attacks of rheumatism, and I find it very difficult to write now, so that you must excuse the quantity and quality of this. * * * * *

Before this reaches you, you will have heard of the occupation of New Orleans by the Federals, or rather of the river by their boats. The Mayor would not pull down the Confederate flag, as they ordered him, and told them that there was no man there who would do it; they then threatened to shoot it down from their gunboats, but at last accounts it still floated in defiance of them. It will take a large force of theirs to hold New Orleans, and even then they will find it a hard task. I cannot begin to tell you of our friends who were at Shiloh. * * * * *

I do not think of any others, except Rob Armistead, who were killed, in whom you feel a personal interest. A great many of the wounded have been sent here, and the women all over the country are doing all in their power to alleviate their sufferings. I never have seen such patience and fortitude as these men exhibit. I never have seen one who was not earnestly wishing to get well and go back to the army. It would make your heart bleed to see boys hardly fit to leave their mother's hearths bear themselves as if they had been in many a hard fought battle. And you say each of us, judging not N— was in the fight ten days, but was unhurt, also B—'s husband. I am looking for her every day. I still hope we may hold this place, but if the worst comes, we shall retire to the country. We look for stirring events in the next few weeks. * * * Everything is in its spring beauty now, flowers, birds, and fruit in abundance; and to think that it may all soon be in the possession of the invader! But the day will come when we will drive them from our soil; and though there may be mourning in almost every house for some loved one, it will be consolation that our country is free! * * * * *

Once more, I say, no matter what happens, be of good cheer, and remember that the darkest hour of night comes just before day. Give my best love to all your family. Ever and truly yours.

HELEN B—.

NEW ORLEANS, April 23, 1862.

DEAR MR. —,—Knowing the anxiety you will feel to hear from us after the news of the great Battle of Shiloh reaches you, I have been desirous of writing to tell you that though six members of our family were in the fight, each and all have escaped with life, and — alone was wounded; he received a Minié ball in his left thigh, just above his knee, which will disable him for a few weeks; but [we are only proud of that, so deep is our thankfulness that they have all been spared. A long letter to you a few weeks ago informed you that our forces were gathering at Corinth for a great battle, and that all of our sons and brothers were at that point. Generals Sidney Johnston, Beauregard, Bragg, Polk, &c., &c., decided to attack the enemy on the 5th five or six miles on this side of the Tennessee River, where they had encamped in great force, before they were joined by Buell's heavy column, which was marching down on the other side of the river. The tremendous rains which had flooded the country rendered it impossible for Beauregard to get our heavy guns into position by the 5th, and the attack was not made until daylight on the 6th. It took the enemy completely by surprise, many being at the breakfast tables. The force taken into the field on our side was 38,000, and that of the enemy was supposed to be 65,000. The battle raged furiously for ten hours, leaving us with a complete victory, though a heavy loss. Our men slept on the battle-field, occupying the Federal tents; 5000 or 6000 prisoners, arms, ammunition, &c., were captured; but a large force from Buell's command was thrown across the river during the night. The attack was renewed by them on the 7th; we had no reinforcements worth speaking of, and our exhausted troops fought a second battle against fresh men, and held their ground so firmly, that three o'clock ended the contest as a drawn battle—both sides so worn down and exhausted that it was impossible to do more. — says, never was so desperate a battle fought on this continent—surpassing Manassas infinitely for obstinate resistance and daring valour. I knew it would be so; for the men that encountered each other on that field were Southern men, standing before their own threshold, against a hardy and stalwart race of Western men. Oh, if I could tell you the many deeds of valour done by our friends and brothers you would be proud of them, as we are; but this little scrap of paper, and the little snatches of time which I only can command over here, are quite inadequate for doing justice to so full a subject, I can only write to tell you they are safe. Col. Deas was brought down to Mobile as soon as he could be moved, and I left him at —'s, under his wife's care, to recover, while I ran over here to bring home your runaway child, whom her good friends will not allow to return to me. I am using the words of others when I tell you that he "covered himself with glory" again yesterday; I listened to it from a letter from Corinth. His regiment, with that of Colonel Adams's of this city—one of the finest officers of the service—was in General Gladden's brigade. About ten o'clock the first day, poor Gladden fell mortally wounded, his arm shattered by a shell, from which he has since died. Colonel Adams then took command of the brigade which he had until about eleven o'clock, when he fell, a ball striking his head just over the eyes, and, strange to say, not killing him; then he, as next eldest colonel, took command, and led the brigade through that day and the next, not being wounded until about twelve o'clock the second day; but being able to keep his saddle, retained his command until the second contest was over. He had both of his horses killed under him, both being shot first and killed later; he was struck on his hip by a spent ball, on the hand by another, the inside of his glove was cut out, and his hand cut by a piece of shell, his hat shot twice off his head, the feather cut in two, and a large hole in the top of his hat big enough to thrust my fist through, his bridle reins cut off just below his hands, and with all this he is safe and sound alive in —'s own nice comfortable bed in the breakfast-room, now recovering in sight of her bright little flower-garden. Is it not little short of a miracle how he has escaped with life and limb? He calls the wound on his knee nothing, and hopes to return to his regiment in two or three weeks. We hear that no one behaved more gallantly on that day than Deas, and are proud to believe it. N. fought desperately, and much praise has been given to the 21st Regiment, which is his, under Colonel Crauford. Henry has been complimented for his desperate bravery also; he had his canteen shot through twice, and his pantaloons riddled. Both escaped untouched; and have gone home for a few days, and I am most anxious to return and see our heroes, and hear all they have to say of that, the greatest battle of this war. Shiloh, the name given, is a little country church about sixteen miles from Corinth, and five or six miles from the Tennessee River. From our town there were many wounded, but few lives lost. — lost a son, also —, and some other names I cannot recall. You will be sorry to hear that poor Armistead was killed early on the first morning, and died on the battle-field without being able to be moved—shot through the body just above the hips. We had no heart to rejoice in our victory, coming to us as it did saddened with the loss of friends, and many who were sufferers. General Gladden's remains were brought to Mobile to be buried. A's taken to his sister's, at Montgomery.

We are annoyed to see, by the Northern papers, that they claim a victory, but you may judge how little true this can be—their loss was admitted to be very heavy—some say eighteen or twenty thousand, upwards of 4000 prisoners have passed through Mobile; General Prentiss among them, and many officers.

I do not expect this to fall into the hands of the Federals, still if it should, the most patient of postmasters would never read through all this stuff, so I need not hesitate to tell you of one loss much to be regretted—Sidney Johnston was killed on the first day. This left and still leaves Beauregard first in command. We must look for another battle soon, but when it will take place it is impossible to tell. I dread to think of it. Both Mrs. — sons are safe and untouched. There has been a severe bombardment of the forts within the past week, but with little effect. The enemy have thrown upwards of 390,000 pounds of powder and upwards of a thousand ton of iron into Fort Jackson, and the result on our side is ten men killed, seventeen wounded, no breach in the walls, and only the combustible within burnt. The enemy's boats have retired since yesterday morning—two were destroyed and several crippled; this is General Duncan's official communication, therefore true.

The new iron-clad steamer Louisiana is finished, and went down to give assistance on the 20th. Of course all this keeps us very anxious and miserable, but we are hopeful that our good cause must triumph; that we cannot be defeated ultimately or subjugated, is firmly believed. If we could only have peace, and see our dear family once more safe at home, how thankful we would be. If you can see or write to Mrs. —, do tell her what I write you. I fear she never gets my letters, though I write constantly. — was unhurt, and — not in the battle; he is at Cumberland Gap, higher up in Tennessee, so is —. I could write volumes if I had time to give, but I write always in a hurry, for which you must make allowances. I hear there is a letter for me from you at home; I shall thank you for it after I see it. I expect to return to Mobile on Friday.

JACKSON, MISSISSIPPI, Saturday, 27th.

After writing the above we were taken entirely by surprise on the 25th, to hear that the Federal boats had passed the forts, and would be at the city (New Orleans) in twenty-four hours. I left with my daughter the following morning by the first train; we are thus far on our way home, and I add these few words, though everything is still in uncertainty. It was feared the city would have to surrender, the commanding officer (Lovell) inclined that way, though the influential citizens were trying to induce a stand being made. We heard from an operator, at some point on the cars during the night, that Porter had demanded a surrender of the city in eight hours, and the answer was No. If this be true, God only knows what this day has brought forth; if the city is shelled, think of my poor sister and her daughters. Mr. H. is at Corinth. All the cotton is ordered to be burnt—every bale was burning when we left, all along the road.

MOBILE, April 28, 1862.

MY DEAR —,—With scarcely collectedness enough of thought, of feeling, I must attempt a letter to you, in reply to yours from Liverpool of the 15th of March, which I received in the cars from the hands of Mr. —, whom we met near New Orleans on Friday last, as we were flying from that city with the Federals in sight. I know how shocked you will be to hear that, but it is, true. After a vigorous bombardment of Forts Jackson and Philip of several days, the gunboats succeeded in passing the forts, and were on their way to the city. This intelligence reached the city about nine o'clock on the 24th; the alarm bell was rung to give notice to the citizens, and the startling news soon spread over the town, producing consternation, as you may imagine; for up to that hour all the information from the forts was of the most cheering character. The bombardment had been terrific, and the forts made such good resistance that the officers thought they could keep the Federal boats at bay, as they had done for several successive days. The accounts received were so meagre that I hardly dare attempt to give you much of a description, but will tell what we were able to hear. The Federal boats were supposed to be forty-two in number, to which we had about seven to offer resistance, under cover of the forts, which were said to be well garrisoned, and containing 300 guns. With such an armament of guns, they supposed they could prevent their reaching the city; but a desperate dash about four o'clock in the morning; and a sharp fight from our boats, was all unavailing to keep them back, and they sailed by. As soon as we heard this, I procured my passport, and left by the first train, glad to escape with my daughter before they actually reached the town; of course, all we know since is telegraphic; and amid a variety of conflicting reports, I think the facts are, that a certain number, from seven to thirteen of the boats reached the city, a flag of truce was sent to the Mayor demanding the surrender of the city. General Lovell said he would evacuate the city, but not surrender it, and did withdraw himself and the forces to Camp Moore, about fifty miles above the town. The Federals then sent to demand that the flag from the City Hall and other buildings should be taken down, or they would shell the city: and the reply of the Mayor was, it should not be removed from a single public building, and they might shell if they chose, which has not been done; neither has the city been surrendered, as far as we can learn up to this evening, this is how the whole matter stands;—a despatch says General Duncan "still holds the forts, and they are as strong as ever"; the transports are still below; and without their forces to land and attack the town, I don't see what they can do but make an empty demand of the city. After the severe bombardment of many days, they can't be in condition to shell a city of that extent, I should suppose, without fresh supplies of shells and ammunition. It seems a curious position, and what will be the result we have yet to see. You may imagine the anxiety with which we shall wait the events of the next few days. All the cotton in the city was ordered to be burnt immediately, and the bright blazes, and heavy columns of smoke soon attested the truth of the threat—that every bale should be destroyed, sooner than fall into the hands of the enemy. The sugar and molasses were rolled in the river, and I saw piles of burning cotton as I drove out of the town and along the railroad, at several plantations. Let there be no doubt on this point. I saw it burning with my own eyes, and heard gentlemen say the same was going on on the Levee. I was very glad to get your letter from Liverpool, and am truly sorry you seem not to receive any news from here. I had written a long letter from New Orleans, telling you of the Battle of Shiloh, and before I sent it my departure became necessary, and I brought it with me as far as Jackson, being detained there for a few hours. I attempted to add a P.S., but the cars arrived, and I scribbled off a few lines and gave it to Mr. —, who was going to New Orleans, and promised to send it from there; also a newspaper, giving the latest intelligence about the city. — was here this morning, and offered to send this for me, so I have been obliged to write at the table this evening, with the family bothering around me, which will account for all my omissions, mistakes, &c.

THE FAITHFULNESS OF THE NEGRO.—The Times observes: Hitherto the whole experience of the war supports the view that, as a rule, the Southern negro is warmly attached to his master, and that he would not only obey his orders with the utmost faithfulness and docility, but fight for him to the last extremity. And should the war last for another year, or be protracted far into the present summer, it will not surprise those who know the negro character best to learn that not 20,000 negroes only, but 100,000 have been enrolled in the South, and they will hate the "Yankees" quite as intensely as their masters do, and fight against them with as much determination.

Foreign Correspondence.

WASHINGTON, June 3, 1862.

I added a postscript in my last in regard to the evacuation of Corinth, although the news had just been received, and treated at first as unquestionable canard, yet I saw so many advantages to the Confederates in this movement, that I had no difficulty in believing it. We have now not only the confirmation but some of the particulars. When Halleck took possession, he found the place entirely deserted, except by the old men, women, and children. Everything of value had been carried away, not a gun was found, and such had been the deliberation and success of the retreat that every sick man had been removed. When we remember that the sick are an incumbrance to an army, it will be seen that their movements must have been made with abundance of time; and it is now known that the movement has been progressing for a long time. The works were found to be quite weak, and might have been carried at any time by storm, and it is now said there were never more than 60,000 troops at the place. Where they have gone is not known. The Union army is said to be greatly mortified at the result, as the success in getting the position is now neutralized by the lateness of the season, the approach of the hot and sickly season, and the comparative worthlessness of any mere occupation of points like this. It is true that it cuts off the communication on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad; but so long as they have the Northern Central, they can still pass to and from Western Tennessee. I think it is very likely that the bulk of the Confederate army may have retired to Grand Junction, a position in the Northern Central Road.

The entire gain, therefore, that has been made by Halleck in his campaign of two months, with great suffering from sickness to his men, has been the occupation of a village on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, which gives him at that point the command of the railroad; he will probably move off towards Memphis, but he will not be likely to reach there without encountering some opposition.

The Confederate army, under Johnson, Ewell, and Jackson, which made so brilliant a dash up the Shenandoah Valley, driving everything before them, is now retreating. I gave you my views as to their probable movements when the first accounts of their success reached us, and those views appear to be realized. Fremont has crossed the Shenandoah range of mountains with a considerable force, and is now pressing them on the west, whilst a force from the east is also approaching them. Front Royal has been reoccupied by the Union forces, as well as Strasburg and Winchester. Jackson will now probably rapidly retreat to his original position, having accomplished the capture of several thousand prisoners, and large amount of war material, but unable to hold his position; and certainly he would have been unwise to remain so far distant from the main Confederate army. I think that the numbers of this force have been, as usual, greatly exaggerated, and that it is probable it never exceeded 15,000, all told. With the present Federal force—now so largely augmented—so close to them, it may be very possible that we shall hear of a battle.

This steamer will carry you accounts of the desperate battle fought near Richmond, on Saturday, May 31. We have, as yet, no details. The despatches received have been most remarkably meagre and unsatisfactory. But at the present time, after carefully reading over all the particulars that have come to us, I arrive at these conclusions:—The Confederates determined to make an effort to surround McClellan and cut off his rear communications. At the outset they were entirely successful, driving before them in full retreat Casey's division, and capturing all the artillery and baggage of the entire division; but after pursuing them a short distance, the reserves of Heintzelman and Keys came up, checking the pursuit. And later in the day two additional divisions were brought up to sustain and help them, and night coming on the Confederates abandoned further action. Next morning there were some offensive demonstrations on the part of the Confederates, but being repulsed, there was nothing particularly accomplished on either side. The artillery and baggage of Casey's division remained in the hands of the Confederates.

The loss of both sides must have been very heavy. We have not yet heard any estimate of the loss, but I am prepared to hear that not less than 10,000 have been killed and wounded on both sides in the battle, as it appears to have been, thus far, the most desperate contested affair that has yet taken place.

This battle, that of Williamsburg, other skirmishes, and sickness, must reduce the strength of McClellan's army fully 20,000; but he will soon be reinforced by a portion of M'Dowell's force, which will now reach him from Fredericksburg.

The flight of Casey's division in the battle of Saturday has overthrown the idea that the men under McClellan could not be induced to do any running. The fighting must continue now almost continually at and around Richmond until its fate be decided.

I have already written you something with reference to the state of affairs at New Orleans. I shall not be surprised to hear of some dreadful outbreak there. The city is now held under the most rigid administration of martial law, and the people dare not utter a word, except such as may be approved by their military rulers, under penalties of the severest nature. If this method can create any love for the Union, I am greatly mistaken; but I begin to believe that the total absence of the expected development of Union sentiment throughout the South, will, perhaps, determine the Government to occupy the cities as conquerors, and treat them as a conquered people.

General Butler proposes to pass the summer at some of the points on the Gulf Coast,—Bay St. Louis, Pass Christian, or Belloci, and has turned over the Military Governorship of the city to one of his officers—namely, Shepey.

HAVANNAH, May 24, 1862.

The fall of New Orleans was a sad and unexpected blow to us; but the noble exhibition of patriotism by the inhabitants—men, women, and children—should, in the estimation of the world, be worth more than a victory. 18,000 bales of cotton were consigned to the flames, and the owners themselves applied the torch, while their wives and daughters stood by urging them on to further destruction of property. From Lafayette to the lower wharf of the city there was a sheet of flame, caused by the burning of steamers, ships, lofts, rams, and of all things that could be useful to the enemy. New Orleans fell, but the Federal victory was barren. The people remain true to their cause, preferring the fate of martyred patriots to a political or social intercourse with their invaders. The 30,000 Union people, spoken of by the Northern papers, had vanished into thin air, and when the conqueror summoned the people to take the oath to support the Federal Government none appeared; the Mayor and Common Council were ordered by General Butler to subscribe to the oath, and their reply was, "We submit to the rule of the conqueror while he holds this city, in all that pertains to its military government, will do nothing in violation of his proclamation, which says, 'the rights of persons and of property will be protected during his occupation of the city;' but we will not take an oath by which we become perjured traitors;" and instantly they were hurried off to prison. The Foreign Legion, an association formed for the protection of private property, laid down their arms and refused to co-operate with General Butler; and some Englishmen were seized, a ball and chain hung to their legs, and all placed at menial work on one of the fortifications. It is natural that the inhabitants of a captured city should suffer some annoyance, privations, and hardships; but General Butler, exasperated at the barrenness of his dearly-bought victory, has committed monstrosities unparalleled in the history of civilized warfare. Armed squads of soldiers are sent from store to store—all of which are closed—the doors are forcibly broken down, and the demand made, by order of General Butler, that all the money in the establishment be delivered up. Samuel Smith, an old-established merchant, was in this manner robbed of 60,000 dollars, and others of smaller amounts, under threats of personal punishment and imprisonment. The Consul of the Netherlands was applied to for 800,000 dollars, which General Butler learned was deposited in his Consulate; he refused to give up the money. The keys of his iron safe were then demanded; these he also refused to surrender; when he was seized, searched, and stripped. His vault was then forcibly entered, the money (800,000 dollars) found, and taken from him.

I now come to an atrocity which must cause all the world to blush at the thought that there could live a people so debased as those from whose association we recoil with horror and disgust. The people of New Orleans refuse to affiliate in any manner with the Northern invaders; the merchants will not open their stores—decline to sell to, or buy from, the enemy; the small shopkeepers observe the same rule, and mechanics and labourers fully enter into the general feeling of the community. This is natural; and it is natural, too, that the mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters of the patriot soldiers who have flocked to the camp of the invincible Beauregard, should refuse to notice in any manner the officers or soldiers of the Federal army. Not equal to a contest with men, the Federal commander wages a war upon the ladies of New Orleans—his dastardly, brutal attack is found in his general order, No. 28, published in the New Orleans True Delta.

The news from the South is excellent, though the Northern papers herald forth great Federal victories, as usual; the abandonment of Yorktown, Portsmouth, and Norfolk, was a part of a plan agreed upon by the President and the officers in command in Virginia weeks before it occurred. As at New Orleans, every particle of property which could be seized by or made available to the enemy was destroyed by our troops at these seaports. When the Confederates meet the enemy on land, out of reach of their gunboats, they will certainly defeat their armies. It is a notable fact that the Southern armies have been victorious in every single land fight which has occurred since the beginning of the war, except at Sommerset. Recently, and I write from reliable information, the Confederates have gained three important and decisive victories.—Johnson defeated McClellan at West Point and at Williamsburg, and Bragg defeated Pope near Corinth. Speaking of the first engagement, a friend from Baltimore writes me,—“Nearly 800 wounded Federals are here in one boat from West Point, 1500 have arrived at New York, and 600 are on their way to Philadelphia; and yet the Government declares its loss in killed, wounded, and missing, to be less than 1000.”

The sham plea of releasing Union people of the South has exploded; the Northern army find Union sentiment in Virginia, Tennessee, and Louisiana, as scarce as cotton bales after they have taken a cotton port. There is but one feeling prevailing the entire population of the South—victory, or the surrender of a depopulated country.

The Mexican question naturally excites considerable interest. I never hear any difference of opinion as to the necessity of restoring order in that unhappy country, and though the task may be more difficult than some persons imagine, it is certain France can and will accomplish it. Of course France will incur the hatred of the North, but that will be amply compensated by an alliance with the South, for the South is not only willing but able to assist France in her effort to promote the progress of civilization.

PARIS, JUNE 18, 1862.

The almost simultaneous adoption of the Confiscation, or rather Spoliation Bill, and rejection of the Emancipation Bill, by Congress, coupled with the late startling events, as developed by the progress of the American War, have worked a powerful change in the public sentiment of France. The largest portion of those who had so far adhered to the North only, because they believed its philanthropy sincere, have, with an eloquent unanimity, turned their admiration into scorn. Even the Presse and L'Opinion Nationale seem to be wavering and looking for a decent mode of abandoning their Northern friends to their ominous fate.

Though the well known unscrupulousness of the Government of the United States, and the bare-faced villainies of its agents, had prepared the better informed classes of French society to expect still greater villainies at their hands, Paris has literally been stunned with horror by the last proclamation of General Butler. All honest and gallant men, all pure Christians, stand aghast in presence of this fiendish and demon-like perversity.

Not content to have plundered the banks and the Netherlands Consulate, not satisfied with having attempted to smite the chivalrous people of New Orleans by a first proclamation, evidently intended to convert the lower classes of that unfortunate city into a regular band of Federal assassins, the heartless Butler now invites his infuriated soldiers to the most savage licentiousness, he condemns prisoners of war to be shot and drives the faithful from the temples, thus upraising the darkest crimes of the darkest ages—plunder, rape, and sacrilege.

France, I assure you, remains no longer a cool and indifferent spectator of such atrocities, perpetrated in the name of "liberty and union." Her chivalry has lost no time in stigmatizing and branding with infamy the barbarian Butler, who wallows in mud, blood, plunder, and lust.

But it may be as well for France and England timely to bear in mind that many of their own daughters residing in New Orleans are alike exposed to Butler's indignities; for no apparent sign distinguishes them from the native ladies of New Orleans; and England, especially knows that under Yankee rule, no protection attaches to the folds of neutral and friendly flags.

Without pretending to suggest what course it becomes Europe to pursue in the present instance, it may, perhaps, with propriety, be remarked, that only two years ago France and England, guided solely by a high sense of humanity, have thought it their bounden duty to intervene in Syria under somewhat similar circumstances.

Be this as it may, Europe can no longer plead ignorance. The Union mask, which for the past year has so successfully hid the ultimate designs of Lincoln's Administration, has just been cynically thrown off; and the foul purposes of the Northern fanatics appear in all their naked hideousness.

Butler and Wool, the Federal Wallensteins—worthily pro-consuls of the American Attila—proclaim to the civilized world that the South is to be placed under the stern rule of military conquest, its population spoliated, the sanctity of their homes polluted, and their mothers, wives, daughters, and sisters, to be treated and dealt with as common harlots plying their avocation.

Will the mere condemnation of such an infamous proclamation be found sufficient by Europe to avert the perpetration of crimes which would cast universal disgrace on humanity? France, at least, does not think so; for the exasperated cry of vengeance uttered by the South, through the patriotic voice of the glorious Beauregard, has found an echo in its very heart. France, resenting the insult offered to her own dependants at Louisiana, feels that between them and Butler the war must now be a war to the hove-knife. She now understands that between the patriot, Jefferson Davis, and the brutal Lincoln, between the South and the North, there exists a greater abyss than that which separates honour and virtue from dishonour and crime. Hence her desire to use her moral influence, even her military power, to compel the United States to respect the laws of humanity and Christianity, I can give you the most positive assurance that the Count de Persigny's visit to England has no other object but to rouse the slumbering pride of the British Cabinet, and to decide Earl Russell to act in concert with France to improve their joint mediation to the United States. Lord Palmerston has no doubt been correct when he stated in the House of Commons that the French Government had thus far made no official communication to the English Government respecting the American affairs; but his lordship might have added, with just as much correctness, the British Cabinet have, again and again, refused to entertain every overture made to them by the Emperor upon the subject.

The news of the battle which took place before Richmond, on the 31st of May, though transmitted in the usual apocalyptic form, are generally construed into a decided Federal defeat. Otherwise it would be difficult to understand why McClellan, if victorious, should have made no further move towards Richmond up to the 4th of June, which is the last date heard of.

Every man, woman, and child on this side of the Channel, have cheerfully received the news of this Confederate victory. Since the proclamation of Butler, and the murder of the coloured people of Norfolk by the soldiers of Wool, every one prays ardently for the success of the South, and anxiously looks towards Richmond. Indeed, I heard a lady attached to the Empress's suite, say:—"The South must now conquer her independence or die. Much preferable would it be for the last son and daughter of the Confederate States to fall unstained in defence of their honour and virtue, than to sully their new escutcheon by forming another political association with a people who have brought upon themselves universal condemnation." Severe as may be this rebuke, especially when it emanates from one of the gentler sex one can hardly think it too bitter after reading the remarks made in the United States Congress but a few days before the last battle before Richmond, by Mr. Whorries, of Indiana. The Confiscation Bill, under consideration on the 21st of May last, in the House of Representatives, Mr. Whorries said—"I abhor treason, and could stand here during my whole hour, denouncing treason in the seceded States; but why do that, while we have treason all around us? Simon Cameron, the late Secretary of War, has been tried and convicted by this house of fraud, peculation, and corruption of the grossest character—and what follows? Simon Cameron is clothed with fresh power; he goes from glory to glory, and with a resolution of this house branding him with crimes, he will represent this country at the court of Russia.

"Fremont has settled down in St. Louis, with a horde of speculators, committing fraud and plundering the public treasury, and now he is promoted, and once more ruling honest people."

Unfortunately for this once honoured country, both the administration and the people of the United States, are on a par with Simon Cameron and Fremont. Congress passes Confiscation Bills to enable the North to plunder the South, and the people endorse the outrageous proceedings of their rulers, anxiously waiting the time when Southern spoils are to be divided among them the price of their own personal degradation.

Now that it is no longer possible to mistake the malignant and perverse policy of the Northern States, it is to be hoped that Europe—true to its elevated sense of honour—will exalt the noble determination of the South to defend to the last extremity their fire-sides against the ruthless aggression of their invaders, to maintain—cost what it may—their autonomy, and admit the Confederate States into the great family of nations.

P.S.—Since writing the above, I have read a letter dated New York, the 4th of June, and addressed to a gentleman of the highest standing, who resides in Paris, which states unequivocally that, up to that date, the Government had neither disowned the proclamation of Butler nor intended to do so; that, inasmuch as the citizens of New Orleans had refused to take the oath of allegiance required from them, they had to be treated as conquered nations, and starved into passive obedience if necessary. This last means has already been resorted to by General Wool, for the purpose of famishing the people of Norfolk into Union sentiments. General Wool, says the letter, has announced to the city authorities that no provisions should be permitted to enter Norfolk until the people had taken the oath of fidelity to the United States.

Such a course needs no comment. You have heard that Mrs. Lee, her two daughters, and a daughter-in-law of General Lee, had been made prisoners of war. This outrage upon humanity was still to be aggravated. It is now ignominiously suggested that they should be retained by the Federal authorities as hostages.

From another Correspondent.

PARIS, June 18, 1862.

Notwithstanding the favourable news said to have been received from the French army in Mexico, a general anxiety seems to prevail about its actual safety. Its defeat and route near Puebla are controverted by the official organ of the Government; but its present situation must be quite precarious, for orders have been issued to hurry the departure of the troops designed to reinforce the French corps. It is further stated that General Forey, the Montebello hero, goes out with them.

H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, accompanied by his Excellency Lord Cowley, Sir Charles Phipps, Colonel Kappel, and Major Teesdale, has spent the day of the 14th with the Emperor and Empress, at Fontainebleau.

The Emperor went to greet the Prince at the railroad depot.

After breakfast, the Court took the Prince to ride through the forest, and hence accompanied him to the railroad, where the Emperor and the suite bid to the young Prince a most affectionate and cordial adieu.

No diplomatic invitations have as yet been made by the Court since it has taken its abode at Fontainebleau, and none are expected to issue for the present. It is believed that the Empress has resolved to visit the London Exposition as soon as the apartments of Clarendon House will be ready to receive her Majesty and suite.

The Protectionists seem not to have lost the hope of bringing about the repeal of the commercial treaty which now governs France and England. The industrialists of the manufacturing city of Rouen have petitioned M. Thiers to represent their interests in the Corps Legislatif. It is said that M. Thiers has accepted the mission to attack, during the next session, the new commercial system lately adopted by the Emperor.

The clergy of France are also at work to elect a representative of their own. The Count Montalambert, their chosen candidate, is to canvass the Department des Doubs.

The financial world has been put quite in a flurry by the unexpected failure of the Italian banker, Barattelli, whose assets are said to show a deficit of ten millions of francs. This disaster, which as yet remains unexplained, has led M. Barattelli to commit suicide.

On Saturday last, the remains of King Joseph, the eldest brother of Napoleon I., were transferred to the Hotel des Invalides. The only persons present at the funeral ceremony were the Princes Charles and Joseph Bonaparte, who accompanied the body from Florence to Paris, the Minister of State, the Governor of the Invalides, the Prince Gabrielli, Count Ornano—all members of the Imperial family.

M. Ricasoli, the celebrated Italian Minister, is now at La Haye, on his way to London, where he intends to remain during the month of June. He is expected in Paris during the early part of July.

The city of Bordeaux has just been sorely afflicted; the whole right wing of its municipal palace is now but a heap of smoking ruins. The next most precious and beautiful archives of France have been destroyed by the fire, together with all the plans contained in that part of the building.

A large number of paintings have fortunately been saved, but not without some irreparable damage. The adulterous woman of Titien has been most seriously injured.

Several firemen were hurt during the progress of the fire, but their wounds are of a slight character, and no fear is entertained for their recovery.

The French people are very much amused just now at the last demonstrations of the London Times about the American affairs. Its first article upon mediation took everyone by surprise; everyone thought that the Times had at last faced the deep miseries which afflict the working classes of Great Britain, and had made up its mind to try to save them from impending starvation by exciting the Government to offer its mediation. Everyone supposed that the Times had finally come to the conclusion that it was better for the famished population of England to confront the dangers of war than the tortures of hunger. But its last ridiculous lucubration, attempting to throw the burthen and imaginary dangers of mediation upon France and Russia, has satisfied the public mind that it is no easy thing to do away even with the most problematic and puerile fears once engrafted in one's mind.

For the exclusive benefit of the Times, and with the hope it may recall the energy so gloriously displayed in its first article, I will quote a letter just received from a Southern lad of fifteen, now at school in Switzerland: "Do you believe that Richmond will be evacuated; I hope we will fight before leaving our capital. If its evacuation becomes really necessary, the Generals talk of burning the town. I would ten times rather see my native town burnt to ashes than let it fall into the hands of our mean and barbarous foe.

"If they take possession of the whole country, still the war is not finished; every child to be born in the South is an avenger of his father's blood.

"Then let us sacrifice all at the shrine of liberty, and, confident of success, with God's help we will soon be free."

Could the Times and the British Cabinet, for a week or so, feel towards England as this boy feels towards his country, mediation might become an English byword, soon to be followed by peace in America.

I advise your readers to peruse the Patrie of last Sunday. It contains a remarkable editorial upon the question of mediation, which it considers the only possible mode of bringing about peace in America. It thinks that France and England owe it both to themselves and to the cause of humanity to put a stop to this implacable war, which, being without issue, threatens to become a savage war of destruction.

The Pope has delivered his allocution. It is a complete political manifesto. The father of catholicity disappears. The Sovereign rises to proclaim to his subjects his ultimate views, and engrosses his political tribulations. Orlea facta est. Alas! that religion should seem openly at war with modern society.

In connection with this extraordinary political move on the part of the Pope, it is assured that the principal leaders of the Legitimist party are to meet in Switzerland, at the Palace of the Duchess of Parma. It is further asserted that the Count Chambord is to preside over this assembly, which promises to be very numerous.

We may look for another manifesto, destined to astound the democratic world.—Attendons nous verrons.

THE ENGLISH PRESS ON THE BATTLE OF RICHMOND.

The following extracts show that our press is not deluded by Federal "accounts."

The Times American leader on Monday says:—

A battle has been fought before Richmond, and, notwithstanding the "sensational headings" in the newspapers and the despatches of the General, we strongly suspect that battle was not a Federal victory. There is an euphemistic and apologetic tone in the very opening of General McClellan's account of this proceeding which prepares us for a doubtful victory. The enemy took advantage of a storm in order to make this attack. When the attack was made, General Casey's division "gave way unaccountably and disunitedly." An historian less delicate in his phraseology than General McClellan, would probably have said that they broke and ran. The General continues—"This caused a temporary confusion." That is to say, the fact of the first line running panic-stricken from the field deranged the Federal order of battle. During this derangement the guns and baggage were lost. Thus far a defeat could not have been more mildly and gently described. It seems to have been a scamp without resistance, for the rout was "unaccountable" and "disunitedly." The guns and baggage were all lost, and the field was abandoned. General McClellan goes on, however, to show that a change came over the scene. He succeeded in bringing other divisions of his vast army to the rescue. Generals Meintzelman and Keyes brought up their divisions, and so also did Generals Sedgewick and Richardson. Here were four divisions brought upon the field at this critical moment. The enemy were checked. General McClellan says they were driven back at the point of the bayonet, and that the ground was covered with their dead. But, although the enemy had been repulsed, and the ground covered with his dead, he was not so discouraged but that he renewed the attack on the following morning. He was, according to General McClellan's report, upon this second day again everywhere repulsed. That he was pursued, General

McClellan does not affirm; it is not even asserted that he ran. The utmost that General McClellan claims is, that the Confederates were arrested in full pursuit of the Federals, and were forced back by fresh troops. The General knows that his own loss is heavy, and thinks that that of his enemy "must be" enormous.

Such is the account given by the Federal Commander-in-Chief of that Battle of Richmond which the Federal papers announce to the Northern public as "Great Slaughter of the Rebels," and "Splendid Conduct of the Union Troops." We have no doubt that everything stated by the General as within his own knowledge is strictly true, but yet, perhaps, if the account had been written by a completely impartial eye-witness, the impression conveyed might have been somewhat different. We might then have known why it was the General did not, on the second day, pursue the repulsed enemy up to the walls of his city, or even enter it with the fugitives. We should not have been obliged to seek about among less trustworthy channels of news for some details wherewith to clothe with flesh the dry skeleton which the General has sent for Mr. Lincoln's closet. As it is, there are many things of no slight importance which we learn from those unauthorized persons who contrive to elude the vigilance of Mr. Stanton's myrmidons, and who still write letters from the Federal camp. It was, it seems, the levies from New York and Pennsylvania, which ran so promptly on the first assault, leaving Colonel Bailey to meet his death while vainly trying to save his batteries. As we may depend upon it that this circumstance will be remembered hereafter, when the Northern States come to apportion among themselves the credit and the burdens of the war, we cannot afford to pass over this battle without noticing that incident. So also, when General McClellan states that the enemy were on the first day driven back, he omits to state how far they were driven back. This omission is rectified by another account, which states that the Federals regained all the lost ground "but about half a mile." The special correspondent of the New York Times, however, still further elucidates this important point by stating that on Sunday morning "the rebel army still occupied the camps of Casey's and Couch's divisions." This first day's Federal victory therefore ended by leaving the Federal camp in the hands of the vanquished Confederates. It is, moreover, told on the same authority that the guns, the ultimate fate of which is left dubious in General McClellan's despatch, were not only not recovered, but that all the nineteen were carried off to Richmond, together with the Commissariat stores. The Confederates, therefore, on Saturday night had half a mile of the Federal battle-field, two camps, nineteen guns, and all the baggage, and yet they lost the victory, in the Federal General's despatch, and in the Federal newspapers. It must be very hard for a Confederate General to win a victory in the Northern newspapers.

Under these circumstances the event of the second day was still no disaster to the Confederates. We hear of no flight, no panic; they were driven back to their old position. That is all. When the firing on both sides ceased, "the rebels had fallen back to beyond our original lines, leaving guards stationed to watch our advance, and also to bring their wounded off the field." It is clear from this that the Confederates at the close of the second day's battle held the same ground from which they had advanced on the morning of the first day. The victory, therefore, exists only in the large type of the Northern newspapers. It was but a Confederate victory neutralized by a second day's drawn battle.

We remark in this Battle of Richmond, and in other recent engagements, that a practice is rife with the Federal Generals which we never before heard of, except among the leaders of Asiatic soldiers. It is constantly stated that cavalry are placed behind the Federal soldiers to drive them on upon the enemy. In the recent case it is related that fugitives were shot by troops sent after them by their own generals. May it not be that many more than these few, who are thus sabred or pistolled into the battle, are kept in this contest sorely against their will? Is there no hope that the crisis of this madness has arrived? If not, all that we have seen is but a harmless game to what we shall see now that the heats of summer are coming on.

The Morning Herald observes:—

General McClellan's plans have been disturbed, and it may even turn out that they have been spoiled, by the vigilance and enterprise of the enemy. In his despatch to the War Department the Federal general communicates the particulars of the attack. Taking advantage of a terrible storm, the Confederates fell on the left flank of the Federals, and the left flank gave way, causing temporary confusion, in the course of which the Federal guns, baggage, and waggons changed owners and disappeared. In other words there was a second Bull Run. The soldiers of the North have once more been humbled. * * * That the Confederates were less successful the second day than they were the first is not improbable, but it is really monstrous to be told that the Federals are some miles nearer Richmond than they were before, when all previous accounts agreed in stating that the Federal advance was within five or six miles of the town. An advance of some miles would therefore take the Federals to the other side of Richmond. The statement must, in fact, be untrue, and should once more warn us that the Northern press is regulated by Mr. Stanton, and that the Northern telegraph and railways are in the hands of the President.

The Morning Post, in criticising the Federal accounts, says:—

After an interval of but six days the unpleasant task has been again imposed upon the Federal generals of confessing themselves worsted by opponents whom they affect to despise. No one can read the despatch of General McClellan without being convinced that it tells the story of a surprise and a defeat. We have become so habituated to the style in which the North recounts its victories that we recognize with ease the modest language with which it seeks to conceal a reverse. When Fortune smiles on the Federal arms; when fields are truly won, the number of the prisoners taken, the amount of arms and baggage captured, are all specified with cleanliness, if not with accuracy. But when Fortune frowns; when losses, not gains, have to be spoken of, no attempt is made to fix their amount. The vaguest generalities are lavishly indulged in, and, as all battles must sooner or later come to a close, the despatches uniformly testify to the courage and intrepidity of troops which are represented as having checked the further progress of the enemy. The battle which has taken place within a few miles of Richmond has resulted in the defeat by the Confederates of that portion of General McClellan's army which they attacked, and in the loss by the Federals of their guns and baggage. This is admitted in express terms in General McClellan's despatch; and, as we have no reason to suppose that the Confederates anticipated annihilating the immense army encamped outside Richmond, we must, in default of any evidence to the contrary, conclude that they succeeded in their attack to the utmost extent of their expectations.

The most observable feature in the recent battle is that the Confederates were those to attack. This is the second time within a week that the South has compelled the North to enter the lists, and on both occasions with success.

In some respects the attack of the Confederates resembles that of the Russians at Inkerman, with this difference, however, that whilst the fourth division of the British army sustained, without wavering, the onset of the Russian army, the division of the Federal army against which the Confederates directed their attack "unaccountably and dismally gave way." These are the words in which General McClellan communicates the immediate result of the Confederate charge. "A temporary confusion" followed, "during which the guns, baggage, and waggon were lost." In the meanwhile Generals Heintzelman and Kearney brought up their divisions and checked the further progress of the enemy; and immediately afterwards two more divisions having arrived, we are told that with their assistance "the enemy was driven back at the point of the bayonet." Thus ended the battle of May 31.

It is impossible for us to say how long the engagement lasted, or what time elapsed before the Federals regained possession of their lost ground; but it is perfectly evident that the Confederates not only succeeded in driving General Casey's division from the position it occupied, but also in carrying off in safety its guns, waggon, and baggage. This could not have been done if the other divisions referred to had acted with the promptitude or the gallantry ascribed to them in General McClellan's despatch. It is not easy in the heat of action to carry off a large quantity of guns and baggage, and more especially when obliged to retire at the point of the bayonet. It is doubtful how much the Confederates hoped to effect by their bold manoeuvre, but it is undeniable they gained a brilliant success. The Federals, after the battle, recovered possession of their previous position, but of nothing more; the Confederates, on the other hand, were richer to the extent of the war material they had captured. On the following day the Confederates are reported as having renewed the attack, and having been repulsed. As, however, we have no details of this day's proceedings, it is doubtful if anything more serious than a skirmish is referred to. The Federals confess their loss to have been very heavy, and set down their killed and wounded at 3000. As a matter of course, the victors are represented as having suffered even more severely. Upwards of 1200 Confederates are said to have been left dead on the field. From experience we know that neither estimate can be depended upon.

The Standard remarks:—

The last accounts from New York state that all the military intelligence received at the War Department is of a cheering character. The New Yorkers are proverbially sanguine. But it must sadly tax even their self-confidence to believe in victories whose chief features, by the admission of the Young Napoleon himself are enormous losses of guns and materiel, a division surprised and cut to pieces, and whole regiments denounced as yielding to a disgraceful panic in the presence of the enemy.

The following is from the Times of Tuesday:—

Such battles as those of Shiloh and Richmond cannot fail to have a strong effect on the mind of the Northern people. Already indeed, we seem to hear the quiver of apprehension in which the shout for each so-called triumph dies away, and to detect the falter of doubt in the uneasy earnestness of each man's assertions. For the Federal victories, though great, glorious, splendid, and so forth, have to be explained. Indeed, you would hardly know they were victories unless you were told so by some one who was in the secret. It needs to be demonstrated by arguments and diagrams that Secession is being duly crushed by the avalanche and swept away by the avalanche, and engulfed by the moral earthquake, as foretold in the figurative language of its opponents. We now have an elaborate comparison of advantages—how the loss of a battery of artillery is compensated by a successful bayonet charge, and a slaughter which is known to be heavy by a slaughter which is concluded to be enormous. The Confederates did not attain their object—therefore it was a Federal victory. General McClellan's army recovered the half-mile of ground and still holds its old position—therefore it was a Federal victory. The siege of Richmond still goes on—therefore it was a Federal victory. Such is the highly scientific basis of the Northern jubilation. But the Federals must feel it rather a descent to become strategical and topographical. The battles may be very good battles, very fit for a future Jomini to describe. They may exhibit interesting facts for the student respecting exposed wings, or the position of batteries, attack in column, attack in line, and what not. If the Federals come to delight in the art of Horace Vernet and Yvon, they may cover vast expanses of canvass with the masterly manoeuvres and dashing charges at Williamsburg, Shiloh, and Chickahominy. But this is not exactly what we were led to expect. Anything less like crashing and sweeping it has seldom been our lot to hear of. It must begin to dawn upon the minds of most people that if this kind of fighting is to go on the conquest of the Southern States will be a greater achievement than even the acuteness of Mr. Lincoln anticipated. The truth is that every successive month shows more clearly the impossibility of restoring the Union by force of arms.

That a large Union party would exist wherever the Federals appeared is a fancy now cruelly dissipated, and with it vanishes the only justification of the war in the minds of impartial men. But a yet more remarkable fact is the attachment of the slaves to the white race in the South. Both the Northerners and those who echo them in this country were never tired of repeating that the Confederates would not dare to offer any real resistance, inasmuch as they held in bondage four millions of their fellow-creatures, who would obey the natural instincts of humanity by massacring the women and children as soon as the men had left for the war. But at last the crucial experiment has been tried. The Southerners have gone almost to the last man to the war; the victims of that tyranny, which is described as so savage and revolting, that "it unites in itself all crimes," are left almost uncontrolled, and in some places absolutely masters, yet there is no rebellion. A Federal general stationed in a region where the negroes are four-fifths of the population issues a proclamation declaring the slaves of these States free. Yet there is no uprising for liberty. It is a melancholy fact for philanthropists and literary ladies, but there is none.

THE FEDERAL OUTRAGE ON FOREIGN CONSULS.

The following documents need no introduction. We would only direct attention to the barbarous manner in which General Butler's illegal orders were executed:—

NEW ORLEANS, Saturday, May 10—9 o'clock p.m.
To Major-General B. F. Butler, United States' Army, Commanding Department of the Gulf, at New Orleans:—

Sir,—Herewith enclosed I have the honour to transmit to you a statement of facts, which transpired in my Consular office, during the afternoon of this day, duplicates of which statement I am about to transmit to the Minister of my Government accredited at Washington, and also to the Minister of Foreign Affairs at the Hague.

I desire to know whether the acts recited in the said statement were performed with your sanction or by your orders. Your answer, or a faithful copy thereof, shall accompany my messages to my Ministers and Government. I have the honour to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

AM. CONTURIE, Consul of the Netherlands.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

On this day, May 10, 1862, and at the hour of five minutes to two o'clock in the afternoon, I being in my Consular office, No. 109, Canal-street, was called upon by an officer wearing the uniform and the arms of a captain of the United States' army, accompanied by a squad of six or eight men under his command.

The captain informed me that he came to prevent the exit of any person or property from the premises.

I said I was Consul of the Netherlands, that this was the office of my Consulate, and that I protested against any such violation of the same. I then wrote a note to Comte Mejan, Consul of France, in this city, requesting him to come to me for consultation. This note was handed to the officer, whose name I learned to be Captain Shipley, who promised to send it after taking it to head-quarters.

Captain Shipley returned, and stated to me that, by order of Major-General Butler, my note would not be sent to Consul Mejan, and that he (the captain) would proceed forthwith to search the premises. Captain Shipley demanded of me the keys of my vault; these I refused to deliver. He remarked that he would have to force open the doors; and I told him that in regard to that he could do what he pleased. For the second time, I again protested against the violation of the Consular office to Captain Shipley, who then went out. Before he left I distinctly put the question to him, "Sir, am I to understand that my Consular office is taken possession of, and myself am arrested by you; and that, too, by order of Major-General Butler?" He replied, "Yes, sir." During Captain Shipley's absence, another officer remained in the office, and a special sentinel was put on guard in the room where I then kept myself. The name of this second officer is Lieutenant Whitcomb, as he informed me. Captain Shipley returned, and was followed by another officer, whose name I could not ascertain, but from appearances ranking him.

This officer approached me, and in a passionate, insulting tone, contrasting singularly with the gentlemanly deportment of both Captain Shipley and Lieutenant Whitcomb, made the same demand for the keys, as had been made by Captain Shipley; and I made the same refusal, protesting against the act, as I had done before. He then gave orders to search the office, and break open, if need be, the doors of the vault.

I then arose and said,—"I, Amedee Conturie, Consul of the Netherlands, protest against any occupation or search of my office; and this I do in the name of my Government. The name of my Consulate is over the door, and my flag floats over my head. If I cede, it is to force alone."

Search being begun in the office by the officer, I told him that the keys were on my person. He then, in a more than rough tone, ordered two of the soldiers to search my person, using the following, among other expressions:—"Search the fellow!" "Strip him!" "Take off his coat," "stockings," "search even the soles of his shoes." I remarked to the officer that the appellation "fellow" that he gave me was never applied to a gentleman, far less to a foreign Consul in his consular capacity, as I was then; and that I requested him to remember that he had said the word. He replied it was the name he had given me; and he repeated over the word three times.

Both Captain Shipley and Lieutenant Whitcomb then stepped forward; the latter was the first to take two keys out of my coat pocket; the former took the key of my vault from the right pocket of my pantaloons. Of the keys taken by Lieutenant Whitcomb there was one opening my place of business, which has nothing to do with my Consulate, and is situated in a different part of the city. I claimed it, but was told by the commanding officer that he would keep it for the present, but might let me have it tomorrow.

I must here state that when Captain Shipley told me that my letter to the Consul of France would not be sent, I remarked that I had forwarded another message to the Consul, and was expecting him every moment, and that if he (the captain) would delay action until I had seen the Consul of France, something good might come out of my consultation. Captain Shipley replied that he could not delay action, and that the order of General Butler was to "go on with the work he was charged with."

The superior officer then took the keys, opened the vault, and in company with Captain Shipley and Lieutenant Whitcomb, entered the same. What they did then I was unable to see, as I kept myself in the same place and in the same chair where I had been searched. After searching for some time the said officers retired, leaving the vault open; Captain Shipley and Lieutenant Whitcomb remaining with their men. Two other officers that I had not seen before came in and joined them for some time.

After an absence of about three-quarters of an hour the officer in question returned, and in the presence of the other officers closed and locked the vault, taking the keys along with him. I then remarked to him that the key of my store was among those that had been taken away from my person, and I wished to have it. The same officer then asked me whether my store contained any goods or property belonging to the Confederates. To which inquiry I answered in the negative. The same officer made use of the following language at the time:—"You have placed yourself in a bad position, and shall be treated without any consideration." He retired after that; it was then about four p.m.

I then continued to be a prisoner under the charge of Captain Shipley and a guard of armed soldiers placed inside and outside of my office, until about seven o'clock p.m., when Captain Shipley, having communicated with another officer, who came in the Consular office, approached me and said, "You are now at liberty to go wherever you please, sir." I said, "I am at liberty to go wherever I please?" He answered, "Yes, sir." I then remarked, "And it is by verbal communication that I am informed of the fact?" He replied, "The same as you were arrested."

I then rose, and before leaving my office, made the following remark to Captain Shipley:—"You have taken possession of this office; I leave everything to your charge." To this he replied, "I will take care of it." Whereupon I left my office, and a short time after I took down my Consular flag.

AM. CONTURIE,
Consul of the Netherlands.

NEW ORLEANS, May 12, 1862.

Major General B. F. Butler, United States' Army, commanding Department of the Gulf:—

GENERAL,—It having come to the knowledge of the undersigned that the Consulate of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands, in this city, had been forcibly entered by your order by some persons in the uniforms of soldiers in the service of the United States' Government, the person of the Consul subjected to indignity and severe ill-usage, and kept prisoner for several hours, it becomes the duty of the undersigned, in view of treaties now existing between the Governments which we represent and that of the United States, to formally protest against such action, and against any act authorized by you or any authority of the United States that may be in contravention of such treaties. We have the honour to be, General, your most obedient servants, MEJAN, Consul of France.

LORENZO CALLEJO, Consul of Spain.

Consul of Belgium.

Consul of Hanover.

Consul of Brazil.

Consul of Nassau and Brunswick.

Consul of Greece.

Consul of Bremen.

Consul of Sweden and Norway.

Consul of Portugal.

Vice-Consul of Italy.

Consul of England.

Consul of Austria.

Consul of Hamburg.

Consul of Wurttemberg.

Consul of Russia.

Consul of Denmark.

Consul of Switzerland.

Mr. Forstall states:—

On the 13th of April, as agent of Messrs. Hope and Co., and with a view to their better security in such times of excitement, I deemed it my duty to withdraw the said sum of 800,000 dollars, already marked and prepared for shipment, say:—160 kegs, Hope and Co., containing 5000 dollars each; and to place the same under the protection of the Consul of the Netherlands, Am. Conturie, Esq., for which I hold his receipt, as follows:—

NOUVELLE ORLEANS, April 12, 1862.

CONSULAT DES PAYS BAS:—

Regu en dépôt ce jour de Monsieur Edmund J. Forstall, agent en cette ville de Messrs. Hope and Co., d'Amsterdam, (160) cent soixante barils marqués H. and Co., et contenant chacun, 5000 dollars, soit 800,000 dollars (huit cent mille piastres Mexicaines), les dits barils sont logés dans la voûte de mer du consulat, No. 100 Rue du Canal.

AM. CONTURIE, Consul des Pays Bas.

Enregistré au journal consulaire, No. d'ordre 2.

Le Consul Am. Conturie.

I also placed in the hands of the said Consul, on the same day, ten bonds of the New Orleans City for 10,000 dollars, and eight bonds of Mobile, for which he gave me a like receipt.

On the first reliable opportunity offering of communicating with Messrs. Hope and Co., which was on the 1st April last, I wrote as follows:—"The Citizens' Bank and Consolidated Association, unlike our other banks, being based on foreign capital, I have thought it my duty to interfere in behalf of the bondholders you represent, in order to secure as much of the cash assets of the institution in question as needed punctuality to meet running interests in Europe, until communications are again opened. For this special purpose the Citizens' Bank has placed in my hands 800,000 dollars (Mexican dollars), under the following resolutions:—

[Same as before transcribed.]

"This document has been registered as follows:—Enregistré au journal du Consul sous No. d'ordre 2. Nouvelle Orleans, ce 1er Avril, 1862.

(Signed)

Le Consul des Pays Bas, AM. CONTURIE.

"For the protection of French property, in case of need, the French Consul has taken possession of a fire-proof building, formerly occupied by the Canal Bank, with vaults for coin, &c. The French Consul has consented to receive for safe-keeping, under the protection of your Consul, the above amount of 800,000 dollars, of Mexican dollars. I am also depositing there ten New Orleans City bonds, and eight City of Mobile, belonging to you. I am doing the same with the bonds belonging to Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., under the protection of the British Consul. The French Consul having subsequently declined receiving the above specie, Mr. A. Conturie used his own vaults in Canalstreet."

I hold the power of attorney of Messrs. Hope and Co., covering my whole intervention in this matter, also the original of all the documents before transcribed, which I am ready to exhibit if desired. I may be permitted here to remark that, so far back as the middle of February last, I called the attention of both the Citizens' Bank and Consolidated Association to the propriety of securing against all contingencies, so far as they were able, the bondholders represented by Messrs. Hope and Co., and Baring Brothers and Co., who had supplied them with their banking capital.

Under these circumstances I deem it my duty to claim, in behalf of Messrs. Hope and Co., of Amsterdam, the above sum of 800,000 dollars, say 160 kegs, marked H. and Co., containing each 5000 dollars, which I have been informed has been forcibly taken out of the possession of the Consul of Holland, Am. Conturie, Esq., and I trust that in consideration of facts, no doubt unknown to you, you will see the justice of ordering said money to be returned to me, that I may ship the same to Europe in accordance with my contract with the Citizens' Bank, so soon as I may be permitted to do so. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDM. S. FORSTALL.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,

NEW ORLEANS, May 12, 1862.

MESSRS.—I have the protest which you have thought it proper to make in regard to the action of my officers towards the Consul of the Netherlands, which action I approve and sustain. I am grieved that without investigation of the facts, you, Messrs., should have thought it your duty to take action in the matter. The fact will appear to be, and easily to be demonstrated at the proper time, that the flag of the Netherlands was made to cover and conceal property of an incorporated company of Louisiana, secreted under it from the operation of the laws of the United States; that the supposed fact that the Consul had under the flag only the property of Hope and Co., citizens of the Netherlands, is untrue. He had other property, which could not by law be his property, or the property of Hope and Co.; of this I have abundant proof in my own hands. No person can exceed me in the respect I shall pay to the flags of all nations and to the Consulate authority, even while I do not recognize many claims made under them; but I wish it most distinctly understood that, in order to be respected, the Consul, his office, and the use of his flag, must each and all be respected. I have the honour to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER, Major-General Commanding.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JUNE 19, 1862.

The Recent Battles.

FEDERAL reports are becoming intelligible. Not that their style is changed, but Europe has been taught, by experience, how to construe them. It is now understood that an announcement to the effect "the Federals claim a victory" means the Federals have sustained a severe defeat. A paragraph stating "the enemy has evacuated his position and fled in disorder" signifies that a Federal commander has been out-generaled, and that a Confederate army has changed its position deliberately, and without an attempt at molestation. "We have captured a large amount of stores and ammunition" is an equivalent for "the enemy have removed all their stores and ammunition." An assurance that "the news from Virginia is cheering" indicates a Federal disaster. A declaration that "the rebellion is crushed," is an intimation that the Federal Government requires more men to carry on the war. The Federals continue to call black white, and white black, but since they do so invariably, it is unfair any longer to charge them with misrepresentation.

As evidence of the progress made in the art of translating Federal war news, we may observe, that with the exception of the few newspapers determined not to believe any ill tidings of the North, the English press perceived that the Northern report of the Federal triumph before Richmond was a notification of a Confederate victory rather clumsily disguised. Indeed, in this case, the Federal disguise wore an air of childlike ingenuousness. Having written a rather inelegant, but unmistakable account of this disaster, they called it a Federal victory. And if the bitterness of defeat is made honey-sweet by designating it a victory, who would be so captious and hard-hearted as to deny the right of the Federals to the enjoyment of such a consolation in the midst of their reverses?

It requires very little ingenuity or meditation to satisfactorily explain the Battle of Richmond, from exclusively Northern information. A schoolboy, who had gone through "Cæsar's Commentaries," and had a crude knowledge of what constitutes defeat and victory, and of the commonplace tactics of warfare, could perform the task unerringly. The Confederates ascertained that a wing of the Federal army was assailable and insufficiently sustained. At the fitting opportunity they determined to attack the weak point. Accordingly, on the 31st of May, they made a sortie, "with greatly superior numbers," and "taking advantage of a terrible storm, which had flooded the valley of the Chickahominy." The art of bringing superior numbers to bear on the weak points of an enemy, and selecting the best moment for the attack, are manœuvres the Federal Generals do not understand, or cannot practise, and therefore we are not astonished that General McClellan should refer to the tactics of the Confederates in a tone of mild reproof and virtuous indignation. We consider the irritation of the Federal Commander natural and excusable. It must be excessively annoying that, notwithstanding the most elaborate and costly preparations, the Southerners will not carry on the war according to the Northern programme.

The effect of the sortie was to rout a division of the Federal army; to capture a quantity of field artillery, baggage, stores, and ammunition; to convey all this booty to Richmond; to burn the Federal tents, and, as the correspondent of the New York Times informs us, "all the property that could not be conveniently moved;" and to remain in the Federal camp during the night succeeding the battle. In fact, the Confederates were completely successful. General McClellan says General Casey's division "gave way unaccountably and disunitedly." We confess our inability to explain what is meant by "giving way disunitedly;" but we would suggest that the first part of General McClellan's despatch, in which reproachful allusion is made to the "greatly superior numbers," and the "taking advantage of the terrible storm," solves the problem of the rout of General Casey's division.

In making a sortie there was no intention of bringing on a general engagement; although if a chance had presented itself of inflicting further disaster on the enemy it would have been embraced. Such an opportunity did not occur, and the Confederates were satisfied with the victory they had gained, and busied themselves in transporting their spoils to Richmond. General McClellan says he brought up some divisions, "and drove back the enemy at the point of the bayonet, covering the ground with his dead." We think we can elucidate the verbal obscurity of this passage. The Confederates were not driven from the Federal encampment they had occupied, for they remained on it during the night. The probable explanation is, that as soon as General Casey's division had been routed, the Confederates threw out skirmishers to see if there were any more vulnerable points of which advantage might be taken. General McClellan met the Confederate skirmishers with his reserves, and the former fell back on the main body in possession of General Casey's camp. General McClellan made no effort to wrest the victory from the Confederates, but allowed them to remove their booty.

That the Confederates renewed the attack on Sunday is so grossly improbable, that we may unhesitatingly pronounce it a false report. General McClellan by that time had massed his forces on the position occupied by the Confederates, who could only have offered him battle at a disadvantage. The fight on Sunday was a skirmish provoked and continued by the Confederates to cover their return to their entrenchments. So far from being defeated on Sunday, they still held on Monday half a mile of the ground from which they had driven the Federals.

The news, per Hibernian, confirms the view taken by the English press of the Battle of Richmond. The Confederates are now allowed "to claim the victory." The first account of the battle estimated the Federal loss at 3000 men; it is now stated that the loss is 7000 men. Little by little we shall learn the importance and extent of the Confederate triumph.

The whole truth in reference to Federal disasters oozes out slowly. It was positively asserted that General Banks' command, at the time he met with the reverse, which made the Lincoln Government tremble for the safety of Washington, did not exceed 4000 men. We are now informed that General Jackson has 5000 prisoners. In connection with this we may also notice that the undoubtedly large booty captured by the Confederates is estimated at 2,000,000 dollars. If 4000 Federal troops carry with them stores and ammunition to the value of 2,000,000 dollars, a few captures will amply replenish the Confederate supplies.

General Jackson is a thoroughly perverse and aggravating Confederate commander. Lately, the Northern press was lauding the gallantry and military genius of General Fremont, for marching his forces a hundred miles without meeting the enemy, and therefore without disaster. He offered General Jackson battle, and the offer was declined; yet, shortly afterwards, he fell into an ambuscade, and "suffered heavy loss;" that is, he was defeated. Why will the Confederates pertinaciously insist upon fighting the Federals when the latter are unprepared for the encounter? It is now asserted, "General Jackson was expected to make a stand at Fort Republic." Possibly he may again disappoint Federal expectations.

General Halleck has been pre-eminently unfortunate in his surmises of the movements of the wary general to whom he is opposed. For a long time he dilated on the strength of the fortifications of Corinth and of the necessity of a careful approach. When he found Corinth evacuated, he announced the sudden and disorderly flight of General Beauregard's army. Gradually it came out that the Confederate commander had been six days moving his forces, that he had taken with him all his stores and war materiel, and so thoroughly eluded the vigilance of the Federal general that his whereabouts was a mystery. We are now told that General Pope is "pushing the enemy thirty miles south of Corinth, and that he had captured a large number of prisoners." We may be sure that the prisoners captured in General Halleck's despatches will not diminish the effective force of the Confederates.

In this week's budget of Confederate victories is included the repulse of 2000 Federal troops, who are said to have landed on James Island, opposite Charleston. Use is second nature, and the Northerners are becoming so accustomed to reverses that they seem to regard them as daily indispensables, and record them without comment, consoling themselves by calling them victories.

We have the bare intimation of the total destruction of the Confederate fleet, except one vessel, and the subsequent surrender of Memphis. The one vessel inclines us to discredit the total destruction. Memphis may be in the possession of the Federals, and, if so, we are aware that the invaders will not find any plunder to reward their toils. The possibility of the surrender of Memphis has long been entertained by the Confederates, and preparations made to destroy the public property, and to burn the cotton on the approach of the enemy.

The recent battles must dissipate the illusion that the North is nearer the conquest of the South than it was at the commencement of the struggle. Unaided by their gunboats, the Federals have not gained a victory. They have now to meet the enemy in the interior, at a great distance from their base of operations, and every repulse is a serious defeat and disorganizes their plans. No marvel Mr. Lincoln calls for more men; but if the campaign is continued he will find it tax all the energies of the North to fill up the gaps made by the enemy, and to replace the numbers that will fall victims to the climate.

The friends of the South may, perhaps, fear that the stringency of the blockade may cause a serious dearth of war ammunition. The Battle of Richmond, and the defeat of Banks' army, must relieve their anxiety.

Recognition versus Mediation.

THE return of Lord Lyons, following so closely upon that of M. Mercier, is naturally regarded by the public as an event of political significance. It is certainly a remarkable fact that at so critical a moment in American affairs the two greatest Powers of Europe should be unrepresented at Washington. Both these diplomatists, there is abundant reason to believe, were faithful representatives of the views and policy of their respective Governments. Whether there has always been that perfect concord in their official action which the world is expected to take for granted, we are not prepared to say. Open disagreement there has been none. But to us the almost simultaneous return of these gentlemen seems the augury of a more intimate understanding in American policy between France and England, which bodes no good to the pretensions of the Government of the United States. Their personal presence, and the invaluable knowledge of which they alone can be the possessors, are doubtless needed in the councils of the Cabinets of London and Paris: but it is also possible, and in the opinion of well-informed persons, probable, that their advice will confirm such a modification in the diplomatic relations with that Government as may render the employment of other agents expedient.

There are two points upon which public opinion in Europe has now arrived at deliberate conclusions. The first is, that the restoration of the Union, as it was recognized by Europe before this war, and as it is still theoretically recognized, is an absolute impossibility. The second is, that the war will not end by the spontaneous act of either belligerent. The determination of the South never to yield, though long-doubted, has left little room for the most obstinate scepticism. The prolongation by the North of a contest which gives food to hundreds of thousands who otherwise would starve, profitable employment to shipping which otherwise would rot at the wharves, tempting investments to capital which otherwise would lie idle, is now understood to be a necessity to stave off the day of reckoning; and its ability to so prolong it will continue so long as a shadow of hope remains, that by yet further effort the evil day may never come, and the reckoning be paid by others. There is a homely simile applicable to the position of the North, in the story of the man who held a wolf by the ears, and dared not let go, though it required superhuman strength to hold on.

That some action on the part of Europe has thus become a necessity and a duty, is almost unanimously admitted. In what form this action shall come, seems alone to give rise to differences of opinion. Lord Palmerston and Earl Russell have both, in unmistakable language, disclaimed any present intention of mediation on the part of this Government. If we accept the word "mediation" in its most comprehensive signification, Great Britain is committed for a further indefinite period to the same supine inaction which has heretofore characterized her American policy. In this manner, undoubtedly, will the words of her Majesty's Ministers be construed on the other side of the Atlantic, where they will be regarded as another evidence of the awe in which this country is supposed to hold the United States, even when engaged in an intestine war of unprecedented proportions. Such, however, is not, we are informed, the intention of the Cabinet. It is asserted that a marked distinction is drawn between "mediation" and "recognition," the former being considered as a violent, and, therefore, warlike measure; the latter as a peaceful step towards the settlement of the American difficulties. We are convinced that this distinction is not drawn in America by either of the belligerents. The North fears, as the greatest of all evils, the recognition of the Confederate States as an independent nation; the South has never wished for more than this, to which it conceives itself entitled by right. Neither have ever understood by European mediation more or less than this. Yet the British Cabinet is right in making the distinction, for mediation, though it could not mean less than recognition, might mean more.

Mediation is the stepping in of a neutral Power between disputants whose quarrels it undertakes to settle, in the last resort, as final arbiter. In assuming the responsibility of a decision, it becomes a party to the quarrel against whoever conceives himself aggrieved by that decision. Where the mediation is unasked for, this is sure to be the case. The recognition of one nation by another is, on the contrary, the mere acknowledgment of an existing fact, which involves no other responsibility than that the existence of the fact should be sufficiently well attested. Great Britain did not mediate in the affairs of Italy, but she recognized the kingdom of Victor Emmanuel without coming in collision with the latter's opponents. Dynasty has succeeded dynasty in France, and one form of government another. England has recognized them each in turn, without pretending to enforce a judgment on their conflicting pretensions. In those cases recognition implied the absence of any right to mediate. Instances, also, are numerous where she has recognized Governments the lawfulness of whose authority was still disputed at the point of the sword.

It appears, therefore, that though mediation and recognition may often have the same effect in practice, yet they differ radically in principle, and depend for justification upon frequently quite opposite causes. In other words, it is sometimes right to recognize because it is wrong to mediate, and vice versa. A great Government can only mediate in the name of public justice and common humanity; it must often recognize where it regrets and deplores the necessity. It were useless for us to inquire whether England would be justified in mediating between the American belligerents, since neither of them desire her to do so, and since the Government has formally disclaimed any such intention. But it is not improper to consider whether the facts warrant the recognition for which the Cabinet and Parliament are said to be well disposed.

We have already shown that the recognition of a new Government is independent of the causes which bring it into existence, and implies no judgment upon the merits of any quarrel which it may have, either with a neighbour or at home. It suffices that it fulfils certain conditions which the usage of nations and the peace of mankind require. It must be in all respects a de facto Government; that is, one which has the power to enforce obedience to its authority within the limits of its assumed jurisdiction. It must have the moral and material power to give a reasonable assurance of stability. This, therefore, implies a sufficiency of population and of territory for independent national existence, as well as a hold upon the affections of the former, and the ordinary means of defence for the latter. It is further necessary that the recognition of the new Government should not annihilate any co-existing older Government, or so weaken the power of another, or threaten its existence, as to endanger the balance of power or the public peace. In such a case the claims, though perfect, may justly be made to yield to prior and equally perfect claims.

Let these rules be applied to the Southern States of the late American Union. The recognition of their independence still leaves the United States with the territory and population of a first-rate Power. Instead of destroying, it establishes a balance of power which the interests of civilization and the peace of mankind alike imperatively demand. They themselves have a territory and population amply sufficient for all the purposes of national existence, and they have displayed a massive power under extraordinary and exceptional disadvantages, which can leave no doubt as to their ability to maintain themselves in all ordinary contingencies. The loyal devotion of the population to the Government of their own choice has been submitted to a crucial test, and has earned the admiration of the world. In the midst of a war beyond the strength of many older countries, the internal peace has never been disturbed; no opposition, no disobedience, has occurred within; the functions of the magistrate have at no time been suspended; the law has pursued its regular course; the liberties of the citizens have never been impaired. Is there one of the old monarchies of Europe that can give stronger proofs of stability?

We now recognize as a de facto and de jure Government over these Confederate States, a Government the last vestiges of whose authority have been obliterated in them for fifteen months; a Government which has confessed its inability to govern them, except as conquered provinces, by the appointment of military governors wherever its armies gain a precarious footing; a Government which, by its own admission, has no hold upon the affections of the people it claims to rule, and whose agents avenge, by acts of barbarous brutality, the hatred which seeks vent even in the gestures of women and children; a Government which has spent the revenue of a dozen generations, and the blood of 100,000 men, in a fruitless effort to gain possession of its territory, and can give no evidence of the power to hold it when once possessed. This is the Government which we now recognize as the Government of the Confederate States of America, and which some would have us recognize as such, despite the dictates and common sense, common justice, and common humanity.

It is not required of European Governments to enter into learned disquisitions on the Constitution of the United States, though they know that the plainest provisions of that instrument have been trampled under foot before the war could even commence. They need not consult the sages of the law about the right or wrong of Secession, though no Puffendorf, or Grotius, or Vattel, need rise from the grave to tell them that sovereign States cannot commit treason, and 8,000,000 of people obeying the authority of those States cannot be rebels. It is sufficient that they should take facts as they find them, and apply to those facts the usages which have obtained among nations since international law became more than an empty word. Adopting this principle as their guide, there can be no difficulty in deciding which of the two Governments claiming to be de facto and de jure Governments of the Confederate States is the one entitled to recognition.

This decision, fairly made, is the only mediation that can lead to any practical results.

The Defence of Canada.

THE vulnerable position of our American possessions has always been a subject of anxiety to the statesmen who knew the danger with which they were constantly threatened by an arrogant and quarrelsome neighbour. At this time, when our relations with that neighbour are by no means of the most satisfactory character, the subject demands most thoughtful attention. There can be no doubt that the difficulties surrounding it have been one of the chief causes of the indisposition of our Government, and of many leading men of all parties, to deal with the American question in the only manner in which any practical good could have been effected. Events must prove whether the course adopted was the wisest and safest, but a very little consideration suffices to show that it is not without plausible and even weighty reasons. A war with the United States, though not so formidable a calamity as timorous capitalists and bondholders would have us believe, might reasonably be expected to wreak its fury most effectively upon Canada. On the seas Great Britain has no enemy to fear, but on land, against the United States, she has a boundless territory to defend, of which it is scarcely a figure of speech to say, that all that is worth assailing or defending is frontier. The ample retaliation which would surely follow could yet but poorly compensate for the irreparable injuries which an enemy locally more powerful might inflict in that quarter. The danger, of which experience and threats do not fail to warn us, is rendered even more annoying by the mortifying reflection that our own culpable negligence and indecision in the past have given to the enemy the very gateway which affords the shortest, most convenient, and always open access to the heart of the threatened province. There was a bitter taunt in Mr. Seward's permission to the British reinforcements to land at Portland, and march over the soil of the country whose hostility was the cause of their coming.

As if to aggravate the geographical difficulties of the defence of Canada, the Provincial Parliament has just rejected a measure which the Government deemed of imperative necessity—the organization of the Provincial Militia on a more extensive and effective basis, and at provincial expense. Our acquaintance with the motive-springs of the internal politics of the province is too imperfect to enter into the merits of this dispute. Yet, while we believe that the Canadians have adopted a narrow-minded and short-sighted policy, we can account for it without ascribing to it that important bearing upon the future which it has in the eyes of many. Great Britain has for years accustomed her dependencies to the enjoyment of all the privileges of self-government, without any of the burdens which belong to an independent national existence. They have learned to believe that the loyal homage they are proud to render is a sufficient return for the cost of protection, of defence. It will be long before they can be made to understand that every right is attended by some duty, and that in proportion as they exercise the right of governing themselves they assume the duty of providing for themselves. The rejection of the proposed measure by the Provincial Parliament was probably no disregard of the public safety, but resistance to a principle which, once admitted, would entail a permanent and heavy burden upon the province. Pressing financial considerations must also have entered into the discussion. Canada, in the eagerness to develop her material resources, has largely anticipated her future revenues, and the provincial exchequer is not in a condition to supply the demands for new expenditure. We believe that the sincere attachment of the Canadians to the mother country is equalled only by the hatred they entertain to their nearest neighbours, and that, should the emergency actually arise, they would furnish their full quota of volunteers, as good in every respect as those of the United States. Their refusal to maintain a military organization of their own, though certainly proceeding from selfish notions, appears to us an additional evidence that the Canadians are bent upon tightening, rather than loosening, that dependence upon the parent empire from which they have reaped so many substantial advantages.

But while we should look the danger squarely in the face, we ought not to forget that our opportunities of averting it are vastly greater than at any period of past danger. Canada, it is true, presents the same temptation to the invader, but Canada is safe so long as California is insecure. Within the last fourteen years the United States have acquired possessions more valuable to them, and even more vulnerable, than our American possessions. The true defence of British America is on the Pacific coast. Strategically, San Francisco is nearer to us than it is to the Government at Washington. At present, destitute of any available means of defence, it belongs to the first comer, and our Pacific squadron could convert it into a British port long before the war vessels of the United States had accomplished the circumnavigation of the continent. Along 800 miles of the Pacific coast of the United States there are but two harbours, both defenceless, and with these in the hands of an enemy, any attempt to recover them by naval force would be madness. The transportation of troops overland is even more hopeless. Three thousand miles of trackless desert separate the Pacific from the Atlantic States. To traverse this desert, yielding no food to either man or beast, and for a great portion of the distance, no water, is an enterprize which bands of desperate gold-seekers do not attempt without a consciousness of imminent peril. To an army it is simply impossible. The feeble and ineffective demonstration a few years since upon the still insubordinate handful of Mormons in the centre of the desert, affords the illustration, if one were needed. No military communication exists between the two thus naturally dis severed sections of the Republic, except by way of the Panama Railway. What could this avail—even if, what is not conceivable, the United States were left in its undisturbed possession—while our ships swept the Pacific coast, and our flag waved over its only harbours? Besides, the whole continent of South America would be our friend, and every port thereof a hostile one to our enemy. There is not one of those States which has not injuries and insults to avenge, and which would not delight in a safe opportunity to avenge them, and to prevent, according to its means, the possibility of their recurrence. The overbearing North American Republic has sat like a nightmare upon their dreams of prosperous tranquillity, and not one of them but breathes more freely since the colossus is overthrown.

The insecurity of their rich Pacific possessions has long been keenly felt by the United States. Any attempt upon Canada must necessarily be preceded by an energetic effort to make them safe. It is not when the sluices of the Oswego Canal shall be enlarged to permit the passage of war ships into Canadian waters, but when an overland railway shall have been constructed, or at least, San Francisco fortified, that the gauntlet will be thrown. The railway would have been built ere this, but for the instinct of self-preservation of the South, which for the last eight years of its partnership in the Union was unyielding in opposition to this construction, except through its own territory. So long as the South continued a member, the Union relied on the power of cotton to bring Great Britain to any terms. Shorn of this power, California remains the hostage, for a time at least, of the tranquillity of Canada.

There is another danger which the United States must needs confront in a war with Great Britain. The most obvious military consideration would direct a blow, on our part, upon Portland, which, without such time for preparation as we would not be likely to give, they have no power to avert. The possession of this, the most magnificent harbour on the North Atlantic seaboard, removes the chief difficulty of supplying Canada with troops and ammunition. Portland is the natural seaport of Western Canada. Once possessed, it would, in all likelihood, prove a permanent possession, with the consent of its inhabitants. The people of Maine have never been blind to the material interests of a connection which would make their chief city the rival of New York. The subject has frequently been publicly discussed among them, for Secession, until a quite recent period, was always fashionable in the New England States. Politically, they well know, their position as a self-governing province of our Colonial Empire, would scarcely differ from that of a State in the Union, while in every other respect they would be the gainers. It is not probable that an idea which has taken root so firmly will die out suddenly, when it furnishes the only escape from universal ruin, and from the burden of an intolerable debt.

War, at all times and under any circumstances, should be accepted only as a deplorable necessity. Assuredly, the example of forbearance which we have set to the world is a guarantee that we shall only accept it as such. But the threatening attitude of the Northern States of America has induced many wise men to believe that a war, forced upon us by them, is an event which our forbearance may delay but cannot avert, and for which it behoves us to be prepared. If this be so, the sooner it comes the better, for the briefer will be its duration. If it ends, as it surely must, in rectifying a frontier which, as it now stands, is a disgrace to British statesmanship, the United States will have only themselves to blame, their insatiable lust for dominion, and their ruthless, God-forgetting ambition.

The French Defeat in Mexico.

THE repulse of the French troops in Mexico has caused universal surprise. At first blush, it seems almost incredible that the best officered and best disciplined soldiers in Europe should suffer a check from troops whom all the world justly despise, and who would be overmatched by a mob of filibustering rowdies. Besides, in Algiers we have seen the French display a particular aptitude for dealing with semi-barbarous armies; and the Mexicans are not comparable to the Algerine soldiers in bravery and endurance. How, then, can we account for the unexpected event? Was it one of those accidents in warfare that defy the most astute calculations? Or was it due to bad generalship? No. The simple and all-sufficient explanation is, the small number of French troops engaged in the enterprize. Gulliver was harassed by the Lilliputians; and a giant may be overmatched by a host of pigmies.

The French forces did not number quite 7000 men; and 7000 troops on paper are generally equal to 5000 effectives. But in Mexico a European army is still further diminished by the unhealthy climate, and it is probable the French General had not 4000 effectives, and could not bring a force of more than 3000 into the field; for being so many thousand miles from France, and so distant from his base of operations, it was necessary, despite the smallness of the corps, to organize a reserve. Notwithstanding the disproportion of the contending forces, so much confidence is felt in French valour and military genius, that the complete success of the expedition would have been regarded as a natural consequence; yet, considering the mere handful of troops employed to reduce a country of 8,000,000 of inhabitants to order, we cease to marvel at the reverse.

Since the defeat is attributable to the smallness of the force, must we not blame the French Government for sending out such an inadequate body of troops?

It must be remembered that the French troops were destined to act with English and Spanish troops, and if the convention had been carried out the French contingent was ample. Assuredly we could not have a more convincing proof of the thorough good faith of the Emperor. There was evidently not the remotest idea of turning the intervention to French account. The Emperor meant to loyally abide by the terms of the convention, and he intended a joint expedition. We need not here discuss the withdrawal of the English and Spanish troops, but had such a contingency been contemplated, or, still more, had it been intrigued for and devised, we may be sure a force equal to the eventuality of isolated action would have been provided.

Whatever opinions may be held as to the avowed or secret motives of the Emperor, France is now involved, beyond honourable retreat, in a difficult and expensive war. The condition of Mexico is chaotic and demoralized beyond conception, and it is inevitably an arduous task to better such a state of affairs. The remoteness of the field makes the warfare costly. But France will not allow difficulty or cost to stand in the way of her reputation. We have shown that the honour of the French is not affected by the late reverse in Mexico, but prestige to a great nation is scarcely less precious than honour. Negotiation, then, is utterly impossible, until the military ascendancy of France is vindicated. Nor is that all. France having undertaken to reduce Mexico to civilized order, she must persevere until the work is accomplished.

One effect of the intervention in Mexico will be to place France in an attitude of irreconcilable antagonism to the United States. The invasion of the South is a demonstration of the Yankee faith in the Monroe doctrine. The Federal press is constantly boasting of the determination, so soon as the South is conquered, to crush all other governments and to rule supreme over a continent. After the late exhibitions of Yankee lawlessness, unheard-of oppression and semi-savage barbarity, the chivalrous, generous, and enlightened French people will not care for an intimate alliance with the United States; in fact, a cordial alliance between a highly civilized nation and the United States is impossible. The friendship between France and the Northern States was necessarily weakened by the secession of the South, and the intervention in Mexico has rapidly developed bitter and unscrupulous hostility.

This, amongst other things, will bring about an intimate and hearty alliance between France and the Confederate States. Their interests in Mexico are identical. They both desire to see an end to shameful anarchy. They both desire the establishment of a strong Government, which will insure Mexico against the ambitious designs of the United States. Directly France recognizes the independence of the Confederate States, the pacification of Mexico will become facile. The South has an abundance of men, and the enterprize would be exceedingly popular. The Southern people view with extreme dislike the abortive system of government that has prevailed in Mexico for nearly half a century.

The comprehensive and profoundly sagacious mind that presides over the greatest military monarchy cannot fail to perceive the situation and its requirements. An English statesman was formerly justified in saying that the balance of the Old World was restored by the development of the New World; but the time has now arrived when, unless the resources of Europe are to be crippled, the material prosperity of mankind blighted, and the progress of civilization checked, there must be a division and balance of power in the New World. The foundation of the Southern Confederacy is a barrier to that insane ambition of the United States, which is inimical to the world's peace. The North will, no doubt, seek a quarrel with European nations, but it will soon be taught that it has not the power to domineer over the whole earth. The independence of Mexico is also an important element, and this will be established by the success of the French arms, the triumph of law and order, and the engrafting of European civilization. Mexico, one of the richest countries in the world, but which has for years been unproductive, will be restored to fruitfulness, and stimulate and increase commerce.

Not the least of the Emperor Napoleon's claims to the grateful respect of posterity will be, that he had a presence of the great uprising in America to inaugurate a balance of power, and did not lack the courage, and was too loyal to the cause of civilization, to hesitate in assisting and guiding the mighty movement. From its consequences, the Mexican intervention will form a glorious page in the annals of France.

THANKS to the kind attention of a friend, we are able to gratify the curiosity of our readers with a republication in extenso of Mr. B. Wood's remarkable speech, or rather pamphlet. No Northern newspaper had the hardihood to publish it, or even to comment upon it. The manner in which Mr. Wood obtained the legal sanction to its publication in any form will somewhat surprise those not acquainted with a rather curious practice of the American Congress. Each of the Houses elects a printer, by whom the debates, public documents, and even scientific books, are published at Government expense, at their direction. As a rule, the permission of either House is always granted to a member to have a speech or report printed in this manner for distribution among his constituents, in which he is further facilitated by the possession of the franking privilege. Mr. Wood, well knowing that he would not be listened to, and before the tenor of his remarks was known, obtained this permission, and thus eluded not only the rigid censorship of the press, but the Argus-eyed surveillance of the post-office.

Another evidence that an intelligent and sober-minded minority in the Northern States is restrained from the expression of its sentiments only by the terrorism of the majority, has recently come to our notice. From an unknown hand we receive several copies of a pamphlet, containing a series of very able articles in condemnation of the war. It bears New York on the title page, but the name of the printer, if it ever was there, appears to have been cut out. Though its ostensible date is 1861, there is every reason to believe that this anonymous publication of which we may have more to say hereafter, is of quite recent date.

LET us give the devil his due. Sir J. Walsh, in addressing the House of Commons respecting the execrable edict of General Butler, observed, that it was a barbarity "not exceeded by Nadir Shah, Nana Sahib, or the worst and most cruel tyrants of the East." It might be inferred from this passage that Eastern barbarity offers some parallel to the atrocity of the Federal Nana Sahib; but we beg to state that the remorseless, blood-stained traitor, the East India Nana, has never been guilty of an act so hideous as that of General Butler's in reference to the ladies of New Orleans. The barbarities of these ill-formed worthies were never exercised over a city under their protection. The infamy of General Butler is without precedent, and can never be exceeded.

GENERAL BUTLER finds the only way to stop the expression of Confederate loyalty in New Orleans is to enforce silence. He has suppressed the Bee and Crescent newspapers, and taken possession of the Delta for the use of the Federal Government. This is a charming specimen of republican liberty of speech and opinion.

OUR Magazine article, "Three Months in the Confederate Army," is again excluded by the number of lengthy documents which, as part of the current history of the war, we desire to place on record in our columns.

Reviews.

A HISTORICAL PARALLEL.*

No. v.

If after the withdrawal of the Spanish troops the Netherlands had been united, national independence might have been established; but no one, save the Prince of Orange, seemed aware of the importance of union. The views of William must have appeared somewhat incongruous to his contemporaries, and cannot even at the present time be properly appreciated without a careful study of the situation. Doubtless the Prince could, if he had chosen, have made himself the sovereign of the Netherlands; and his noble disinterestedness did not arise from any other motive than the consciousness that such an arrangement would not promote an immediate pacification, or establish the liberties of his country upon a permanent basis. William knew that a lasting independent Confederation of the seventeen provinces was impossible. He was too profound a statesman to believe in the possibility of a fusion of races. He aimed, therefore, at the preservation of the provincial sovereignties, and at forming a league of amity as a defence against foreign domination. He advocated and promoted the election of the Duke of Anjou, not only that the power of France might be opposed to the power of Spain, but because the rule of a foreigner, limited by the constitution of the country, would be less likely to excite that jealousy amongst the nobles, which was already manifested at his own wonderful and dominant influence. The immediate result of this policy was to bring about a tripartite division of the country.

The Northern Provinces would accept no ruler but Orange; the United Provinces acknowledged the sovereignty of the Duke of Anjou, and the reconciled Provinces remained under the dominion of Spain.

Without dwelling on the ineffectual attempts of Don John to restore the supremacy of Spain, the nominal governorship of Matthias, the advent of the Duke of Parma, the acceptance of the government of Flanders by William, the famous siege of Maestricht, the cruel massacre of its inhabitants, and the unfaithfulness of many leaders who had done good service in the cause of freedom, we pass on to the declaration of independence of the United Provinces, made in the year 1581. Not that these events are comparatively unimportant or uninteresting, only our object is not to survey the history of the Netherlands, but to point out those incidents which have a parallel connection with the Confederate States' war of independence.

The act of abjuration recited the wrongs of the Netherlands, and justified the declaration of independence on the indefeasible ground that the King of Spain had broken his compact. Was this a revolt? Can a nation legally throw off its allegiance to a sovereign?

Such then being the spirit which prompted the provinces upon this great occasion, it may be asked who were the men who signed a document of such importance? In whose name and by what authority did they act against the sovereign? The signers of the declaration of independence acted in the name and by the authority of the Netherland people. The Estates were the constitutional representatives of that people. The statesman of that day, discovering, upon cold analysis of facts, that Philip's sovereignty was legally forfeited, formally proclaimed that forfeiture. Then inquiring what had become of the sovereignty, they found it not in the mass of the people, but in the representative body, which actually personated the people. The Estates of the different provinces—consisting of the knights, nobles, and burgesses of each—sent, accordingly, their deputies to the general assembly at the Hague, and by this congress the degree of abjuration was issued. It did not occur to anyone to summon the people in their primary assemblies, nor would the people of that day have comprehended the object of such a summons. They were accustomed to the action of the Estates, and those bodies represented as large a number of political capacities as could be expected of assemblies chosen then upon general principles. The hour had not arrived for more profound analysis of the social compact. Philip was accordingly deposed justly, legally, formally—justly, because it had become necessary to abjure a monarch who was determined not only to oppress but to exterminate his people; legally, because he had habitually violated the constitutions which he had sworn to support; formally, because the act was done in the name of the people, by the body historically representing the people.

We direct especial attention to the words we have italicised. We must remember they are the deliberate expression of the opinion of Mr. Motley, who, with glaring inconsistency, has hitherto denied the right of Secession to the Confederate States of America. He tells us, and we do not dispute his judgment, that although Philip had hereditary sovereign rights in the Netherlands, yet the abjuration of his rights was just, legal, and formal. But the United States had no sovereign rights in and over the States. Mr. Motley does not, and cannot, deny the sovereignty of every State in the late Union; but he contends that the sovereign States had no right to withdraw from the federation. What! is the power of a federation more absolute and binding than that of an hereditary ruler? Does Mr. Motley, who so eloquently and so forcibly shows that kings have not a Divine right to oppress their subjects, and that when a monarch forgets his duty, his people are justified in forgetting their allegiance, mean to tell us that the old theory of Divine Right is applicable to a Federal compact, and that the alliance of Sovereign States ought to be perpetual, even though it involves the oppression and serfdom of some of the States? Or, if not, what becomes of his argument against Secession in America? The Southern States were oppressed. Were they not justified in abjuring the Power—the creature they had made—that oppressed them? Mr. Motley may reply, that the North had no designs against the South? Who is to decide the issue? Philip declared that he was a clement sovereign, and did not oppress the Netherlanders. Great Britain stoutly maintained that the attempt to tax her American colonies was not oppressive. Austria denies that her rule in Italy was oppressive. The oppressor never acknowledges, and, indeed, is rarely conscious of his oppression. Tyrants are always impressed with the wickedness of opposition to their tyranny. The question of justification is settled by brute force, for the simple reason that, be it ever so apparent, it is disputed by the oppressor. Sovereign States, representing a population of seven or eight millions of people, decided that the United States had violated the Federal compact, and was endeavouring to reduce them to complete subjection. They therefore withdrew from the Union.

But, irrespective of the justification of Secession, there can be no cavilling, according to Mr. Motley's historical theory, as to its legality. If the Netherlanders had a right to abjure the sovereignty of their hereditary ruler, much more have sovereign States a right to abjure a federation. Mr. Motley further defends the Netherlanders' abjuration because "the act was done in the name of the people, by the body historically representing the people." Was not Secession done in the name of the people, and by bodies absolutely representing the people? Perhaps when Mr. Motley denied the right of Secession he was labouring under the delusion that it was the act of conspirators, and not the act of the people. That plea would not be altogether sufficient, because the act was done by bodies "historically representing the people," and, if admitted, would justify any violation of national rights; but still, to a very slight extent, it may palliate his error. But what will be now say when the unanimity of the South is so clearly manifested? What now, when the people of the Confederate States—men and women—have shown, that rather than be reunited to the Northern States they will submit to cruel privations and sufferings, to the destruction of their property, the desolation of their cities, the devastation of their country, and to decimation by warfare? He must confess he was wrong in denying the right of Secession, or he must abjure his defence of the Netherlanders' act of independence. But, whatever course he may pursue, we thank him for so eloquently and unanswerably maintaining the right of Secession, as he has done in his history of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic."

It is likely enough that Philip was amused as well as incensed at the act of abjuration of the Estates. He did not despair of the re-establishment of his authority in the Netherlands, for, under any circumstances, it seemed impossible they would be able to maintain their independence. Not only were there, different races in the Netherlands, forbidding a very close and lasting connection, but the nobles and the people were antagonistic. Indeed, the prospects of the Netherlands were extremely gloomy. Philip still had a footing in the country. The Northern Provinces would obey no ruler but William. The Duke of Anjou embraced the first opportunity of showing his despotic character, and that he did not respect the oaths he had taken to preserve the Constitution of the States inviolate. France, on account of her Catholicism, and desire not to come into collision with Spain, was an uncertain ally. Germany was a recruiting ground for any Power having the means to pay troops. The friendship of England was problematical; Elizabeth played with Anjou, was lavishly courteous to Philip, and at the same time polite to the Estates. The Netherlanders were wonderfully niggardly in their contributions for the defence of their freedom, so much so that William considered foreign assistance indispensable. The arms of the Duke of Parma were powerful and successful. The intrigues of Spain were sufficient to corrupt patriot leaders. At every step new difficulties arose, and at every difficulty William was applied to. The Prince was the hope of the Netherlands; friend and foe acknowledged his power. Whilst he lived the people did not despair of their liberty. If Philip could corrupt or kill him, he felt that the Netherlands would once more be within his grasp.

* The Rise of the Dutch Republic. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. History of the United Netherlands. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. London: John Murray.

It was found impossible to bribe or cajole William. He was too honest and too farsighted. Calumniation was vainly essayed, the reputation of Father William was unassailable. He was too brave and devoted to be frightened from his post by the savage edict of Philip, offering a large reward for his assassination. Philip therefore determined to assassinate the man he could not corrupt, calumniate, circumvent, or terrify.

On Sunday, the 18th March, 1582, the Prince was shot as he was leaving his dining-room. He was severely wounded, and prepared for death with the calmness of a brave man and the resignation of a Christian. Parma, being informed by Anastro, who had devised the assassination, that William was dead, called upon the authorities of Antwerp, Brussels, Bruges, and other cities, to make their peace with their lawful sovereign. But, to the joy of the people, their beloved Prince recovered, and his power was, if possible, increased by the danger he had escaped.

Philip, however, was too persevering in the pursuit of blood to be deterred by a single failure, or, indeed, by a succession of failures. On Tuesday, the 10th July, 1584, the fell purpose of the tyrant was fulfilled. On that day—

At about half-past twelve, the Prince, with his wife on his arm, and followed by the ladies and gentlemen of his family, was going to the dining-room. William the Silent was dressed upon that day, according to his usual costume, in very plain fashion. He wore a wide-leaved, loosely-shaped hat of dark felt, with a silken cord round the crown—such as had been worn by the Beggars in the early days of the revolt. A high ruff encircled his neck, from which also depended one of the Beggar's medals, with the motto, "Fidèles au roy jusqu'à la mort," while a loose surcoat of grey frieze cloth, over a tawny leather doublet, with wide, slashed underclothes, completed his costume. Gerard presented himself at the doorway, and demanded a passport. The Princess, struck with the pale and agitated countenance of the man, anxiously questioned her husband concerning the stranger. The Prince carelessly observed that "it was merely a person who came for a passport," ordering, at the same time, a secretary forthwith to prepare one. The Princess, still not relieved, observed in an undertone, "that she had never seen so villainous a countenance." Orange, however, not at all impressed with the appearance of Gerard, conducted himself at table with his usual cheerfulness, conversing much with the burgomaster of Leeward, the only guest present at the family dinner, concerning the political and religious aspects of Friesland. At two o'clock the company rose from table. The Prince led the way, intending to pass to his private apartments above. The dining-room, which was on the ground-floor, opened into a little square vestibule, which communicated, through an arched passage-way, with the main entrance into the court-yard. This vestibule was also directly at the foot of the wooden staircase leading to the next floor, and was scarcely six feet in width. Upon its left side, as one approached the stairway, was an obscure arch, sunk deep in the wall, and completely in the shadow of the door. Behind this arch a portal opened to the narrow lane at the side of the house. The stairs themselves were completely lighted by a large window half-way up the flight. The Prince came from the dining-room, and began leisurely to ascend. He had only reached the second stair, when a man emerged from the sunken arch, and standing within a foot or two of him, discharged a pistol full at his heart. Three balls entered his body, one of which, passing quite through him, struck with violence against the wall beyond. The Prince exclaimed in French, as he felt the wound, "O my God, have mercy on my soul! O my God, have mercy upon this poor people!"

These were the last words he ever spoke, save that when his sister, Catherine of Schwartzburg, immediately afterwards asked him if he commended his soul to Jesus Christ, he faintly answered, "Yes." His master of the horse, Jacob van Maldere, had caught him in his arms, as the fatal shot was fired. The Prince was then placed on the stairs for an instant, when he immediately began to swoon. He was afterwards laid upon a couch in the dining-room, where in a few minutes he breathed his last in the arms of his wife and sister.

So died one of the most spotless characters in history. His death seemed a mortal blow to the cause of freedom of conscience and civil liberty. It was natural for the Netherlands to bemoan the loss of their Father William as the forerunner of the loss of independence. It was natural for the execrable Spanish tyrant to flatter himself that the death of the Prince would enable him to trample on the Netherlands. More than a Prince in Israel had fallen. "As long as he lived he was the guiding star of a brave nation, and when he died the little children cried in the streets." Even to-day it is impossible to read the life of Father William without emotion, and to consider his death without a feeling of personal sorrow. But now we can perceive that Philip had no cause for rejoicing that to his countless victims he had added the Prince of Orange. Now we know that the despair of the Netherlands was uncalled for. We know that the assassin did not take the life of William until his work was done, and his death was, perhaps, as necessary for his country as had been his life.

His work was done—for he had taught his country how to struggle for freedom. Mr. Motley thinks if he had lived another thirty years, "the seven provinces would have been seventeen." We think not; but we are sure that if all the provinces had been united under William it would have been on account of his personal influence, and when he died the union would have been dissolved. The attempt has since been made under most promising auspices, and it has failed.

The death of William was good for his country, since it taught the people not to lean on one man, but to confide in the sacredness of their cause and the favour of Heaven. Being dead, he yet spoke to his countrymen, and inspired them with resolution. The bloody deed of Philip raised up a spirit of resistance to tyranny that could not be killed by dagger, poison, or pistol.

The death of William ought to teach a lesson to all posterity. What lesson? That when seemingly the fortress, the tower of strength of national liberty, is struck down, national liberty survives. When a nation determines to be nationally independent, subjugation is impossible. It may be conquered for a time, but not permanently subdued. Still, we repeat, it was natural for Philip to regard the death of William as the opportunity for his enslaving the Netherlands. But Philip would never have been so foolish as those persons are who think, or professed to think, that because the United States can get possession of some of the Confederate cities, that therefore it can subjugate seven millions of a superior and liberty-loving race.

(To be continued.)

Precis of the Wars in Canada, from 1755 to the Treaty of Ghent, in 1814. With Military and Political Reflections. By the late MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JAMES CARMICHAEL SMYTH, Bart., C.B., &c. Edited by his Son, Sir JAMES CARMICHAEL, Bart. London: Tinsley Bros.

THE chief uncertainty about the American war is with regard to its duration. No one doubts that the South will contend for its independence until it is manifested to, and acknowledged by, the nations of the earth. How long the North may hope against hope that a proud and high-spirited nation can be enslaved, and its country become the heritage of the spoiler, is a problem the most astute statesmen do not attempt to solve. Confederate successes, foreign intervention, a financial collapse, or a domestic revolution, may suddenly put an end to the strife; but it is possible that peace may be heralded by a decade of warfare. All we know is, that sooner or later the end will come, and that the Federal Government must then find fresh employment for its troops, and that the ratification of peace with the Confederacy will be closely followed by a declaration of war against another Power. Nor is there much doubt as to the nation which will receive the challenge. If possible, the United States would like to enter into a contest with England and France at the same time; but, under any circumstances, the mother country will be assailed. Those who read the Northern newspapers have some insight into the rancorous hate with which this country is regarded by the Yankees. Those who are acquainted with the tone of Northern society are still more vividly impressed with the spirit of bitter animosity that has been so strangely evoked. Our forbearance has intensified the evil passion, and been mistaken for pusillanimity. In Northern America there is an opinion very generally entertained that our fighting days are over. We can quell an insurrection in India, and manage the Chinese, if we are not surprised as at the Peiho forts, but we are no match for Yankee prowess. Moreover, England is vulnerable. The Northerners can strike a blow at our pockets. It is opposed to the comity of civilized nations to confiscate the private debts of subjects of the enemy due before the declaration of war, unless for reparation of some pecuniary claim, or damage for which no redress can be obtained; but the law of the United States sanctions the confiscation of the private debts due to the subjects of an enemy under any circumstances. When, during the Trent affair, the New York Herald suggested and threatened the forfeiture of English capital invested in America, it did no more than make an avowal in accordance with the United States' version of the law of nations. Of course, England would make reprisals, and never consent to peace until there had been ample restitution; but in the meantime great loss and inconvenience would be experienced.

The first grand object, however, would be Canada. Being a large and thinly-populated country, Canada is difficult to conquer; still more difficult to hold; but very assailable. We grant that it is extremely improbable that Canada, even if she felt desirous of severing her connection with England, would affiliate with the United States; but we have seen that the North does not hesitate to engage in a hopeless and unprofitable contest to gratify her cupidity, and we may conclude that, to gratify her revenge, she would not hesitate to embark in an equally hopeless adventure. And we must observe, that the Yankees do not think the acquisition of Canada impossible, but regard it as a feasible project. However unpleasant the contingency, we cannot blind ourselves to the fact, that some day we shall have to defend Canada against the United States.

Three Canadian wars are treated in the work before us. The first is that which a century ago eventuated in our obtaining possession of Canada; and this is to be regarded as a contest between two European Powers. The second was incidental to the War of Independence. The last is the war of 1812, which was waged by the United States with the idea of conquering Canada, and the scheme did not appear desperate. England had been engaged in a long and exhausting European warfare, and which was, indeed, not ended. The United States at that period had not been demoralized by the ascendancy of the mob, and the prospect of Union with the republic, if not tempting, was in no way repulsive to the Canadians. Our army in Canada did not number more than 4500 men, and before the era of steam navigation America was strategically far more distant from England than it is at present. The venture of the United States was hazardous, but, we repeat, it was not desperate.

The American plan of campaign was admirably conceived, and if it had been vigorously and promptly carried out must have resulted in the discomfiture of the British. It was proposed to make three nearly simultaneous attacks. One movement was to be directed against Amherstberg, a second in the Niagara district, and a third against Montreal. In the first campaign the Americans were held in check. The fort of Detroit was taken and retained by the British. The second corps was defeated at Queen's Town, below the Niagara falls; and our author considers that the victory was due to the faulty tactics of the Americans. The third corps did no more than advance to the Canadian frontier and retire.

In 1813, the Americans again divided their forces into three parts. One corps was to operate against Detroit and Amherstberg, another against Kingston and York, on Lake Ontario, and the third against Montreal. The British gained a fruitless victory at Detroit. No supplies could be obtained by water, and nothing remained but retreat. A stand was made at Chatham, and the British were routed. It was a mistake to attempt to keep such an extensive frontier with so small a force. It always weakens an invader to have to advance into a hostile country to meet the enemy. If an invader is defeated on the frontier, he can fall back on the base of his operations; but a defeat in the interior of the enemy's country not only disorganizes, but destroys his army.

The British did not essay to defend the Niagara frontier against the second corps, but occupied Burlington Heights, on Lake Ontario. A successful night attack was made on the Americans, and the latter were blockaded in the ports that they had taken from their enemy. At the close of the campaign, the British ports were evacuated. The third corps, as in the previous year, effected nothing; its advance being checked by some Canadian troops.

Assuredly a nation should not boast of the victory until the war is over. In 1814, the British force was largely augmented, and when the European war was ended, it seemed likely enough that Canada would be secure against the diminished efforts of the Americans. But the campaign was singularly disastrous to the British. Fort Erie was surrendered. A body of 11,000 veteran troops, under the command of Sir George Prevost, made a demonstration against Plattsburg, and finding the place was too strongly fortified to be successfully assailed, withdrew into Canada. A naval attack resulted in the repulse of the British squadron. Peace was then made, and the British laurels were not retrieved. The moral effect of the campaign of 1814 was to impress the American mind with the possibility of conquering Canada at a fitting opportunity. Still, the dearly bought experience of 1814—for we hold that the sacrifice of prestige is a fearful price to pay for any experience—will prove invaluable to us, if, in the event of another invasion, it teaches us to adopt a cautious and harassing defence. Nothing is so destructive and ruinous to an invading army as strictly defensive tactics.

The partisans of the North have not failed to work upon our sensibility in reference to Canada, by telling us that if we want to secure our own territory we had better let the Yankees subdue the South. In which way, we should like to know, will the conquest of the Confederate States guarantee us against Northern aggression? "Much will have more" is an unexceptional rule as applied to nations. Never since the world began did one conquest fail to excite the conquerors to enter into other contests for extended dominion. It is quite true the South would require a large army to garrison her cities, but then a large revenue would be extorted from the conquered States. In fact, the conquest of the South would supply the North with the sinews of war. Without, however, discussing the possibility of the extermination of seven or eight millions of people, we may observe that the independence of the South must strengthen the position of England. Instead of being richer, as she would be by the conquest of the South, or so rich as she was when in union with the South, the North will be much, very much, poorer. She will have an empty exchequer, and no means of replenishing it. She will always be under the grave apprehension that the South may join her foes. And truly, if we should now recognize the Confederate States, and enter into an offensive and defensive alliance, the integrity of Canada would be assured. Instead, then, of being benefited by the conquest of the South as to our hold on Canada, we have in that quarter an immense interest in the independence of the South.

We have unbounded faith in the loyalty of the Canadians. Greater freedom they cannot enjoy under any form of government. We remarked above that it was improbable they would, under any circumstances, affiliate with the United States. We may add, it is impossible. The Canadians abhor the Yankees almost as much as do the Southerners. The loyalty of the people, and the hatred of the Yankees, will preserve the country from conquest, though it may not from invasion and devastation. We may also remember that Canadian troops are as good as Yankee troops, and that in 1813 the former were victorious.

Nor is the United States invulnerable. At the first outbreak of war the British could retaliate on the Yankees for the invasion of Canada by invading California, which is quite defenceless, and is, strategically, as near to us as New York.

Moreover, when hostilities broke out between this country and the United States, we presume it would be considered an opportune moment to recover the State of Maine, a State carved out of British territory, cutting off our communication with Canada, and which was unjustly demanded and foolishly conceded. Mr. Spence, in his admirable work, "The American Union," observes:—

There was another boundary question—that of Maine. Let any one take the present map of the United States, and consider, as a matter of reason, whether, when peace terminated the revolutionary war, a boundary line would be so drawn as to sever our colonies in two, and this at a point where nothing existed of interest or value to the United States. That peace was negotiated by Franklin. When the treaty on this subject was made by Lord Ashburton, the Government of the United States was in possession of the map sent by Franklin to the French ministry, and deposited in their archives—a map authenticated by a note in his own hand-writing. On that map appeared a strong red ink line drawn by Franklin's own hand, and referred to in his note. The Government was also possessed of a map found in Jefferson's collection, on which again a similar red ink line delineated the true boundary. Franklin's map was discovered by Mr. Jared Sparks, who, when forwarding it to the United States' Government, wrote thus:—"The line is bold and distinct in every part, made with red ink. There is no other colouring on any part of the map. Imagine my surprise on discovering that this line was wholly south of the St. John's. It is exactly the line contended for by Great Britain, except that it concedes more than is claimed." All this evidence was produced before the Senate—Jefferson's map as well as Franklin's—the two as Mr. Rives observed, "coinciding minutely and exactly." Here was absolute proof of the truth. Yet it does not appear that one was found in that Senate to rise and say, "Let us do what is right; we see in Franklin's own hand-writing—as though he had risen from the grave to instruct us—what was the true boundary agreed to by him; let us obtain no advantage by concealment of these maps, but seek what is just to others and honourable to ourselves." In the place of such sentiments, it appears to have been considered a clever thing to cajole a British negotiator; and to sever Canada from New Brunswick.

We need not, then, be seriously alarmed for the safety of Canada. The Confederate States can afford us abundant aid. We can make ready reprisals on California; and by taking Maine consolidate our empire, and largely develop the resources of Canada.

Colton's Maps. Published for the proprietors by William Freeman, London.

We have before us two of these useful maps. One is a map of the States, distinguishing by colours the Northern States, the Confederate States, and the Border States. The counties, principal towns, railways, stations, forts and military points are marked. The other map gives the plans of twenty of the principal harbours. Colton's maps will greatly assist the general reader in understanding the progress of the war.

It is with deep regret that we announce the death of Captain T. B. Huger, Confederate States' Navy. Captain Huger was the commander of the steamer McRae, and no man more bold, fearless, and dashing, ever trod the deck of a ship. In the battle at the forts, where he received the wounds which caused his death, he fought his ship in such a gallant manner as to extort praises even from his enemies. The last gun fired from our fleet was from the McRae, and her battered condition showed what a noble part she had taken in the action. Captain Huger was a South Carolinian—was formerly an officer in the United States' Navy, but resigned when his native State seceded from the old Union, and commanded, with great credit to himself, a battery at the taking of Fort Sumter. He has been on this station for several months, where he won golden opinions from all who were brought in contact with him; he was an ardent, self-sacrificing patriot, a most accomplished officer, and a high-toned, honourable, and polished gentleman. There are thousands here and elsewhere who will drop tears of sincere, heartfelt grief, over the grave of the noble Huger.

SPEECH OF THE HON. BENJ. WOOD, OF NEW YORK, ON THE STATE OF THE UNION.

Mr. Wood informed Congress that he had some remarks to make upon the state of the Union, but he did not wish to speak them, and desired permission to have them printed amongst the proceedings of Congress. The request of the hon. member was granted, and the following address was printed:—

Mr. Wood.—Mr. Chairman, I have hitherto avoided troubling this House. Content to be a listener, without any other participation in its proceedings than to oppose my solemn individual negative against measures which my conscience and my principles would not approve, I have said nothing. Indeed, sir, I have not had the heart to rise here and speak. A glance at this hall, of itself, has been enough to prevent. When I look around and see one-third of the Union, unrepresented here, and find myself in a body, though purporting to be one branch of the Congress of the United States, really, in fact, but a fragmentary part of it, my heart sinks within me. It appears to be a sectional body—a gathering of the representatives of a sectional party. With these feelings, and with this spirit, I have until now avoided participating in debate.

Besides, sir, during the earlier period of this session, disaster had accompanied the efforts of the Federal arm. I felt that the hour of defeat was not a fit one in which to strive to awaken the great soul of the North to thoughts of peace; I felt that something was due to the sense of mortification, something to the natural desire to retrieve the shame of discomfiture. I hoped, too, that when victory should perch upon our banners, others than myself would seize the occasion to urge a plea in behalf of peaceable measures; and that this Government itself, feeling secure and strong enough to be magnanimous, would take the lead and be the pioneer in opening a path for the settlement of our difficulties without further recourse to bloodshed. I even hoped that the leaders of the now dominant party, moved by the sore distress which has visited our country, would relent from the stern rigour of their doctrines of subjugation, and, in the flush of triumph, would lean a little towards a gentler policy than that which they have hitherto championed with so much zeal and with so little forbearance.

I hoped in vain. The triumph came; a long train of successes has relieved the North from its humiliation. The Government claims now to stand as a rock, against which the tempest of opposition must waste itself in futile efforts. The partisans of the ultra war party laugh to scorn the idea that any effectual resistance can be offered to the onward march of our triumphant armies, and yet no single effort has been made in these Congressional Halls to stay the effusion of blood. It has been left for me, powerless as I am, to speak the first conciliatory word in behalf of my suffering countrymen. And I do it, sir, in the hope that others, more capable, will not be too much engrossed with the lust of conquest, and the pride of victory, to follow my example.

Sir, it is an ineffaceable reproach to those either deluded or wicked men, who, in the North, by their unwaried agitation of abolition schemes, have stirred the embers of this strife; it is an eternal reproach to them that, through defeat and victory, throughout every phase of this unhappy struggle, with the groans of their distressed and tortured country smiting upon their ears, they have clung, and still cling, with unquitting pertinacity and even with ferocity, to the doctrine which has been the germ of all the mischief. With the first exulting shouts of Federal victories, they set up the echoing cry of emancipation. With all the energy of fanaticism, with all the subtle arts and intrigues of scheming demagogues, with all the appliances of cunning, intellect, and patronage at their command, even at this eventful crisis, when every American brain should be at work to bring about a fair and honourable peace, they have no thought, no hope, no duty, but to propagate their creed, extending its influence into every nook and cranny of the land, and poisoning the atmosphere of these sacred halls with its interminable discussion. Openly and in secret, by the agency of the press, the pulpit, and the political rostrum, in the camp, in the city, and in the open field, they are spreading the contagion, they are inoculating the country with its moral pestilence, which has already brought us where we are, at the very brink of the grave of our nationality.

Sir, to these apostles of abolitionism will be traced hereafter whatever of evil has befallen or may befall our country. They are building its sepulchre with the bones of their slaughtered countrymen. I do believe there are gentlemen within my vision now whose sworn purpose, whose first desire—paramount even to the preservation of republicanism—is emancipation. They and their disciples first threw the apple of discord. They first applied the torch, and are now more busy than ever with throwing fresh fuel to the flame. Should history ever trace—which God forbid—the record of this country's ruin, that page will seem the strangest to those that read, which shall tell of the madness and wickedness of the arch-fanatics of abolitionism. In the dark recesses of the temple of infamy, the gloomiest niches will bear the inscription of their names.

Sir, I counsel none but a moral interference with the work of these mischief-makers. I would not have even fanaticism deprived of the right of free speech; nor would I, in any emergency, advocate the slightest infringement by the Government upon the liberty of the press. Let them sow the seeds of their infamous doctrine broadcast over the land. Whatever may be the danger, I will not countenance the greater danger of establishing a dictatorship over the thoughts of my fellow-countrymen.

But if the abominable theme must be brought into the council chambers of the nation, for the sake of decency, if not of justice, let it be at a more reasonable time. If there remains one Union man at the South, let us remember that he is unrepresented here; that the subject of slavery particularly concerns him; and that it is ungenerous and unjust, if not cowardly, to take advantage of his absence of representation to push forward measures in regard to the local institutions of his section; measures against which, were he present, he would give his earnest opposition. It will quench whatever remains of Union feeling in the South, if it has not already done so. It will destroy the last hope of a reconstruction of the Union on a friendly basis. It will prove what has been so often intimated, that the first idea of the dominant party in the North is active and unwavering antagonism to slavery, and a fixed purpose to legislate it out of the land at all hazards. Is it with that theory advanced that we are to conquer a peace? Sir, we are flinging away the last chances of reconciliation as recklessly as madmen cast their treasures into the sea. The agitation of the subject has been the country's bane at every period of its history; its discussion at this crisis is desperate self-destruction.

Is it while the magazine is beneath us and about us, bursting with the agencies of ruin, that we must choose to sport with the flaming torch of the incendiary? Sir, until our beloved country shall be saved, the word "emancipation" should, by common consent, be banished from the language of debate in this assemblage. It is a spell which has wrought enough already of desolation. It is a hellish formula of incantation which has conjured up the fiends of discord and civil war, and it never was so potent in its evil tendency as now, when it is being passed, like the breath of the plague, from mouth to mouth, in the council chambers of the country it has ruined. It should be spoken in a whisper and with a prayer linked to it, as a thing that brings a curse and spreads a pestilence. I despair of my country, I despair of ever living once more in a blessed Union of fraternal States, when I hear all around me the utterance of that ruin-breeding word, "emancipation," mingling with the shouts of battle, the fierce hurrahs of triumph over fallen brothers, and the groans of our dying countrymen.

Sir, if in place of making the negro question a subject-matter of debate, this Congress would take into earnest, solemn consideration some expedient for securing peace, I do believe that success would crown our efforts. If they would enter upon that task, not with hearts embittered and intellects swayed by sectional antipathies and untimely mock philanthropies, but with all their souls devoted to that one sacred purpose—the reconstruction of the Union and our redemption from civil war; if they would do this, in the spirit of conciliation, of forgiveness, of tolerance, of brotherhood, and kindly feeling, it is my conviction that before the close of this eventful session, the preliminaries of a peace would be arranged. But while, with the obstinacy of a blind fanatic, and the instinct of a brutal gladiator, the first object is to promulgate a party creed, and the second to crush an opponent and wear the badge of victory, I see no fairer prospect than, at some distant period, reached through seas of blood and heaps of carnage, the forced submission of a crushed and devastated section, and the equally unhappy spectacle of a Government triumphant, but exhausted by its triumph, detested by a moiety of those sovereignties that gave it birth, and gazing with horror and remorse upon the desolation it has wrought.

Sir, it is not my intention to vent reproaches, even where I believe them best deserved. I have risen to enter my protest against the discussion, in this chamber, of any anti-slavery scheme whatever, at this crisis, and to offer an earnest appeal to this Congress that its legislation shall embrace every means of securing an immediate peace. If, as the Government claims, the Confederate cause is hopeless, the leaders of the Secession movement cannot be ignorant of the fact, and knowing it, they will be naturally inclined to lend a willing ear to whatever proper overtures this Government may present. At some period of this struggle there must be negotiation; it must be resorted to, sooner or later; why not now?

Is it because pride forbids that we should be the first to outstretch the hand of conciliation? Heaven forbid that thousands of human lives and a country's welfare should depend upon so false a principle. Is it because the South has not been sufficiently punished, humbled, and subdued? Then let us confess that chastisement and vengeance are the objects of this war. Is it because the anti-slavery movement has not yet received a sufficient impetus? If so, go tell it to the armies that have won your victories. Make abolition the war-cry. Place a banner with that device in the vanward, and lure those armies on to conquest with it—if you can. Your soldiers would rend the treacherous ensign into shreds, and would march to their homes with the same alacrity that they pushed on with to the battle-field.

What, then, is the cause that withholds negotiation? You will not parley with armed treason. But you have parleyed with armed treason, if that be the word; parleyed for the mere convenience of an exchange of prisoners, and other purposes to mitigate the grievances of war. It was your duty to do so. And shall you not do so to accomplish all that your troops are fighting for—the reconstruction of the Union?

Let us suppose that the South is anxious to embrace an opportunity of return, and is withheld from making advances by doubts as to the intentions of the North. Is it not right that we should confer with them, that those doubts may be removed?

What do the people care for such miserable punctilios in the hour of a nation's agony? Sir, an honourable peace is within the grasp of this Congress without further bloodshed. This Congress knows that it is so; and when the people shall realize that it is only the infamous design to strengthen the anti-slavery movement that prevents an effort to obtain that peace, we to the chiefs of the abolition party in the land,

But, enough of them. Words are thrown away upon their stubborn fanaticism. I appeal with better hope to the loftier feelings that should pervade humanity, and especially pervade this august assemblage—that should, by the nature of its sacred functions, be far removed from the miserable ambition of reducing a section of our common country to the extreme and therefore dangerous condition of despair.

Sir, there may be a fascination in the gory magnificence of war. There may be a craving for martial glories in the hearts of men, and an instinct of contention which we share in common with the brute creation. But if ever there can be a time when a more Christian impulse should possess our souls it is now; now, when the triumph and consciousness of strength give us the noble privilege of extending the hand of conciliation without fear of degradation, or self-reproach for cowardice. If adversity has been our excuse for sternness, let success be our plea for magnanimity. Providence has placed within the reach of the North a greater triumph than countless armed legions could conquer, the triumph of subduing a brave enemy with a generous and merciful policy, that will disarm resentment and rekindle the old brotherly flame that perhaps is not yet totally extinct. For, after all, they are our brothers, sir, and some softening of the stern Roman rigour which our rulers have assumed is due to that brotherhood, which, by untimely severity, may be cancelled now for ever. There are gentlemen who will say that the South must be subdued; that every armed Southerner must throw down his weapon and sue for mercy.

Should a freeman ask so much of his brother freeman? Would they be worthy of companionship in our fraternity, being reclaimed at such a sacrifice of manly feeling? What would you have them do? Would you have them crouch and cringe and strew their heads with ashes and kneel at your gates for readmission? They are Americans, sir, and will not do it! No, though Roanoke and Fort Henry and Fort Donnellson should be re-enacted from day to day through the lapse of bloody years, they will not do it! Give them some chance for an honourable return, for you will wipe out every chance, and the two sections will be twain for ever. Yes, sir, you may link them to each other with chains, and pin their destinies together with bayonets, but at heart they will be twain for ever. They are the children of the same heroic stock, the joint inheritors with ourselves of the precious legacy of freedom; and it seems a sacrilege and an insult to the memories of the past, that so many, sir, should sit in your presence here to day to goad them on to desperate resistance; and so few—alas! so very few—to mediate and restrain.

Of those few, I thank my God that I am not one. I am proud to proclaim it here beneath the dome of the Capitol. I shall proclaim it, here and everywhere, until the wings of peace shall be once more folded over the bleeding bosom of my country. I shall proclaim it aloud and honestly, although to do so would make me the next victim of this cruel strife.

Sir, it may be said that I speak of peace, while its attainment, without further recourse to arms, remains impossible. But I do not believe it impossible. What effort has been made? What door has been opened through which the passions and ill-feelings of the contestants might pass out and reason enter? None. The single idea has been forced upon the people that the sword, and the sword alone, must decide the issue. It has been pronounced treason to hold an opposite opinion. Sir, if to have but little faith in the efficacy of the sword or joining severed friendships, if to earnestly desire peace, and to deprecate the horrors of war, be treason, then am I a traitor; and I am prouder of such treason than others have the right to be of their vindictive, flaming, and pretentious patriotism.

I conjure this Congress, in the name of our suffering country, in the names of wives that may be widows, of children that may be orphans, in the names of gallant men, now strong in health, and who to-morrow may be stretched in death upon the gory ground, or writhing, maimed and disfigured, with tormenting wounds—in the name of humanity, that sickens at the daily record of this terrible strife, I conjure this Congress to seize at the merest chance that may exist of a present termination of this tragedy. Let something be attempted in the spirit of mediation. Sir, the people will respond to it. They will thank this Congress for it. They will bless this Congress for any measure that breathes of the spirit of reconciliation. They are weary of this war, weary in despite of the excitement of present victory. They will awaken soon to the consciousness that such victories are being purchased at a sacrifice that is terrible to contemplate; that a national debt is being created, which, in its rapid accumulation, is appalling—a debt which, if ever paid, will press like an incubus upon future generations, stunting the growth and paralyzing the vigour of our young Republic; or, if repudiated, resting a blot upon our annals.

And while at home we are groaning with distress and standing on the verge of bankruptcy, if we look abroad the spectacle tends only to our shame. We see the sceptred hands of Europe planting their royal banners upon the soil of this western hemisphere, which it is our natural duty to consecrate to Republicanism, and which we ought at least have guarded from the greed of foreign despots. The flag of Arragon and Castile flutters in the air of San Domingo, and, united with the blazons of France and England, is unfurled upon the walls of San Juan d'Ulloa. Where may they not float twelve months hence, if we, the natural guardians of this continent from foreign interference, should still be busy with dabbings in each other's gore? Sir, if there must be war, let it be against the natural enemies of republicanism, and as we have already humbled our national pride to conciliate the British lion, let us make some sacrifice to win back in amity and not to subjugate the South, that we may stand once again as comrades in arms, to scourge these foreign interlopers back again within their proper limits.

I am no advocate of bloodshed; but if a foreign war should be the alternative of submission to foreign insolence, I trust that I should be among the last to fall prostrate that the hurricane might sweep harmlessly by. To subserve the schemes of a party, we have already humiliated the American people in the eyes of scoffing Europe, and it will be a task hereafter to regain the caste we have lost in the family of nations. No much greater evil could befall us than to be forced from the position we have hitherto assumed towards foreign powers. I would not have my country swerve one inch from any vital principle of her foreign policy in any emergency whatever. Above all things, I hold dear that national honour which we have ever, till of late, preserved untarnished. However gloomy may be the aspect of things at home, I would have our flag float as proudly as ever abroad, not even deigning to make domestic affliction a plea for humility, an excuse for cowardice, or a palliation of national shame. Whenever occasion demands that a stand should be made against foreign aggression, or a rebuke administered to foreign pride, or a chastisement inflicted upon foreign insolence, I would have the gauntlet thrown down upon the impulse of the national sentiment, without reference to domestic exigencies, or pausing to measure the strong proportions of the foe.

In the heat of our private discord, we seem to have forgotten that our great mission as a people is to republi- canize the world, to advance the principle that men are capable of self-government, and to check the progress of monarchy. Sir, we are losing ground in the fulfilment of that sacred mission, and monarchy has gained a new foothold, while we have been weakening our sinews with intestine strife. And to what purpose? Is it possible that gentlemen can hope to reconstruct the Union by pursuing a policy of unrelenting severity? Can they expect to re-establish concord and brotherly love by pushing hostilities to the extreme verge? What is the Union worth without mutual respect and reciprocated amity to bind the sections? What! a Union of unwilling States, driven into companionship at the point of the bayonet, and held there hereafter by military power! Such a Union would not be worth the shedding of one brave man's blood. We want their hearts, or we want them not at all. And we cannot conquer hearts with bayonets, although they should outnumber the spears of Xerxes. If not brought back by negotiation, in the spirit they are gone from us for ever. To conquer them may be possible. To slay their soldiers, lay waste their lands, and burn their cities may be within our power. But to hold them in subjection, having conquered them, would in itself be a final repudiation of the first principle of republicanism. Prosecute this war until you have accomplished the necessity of holding a subdued section in subjection, and the world will look in vain for a republic on the western hemisphere.

Sir, I love to entertain the hope that our Union will be restored upon the foundation laid down by our fathers, and I desire no changes in the plan of that glorious superstructure. But I am not so unnatural a worshipper of the Union as to seek its salvation with the destruction of those for whose welfare it was conceived, to build it up upon the dead bodies of my countrymen, when other means are at hand for its reconstruction. I would purchase its redemption otherwise than by anarchy and ruin. I would not fling away the substance to perpetuate the name. Every drop of blood that is shed in this struggle will weaken the keystone of the fabric for whose sake the blood is pretended to be shed. One word of conciliation at this crisis will do more to save the country than all the achievements, past and to come, of your victorious soldiery.

Why should not that word go forth, even now, in the hour of the triumph of the Federal arms. If there has ever been a period in the history of republics when prolonged civil strife has failed to curtail the liberty of the masses, I have not read that history aright. Already, with one year's bitter experience, we have beheld some of the dearest privileges of American citizenship wrested from our grasp. And how long, at the same rate, before, upon the convenient plea of necessity, we shall be stripped of other rights which heretofore have made us deem ourselves freemen? How long, while personal liberty now depends on the nod of an official? How long, while free-born American citizens can be left to languish in bastiles, beyond the reach of the constituted tribunals of the land and at the mercy of the Executive for their liberation? How long, while the press, the guardian of liberty, the friend of the masses, is shackled, gagged, cowed down to sullen silence, or, worse yet, become the minion of a party? How long, while voters are arrested at the polls by military process, and legislators are hurried off to prison before they can assume their sacred functions? How long, while the partizans of the immaculate abolition party are coining money out of the blood of their countrymen, parading their showy patriotism and shouting "Union," with their arms up to the elbows in the public treasury? How long, sir, will the people of the North, taxed beyond endurance, robbed and cheated by an ever-craving horde of political hyenas—how long will they have a choice between freedom and anarchy, between a republic and a despotism? Alas! we still cling to the name of a republic, but have we the reality? It is entirely at the option of one man, or of a council of men, whether the citizen shall breathe in freedom the free air of Heaven. At the "open sesame" of the Executive, the gloomy portals of the Bastiles Lafayette and Warren will gape to receive him. And this is the Republic I was taught to love!

Sir, it is only a sign and forerunner of what must inevitably be, should the South be crushed into the Union. You may bring the South to terms with your bayonets, but when you have done so, you will have made a bond of air; a covenant to enforce which will necessitate this Government to assume the functions of a military despotism, and to break which at the first opportunity will be an aim and a purpose on the part of the subdued section.

What they have attempted once they will not fail to attempt hereafter, when smarting under the remembrance of defeat, when cherishing the deadly hate that a war to the utterance will engender.

For the sake of union now and of union hereafter—not enforced union, but the strong union of willing hearts—let the word of peace go forth, let the hand of reconciliation be extended. Why, sir, I have heard such words of bitter hatred expressed towards these Southerners by Northern lips, that I fear it may be already too late ever to renew the bonds of fraternity. Such sentiments I have heard of implacable resentment, of thirsting vengeance, of sectional antipathy, as Hannibal was taught to nurture against Rome, as Rome, in her quenchless jealousy, conceived towards Carthage to the end. And the doom of Carthage may be accepted by the South rather than reunion at the bayonet's point.

I appeal to this Congress to avert that fate as inglorious to the victor as to the vanquished. Let the door to negotiation be flung wide open, flung open now while we can make advances with good grace, and with laurels upon our brow. To the winds with the doctrine that you will not treat with armed traitors. It is a sentiment fitter for the epoch of a purpled Roman, than for the Christian age in which we live. It is the sentiment of one who rules with a rod of iron, not of a great and generous people who assume to rule themselves. Enough has been done in proof of the valour of the North, and the resources of the Government. Let something be now done for the sake of the past; for the sake of the memories of the Revolution, of the struggle of 1812, of the battle field of Mexico; for the sake of a Union whose cement shall be forgiveness for the past, and friendship and forbearance for the future.

In place of exulting over victories, and longing for new triumphs, how much more pleasant and more holy to draw a picture of the joy that will pervade many a now gloomy household when the glad tidings of peace shall be borne from city to village, from village to homestead, from lip to lip, and heart to heart. A nation's jubilee would well repay you for some little yielding of your stern policy. How many arms would be outstretched, how many hearts would bound to give a "welcome home again!" to the war-stained volunteer. Oh, sir, those meetings at the cottage threshold, those claspings at the farm-house porch, those cleavings of the throbbing bosoms of women to scarred and manly breasts were worth all the laurels that were ever snatched from blood-stained fields. The news of our victories has been hailed with peans and illuminations; but, with the first tidings of peace, there is not a hovel in the land that would not have a candle at its window; not a palace that would not blaze with splendours in token of the advent of a blessing priceless beyond all earthly triumphs.

Then, sir, let us lower the points of our victorious swords and parley with the foe while the bugle blasts of victory are yet ringing in our ears. If we are free in anticipation from the peril of future reverses—if we are sanguine that the Federal arms are henceforward gifted with invincibility, that is the noblest reason why we should say to our opponents, "pause; if you will, reflect." Let us yield them one chance for reconciliation, before we drive them to the resistance of despair. There can be no victory where kith and kin, where brothers and fellow-countrymen, where men who are bound to each other by the holiest of past associations, are struggling for supremacy. All is defeat, all is disaster, all is misfortune, tears, and mourning. Do not let us efface with blood every sacred memory that may yet bind these men to us as brothers. Give one sign of invitation before the death-struggle be renewed. Let the spirit of forgiveness pass between the lines of those opposing hosts, and with the blessings of Providence those armed legions will take a lesson from Sabinia and early Rome, whose soldiers, united by domestic ties, threw down their weapons upon the battle's verge, and sprang to each other's embrace."

Sir, I have spoken freely, studying only to make my words an index to my thought. My opinions have brought upon me the censure, often most discourteously expressed, of many who differ with me; but for that I care but little. I am content to bide the hour that shall set me right before my countrymen. As I have believed the prosecution of this war to be a widening of the gulf that separates the sections, I have earnestly opposed it. I have always looked upon the subjugation of the South as a project, whose fulfilment would strike a heavy, perhaps a fatal, blow to true republicanism; and, although I will yield to no man in devotion to the Union, although I would make any and every personal sacrifice to restore its glory and integrity, I will never consent, even for the sake of that Union, to yield up my birth-right as a freeman; to sacrifice those principles of self-government, those rights of free speech, free thought, and personal liberty, without which Union is but a mockery and a name.

It is not grandeur and extent of territory that I covet as the chief attributes of the Government under which I am to live. Were I one of but a single community, insignificant in numbers, but secure in a guarantee of pure republican ministration of affairs, I would be proud of my citizenship. But the Union of a thousand States, each one as great and populous as the noble one among whose representatives I have the honour to be, I would detest—yes, sir, in my most inmost heart detest—if the holding together of component parts should create a necessity for the assumption of despotic power.

Self-government is the god of my political idolatry, and the Union is but a temple in which I have worshipped it. Should that temple be destroyed, I would not forsake the creed, nor would the mighty principle be buried in the ruins. I love and would preserve the temple, for beneath its roof are gathered the treasures of holy past associations; upon its hallowed walls are inscribed the names of patriots, from the North and from the South, whose blood has been its cement. But rather would I have the glorious fabric crumble to the dust, than see the spirit of despotism enshrined within its sacred precincts.

I have seen already the silent but lengthening shadow of absolutism creeping into the spot. And when the Executive hand, for the first time in our history, was interposed between the citizen and his rights, the germ was planted of a danger mightier than rebellion in its most gigantic phase; for I believe encroachments by an Executive to be in itself rebellion against the only sovereignty I acknowledge—the majesty of the people. I believe each step towards absolutism to be more fatal to the welfare of the Republic than any possible act within the power of the citizen to conceive and execute. I will resist every grasp that may be made upon an attribute of sovereignty not heretofore acknowledged to the Chief Magistracy; for reason and instinct, no less than the fearful examples that history has furnished from the ashes of republics, teach me that the first step, unchecked, will not be the last, but only the precursor of those giant strides by which, over the necks of betrayed freemen, ambitious men have mounted to a throne.

We want a Union, sir, of sovereigns, not of subjects. And that our Government shall extend over a vast area, to me is of less moment than that it should be purely, strictly, and unequivocally republican, at all times, and under all conditions.

Sir, I have done. I have only to reiterate my hope and my entreaty that this Congress, which has in sacred charge the welfare of our country, will adopt some measure which may bring about a cessation of hostilities, with a view to negotiation. That done, I am firm in my belief that hostilities will not be resumed.

GENERAL BUTLER.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

SIR,—Some men have greatness thrust upon them; others achieve it. General McClellan belongs to the former class. Without having earned high rank as a warrior, he has been honoured by the title of the "Young Napoleon." The Confederate generals need not envy him his title, as it is a more condensed and bitter sarcasm than any which they could utter respecting him. Indeed, the Confederates have good reason for rejoicing that the pet commander of their opponents can do them little real harm, whether pursuing a policy of "masterly inaction" on the banks of the Potomac, or leading his army against Richmond. If anything could increase the contempt which the Confederates feel for the Federals, it would be the spectacle of a nation meekly submitting to the tyranny of a political mediocrity like President Lincoln, and allowing its army to be directed by a military mediocrity like General McClellan. It would be well if no heavier accusation than this could be brought against the Federal generals, or if it could only be added, on Federal testimony, that the majority of them are drunkards. McClellan may be an incompetent leader; but he has not shown himself to be a depraved and dishonourable man. He should not be censured for having had unmerited greatness thrust upon him. General Butler is in a different position. He has achieved greatness. It may be said of him, as was once said of his Emperor by a discontented Frenchman, that he is one of the greatest of men alive. A look, gesture, and whisper intimated the kind of greatness which the Frenchman meant. There being no occasion for resorting to such expedients to make plain my meaning, I unhesitatingly affirm that by his despicable conduct and disgusting proclamations, since he occupied New Orleans, General Butler has earned the first place among those who, in any age and nation, have disgraced the soldier's profession, and sullied their honour as men. If he burned to acquire fame, he has succeeded beyond his wildest hopes; his last proclamation has made him unenviably notorious for the moment, and infamous for ever. He has exhibited a fiendish ingenuity in introducing a new atrocity into the practice of war. Other generals have been merciless and brutal. They have delivered captured cities or fortresses into the hands of infuriated soldiers. But never did it happen that a city which, like New Orleans, had surrendered without resistance, was treated worse than one which cost the attacking forces much time and many lives to capture. Never before did a general declare war against women, and give official sanction to cold-blooded and wholesale rape. General Butler is the first who has ordained that "when any female shall by word, gesture, or movement, insult or show contempt for any officer or soldier," she is to be treated as a common prostitute by those who are constituted at once the judges of her offence, and the instruments of her intolerable punishment. Hitherto, the Confederates have complained of the lack of English sympathy. I think it improbable that they will have reason to make a similar complaint in future. The most apathetic Englishmen cannot see women outraged, as they are now being in New Orleans, without feeling the deepest indignation against those who command, execute, and approve of the outrage. Before many weeks elapse, civilized men in every quarter of the world, the Federal States alone excepted, will send forth a general chorus of denunciation of the dastardly conduct of this contemptible Northern general.

To those who occupy the position of impartial spectators, there is something inexplicable in the course recently pursued by the North towards the South. If the Federal armies were indeed intended—as Washington politicians assert them to be—to take part in a crusade for freeing the South from the dominion of the Confederate armies, and thereby enable peaceable and loyal citizens to return to that "Union" they so dearly love, then the manner in which the leaders of those armies set about their task is very extraordinary. No sooner do the Northerners gain possession of a Southern city than its inhabitants become tenfold more attached to President Jefferson Davis than before. Instead of endeavouring to regain lost affections by gentle means, the Federal generals employ coercion. They act like a man who, finding his wife resolved on being divorced from him because of his profligacy and cruelty, endeavours to divert her from her purpose by daily committing adultery, and beating her without mercy. What is still more absurd is the apparent belief of the Northerners that the best way to reconcile the inhabitants of Richmond to the prospect of the occupation of their city by Federal troops, is to maltreat and tyrannize over the citizens of Nashville, Norfolk, and New Orleans. There is a method, however, in this madness. The insane policy followed by the Federal Generals has been deliberately adopted and will be consistently persisted in. It may have puzzled some who take an interest in this question, why so little has been said recently about the restoration of the "Union." The explanation is, that the cry for which this war was first entered into by the North was merely a pretext; its promoters desiring not the restoration of the "Union," but the conquest of the South, the confiscation of Southern property, and the ruin of Southern citizens. We find this openly avowed in publications which express the views of the governing class in the North, in publications which differ from the Northern newspapers in this, that the contributors to them have received some education and exercise considerable political influence. It is unquestionable that the opinions expressed by the Atlantic Monthly are those which several members of Mr. Lincoln's Government hold and act upon. In an article on "slavery," contained in the number of that magazine for May, the following passage occurs, and from it we can infer what the North is now fighting for. "Now that the slaveholders have been so foolish as to appeal to physical force, abandoning their vantage-ground of political influence, they must be not only politically overthrown, but physically humiliated. Their arrogant sense of superiority must be beaten out of them by main force." Unfortunately for the Federals, two can play at that game. As yet the "main force" employed by them to beat the "arrogant sense of superiority" out of the Confederates has had a result similar to that of the drunkard who boasted of being able to drive his head through an oak door, and succeeded in fracturing his skull without damaging the door. In the April number of the same magazine there is a paper of directions as to how the South should be treated when subdued. It is argued that whatever atrocities were committed by our forefathers on the Covenanters, on those who took part in the rising on behalf of Monmouth, and of the Pretender, and by ourselves on those Sepoys who mutinied against us in India, may with perfect propriety be exercised towards the Southern "rebels." I need not stay to comment on the admirable logic of the assertion, that because the Duke of Cumberland obtained the epithet of "butcher," therefore if General McClellan should imitate his example, no Englishman could condemn him! I feel assured that General Butler only requires a fitting opportunity to surpass the Duke of Cumberland in blood-thirstiness, as he has already surpassed him in infamy. The writer who ransacks English history for precedents to justify atrocious actions, concludes thus: "But one principle asserts itself out of the uniform course of history. The restoration of the lawful authority over rebels does not restore them to their old status. They are at the pleasure of the conquering Power." This being true, the citizens of New Orleans may rejoice that their lives have been spared. General Butler has acted towards them more mercifully than the late Governor Yeh did towards the inhabitants of Canton. Yet it is doubtful whether that barbarian played a viler part in ordering the heads of 20,000 people to be cut off, than the professedly civilized Federal General did in issuing his loathsome edict.

The foregoing extracts prove that the conduct of the Federal Generals is in accordance with what their countrymen expect of them. For the sake of humanity, I should have been pleased to believe that General Butler would have been forced to withdraw his proclamation, and be superseded in his post. So far from that having occurred, the chances are that he will become popular in the North. The Northern correspondent of a contemporary refers to the proclamation in these terms: "It is perfectly right. Ladies who spit in Northern soldiers' faces, strike with their parasol handles the wounded soldiers, and call them opprobrious names, ought to be treated thus." Now, while no evidence is offered in support of these charges of spitting and striking, the retaliation is approved of. Unless I greatly err, this proclamation will have an effect which its framer did not foresee. The Confederates have been battling for independence. While continuing to do so they will also fight to avenge the galling insult which has been inflicted on them as a people by the permission given to the Federal soldiers to treat the ladies of New Orleans like harlots. The spirit thus aroused will be equivalent to a reinforcement of 100,000 men. R.

THE MEXICAN ACCOUNT OF THE FRENCH DEFEAT.

WE find the following official report of General Zaragoza addressed to the Mexican Minister of War, respecting the battle of Puebla, in the Moniteur. We know that this source is not a very reliable one, and when General Lorencez's despatches are published, we shall probably have a very different version of the affair:—

"ARMY OF THE EAST, HEAD QUARTERS, Puebla, May 9.

"After having commenced my retrograde movement, starting from the Cumbres de Acultzingo, I arrived in this city on the 3rd inst., as I have already had the honour to inform your Excellency. The enemy followed me at a small day's distance, and, having left the rear-guard of the 2nd Cavalry Brigade, consisting of about 300 men, to obstruct his advance as far as possible, I proceeded, as already stated, to Puebla. I immediately issued orders to place the heights of Guadalupe and Loreto in a regular state of defence, and I hastily completed the fortifications of the place, which had hitherto been neglected.

"On the morning of the 4th I ordered General Miguel Negrete, a most distinguished officer, to take the head of the Second Division under his orders, 1200 strong, to be prepared to fight directly he should give the signal, and to occupy the heights, already mentioned, of Loreto and Guadalupe, which were provided with two batteries of field artillery and mountain guns. On the same day I formed out of the brigades Berriozabal, Diaz, and Lamadrid, three attacking columns consisting, the first of 1082 men, the second of 1000 men, and the third of 1020 men, all infantry, with the exception of 550 horse, under General Antonia Alvarez, to whom I entrusted a field battery. These troops remained assembled on the Place San José till noon; they then returned to their quarters. The enemy passed the night at Azamoc.

"At five o'clock on the morning of the 5th of May, our troops advanced in the order of battle I had assigned to them, and which your Excellency will find in the accompanying sketch. I ordered the Commander-General of the Artillery, Colonel Zeferino Rodriguez, to distribute the rest of his guns on the ramparts of the town, placing them under the orders of General Santiago Tapia, Military Commandant of the State.

"At ten a.m. the enemy was discerned, not taking the necessary time to encamp, and advancing his attacking columns—one towards the heights of Guadalupe, about 4000 strong, with two batteries; the other, not so numerous, probably 1000 men, threatened our front. This attack, which I had not expected, though I was aware of the daring of the French army, modified my plan, and decided me to take the offensive. I consequently ordered the Berriozabal Brigade to attack at double quick step, to reinforce Loreto and Guadalupe, and the mounted Carabiniers to take the left of the infantry, to charge at an opportune moment.

"Shortly afterwards I ordered the battalion 'Reforme,' of Lamadrid's brigade, to go to the support of the troops on the heights, and which were becoming hotly engaged. I advanced a battalion of Sappers of the 1st Brigade, with orders to occupy a village situated almost on the summit of the ridge. It arrived in such good time that it stopped the advance of a column sent to that point in a hand-to-hand engagement. The French made three sudden charges, but were each time repulsed. The cavalry placed to the left of Loreto took advantage of the opportunity, and charged them vigorously, preventing them from reforming and making another attack.

"While the battle was being waged hotly on the heights, a no less desperate struggle was taking place in the plain, to the right of my front of battle.

"General Diaz, with two corps of his brigade, one corps of Lamadrid's brigade, with two field pieces, and the remainder of Alvarez's brigade, met and drove back the enemy's column, which was advancing boldly against our positions. It fell back on the Hacienda de San José, where it was joined by those we had driven from the heights, and who, already reorganized, prepared to defend themselves, and again sounded the charge. I could not attack them, because they had a numerical force superior to mine. I therefore ordered General Diaz, who was eagerly following them, to halt; and satisfied myself with holding a threatening attitude.

"The opposing forces remained in face of each other till six o'clock in the evening. The enemy then withdrew to his encampment at the Hacienda de los Alamos, while our troops gradually returned within their lines.

"The night was passed on the field of battle, where we picked up the dead and wounded of the enemy. This occupied the whole of the following day; and though I have not a correct return of the loss of the French, I am told it is not under 1000 killed and wounded, and 8 or 10 prisoners. I have to point out to your Excellency the conduct of my brave companions. The glorious action which has just been fought speaks well for their courage, and suffices to recommend them.

"The French army fought most vigorously. I conclude by informing you that at the same time I was preparing the defence of the national army I was obliged to order the brigades O'Honor and Carvajal to watch the seditious assembled in considerable numbers at Atlixco and Matamoros, a circumstance which, perhaps, saved the enemy from a total rout, and deprives the little army of the East of the opportunity of a victory which would have immortalized its name.

"J. ZARAGOZA.

"Head-quarters, Puebla, May 9.

"To the Minister of War at Mexico."

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MULLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTHFORD, BROWN, AND CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tenne-
see, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

RED AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Runford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
Jos. T. Robinson & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS.
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES;
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: HOGARTH, New Bond-street.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE,
14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDE-RICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—
1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. German and French Books.—Philosophy, Metaphysics.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. LINGUISTIC CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History, Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mechanics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FOREIGN BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable means of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the spirit of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION
FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRESS INTERNATIONAL
DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.

THE Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science, in conjunction with the Third Session of the Congress International de Bienfaissance, will take place in London from the 5th to the 12th of June.

The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.

The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon, in Burlington House.

A series of Societies will be given during the period
of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entitled to the volume of Transactions), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to
all the Meetings of the Association and Congress,
and to the Societies, &c.

Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C.; and 12, Old Bond-street, W.
As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association
has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting
will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.

For every £5 subscribed to this Fund, subscribers
are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City
Office, Guildhall, E.C.; by Messrs. Ransom, Bouverie,
and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Western Bank, Lombard-street, E.C.; the Union Bank, Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kinnaird,
and Co., 1, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George
Ledger, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.

GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.,
and Chairman of Executive Committee.
A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.
G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.
A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantage of the best education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice- President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Galliard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 493,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 292,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 609,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 806,420 38
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrip of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Voornberg.
G. Hould.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
P. Voornberg.
E. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,376 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,590 03
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 10th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRAIT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and
land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PATTERN PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.
Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made
up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Ship Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 329th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to
carry therein, aquafortis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty of £100, and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to VIII. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—startled Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY P. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—June 19, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I.—No. 9.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JUNE 26, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	129
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter.. ..	130
Manchester Letter	131
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Private Letters and Extracts	131
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Paris	132
LETTER TO THE EDITOR—
From an Englishman in the South.. ..	133
OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS, ETC.	134, 135
LEADERS—
No News	135
Are the Confederates Rebels?	136
Piotrkiewicz Threats	137
The Financial Prospects of the United States	138
Editorials	139
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—
The Tune of Dixie	140
On the Scene of Action	140
REVIEW OF BOOKS—
Mr. Trollope on Secession	140
A Historical Parallel, No. VI.	142
SOUTHERN RAILROADS	143
THE CAPTURE OF THE CIRCASSIAN	143
ADVERTISEMENTS	144

guage. They ascended to the top of the post-office, and planted the flag, although fired upon several times and stoned by the mob below. Still, I believe this conduct was reprobated by the people of standing in the place; indeed, many evidences of an extended Union sentiment in the place reached me.

Henceforth we shall understand that Confederate cheers for Union soldiers means a shower of bullets and stones. The evidences of an extended Union feeling are not explained—perhaps they also partake of the stoning and firing character. We commend Federal despatches to the compilers of books of conundrums. Here is a specimen of the riddles:

The people express a desire for the restoration of the old order of things, though still professing to be Seces-ionists.

Respecting the evacuation of Fort Pillow, the Federal commander writes:—

To my mortification, the enemy evacuated Fort Pillow last night. They carried away or destroyed everything of value.

Of course it must be exceedingly mortifying to a burglar, after he has encountered the risk and trouble of breaking into a house, to find the plate-basket removed to a place of safety; but it is slightly ridiculous for the burglar to openly bewail his ill-luck.

We have no news from General M'Clellan's army. We did not expect to hear of any further movements until time had been given to the Federal General to reorganize his army after the severe defeat it sustained on May 31. The following statement has been published of the Federal loss:—

Statement of the Killed, Wounded, and Missing of May 31 and June 1, in front of Richmond.
Corps.	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.
General Sumner, 2nd. . . .	183	994	146
General Heintzelman, 3rd . . .	259	980	155
General Keyes, 4th	448	1753	921
Total	890	3627	1222

The grand total, killed, wounded, and missing, is 5739. A nominal list will be furnished as soon as the data can be received.

(Signed) G. B. M'CLELLAN.

Does this include General Casey's division, which is admitted to have been cut up? If so, we do not believe the report; if not, the report is a gross case of suppressio veri.

President Davis issued the following address:—

TO THE ARMY OF RICHMOND.

Executive Office, June 2, 1862.

I render to you my grateful acknowledgments for the gallantry and good conduct you displayed in the battles of the 31st of May and 1st inst., and with pride and pleasure recognize the steadiness and intrepidity with which you attacked the enemy in position, captured his advanced entrenchments, several batteries of artillery, and many standards, and everywhere drove them from the open field.

At a part of your operations it was my fortune to be present. On no other occasion have I witnessed more of calmness and good order than you exhibited while advancing into the very jaws of death, and nothing could exceed the prowess with which you closed upon the enemy when a sheet of fire was blazing in your faces!

In the renewed struggle in which you are on the eve of engaging, I ask and can desire but a continuance of the same conduct which now attracts the admiration and pride of the loved ones you have left at home.

You are fighting for all that is dearest to men; and though opposed to a foe who disregards many of the usages of civilized war, your humanity to the wounded and the prisoners was the fit and crowning glory to your valour.

Defenders of a just cause, may God have you in His holy keeping!

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

On assuming the command of the army, in consequence of General Johnston being slightly wounded, General Robert W. Lee, in his address, told the soldiers that the army had made its last retreat, and that henceforth every man's watchword must be "victory or death." The response was cheers from all the regiments.

The reports of General Fremont's disasters are meagre, but we may form a fair calculation of his heavy loss by the severe loss admitted among the officers; Colonel Wyndham, and Lieutenant-Colonel Kane, and Captain Taylor were captured; Captains Shellmure and Haines were wounded and missing; Captain Charles missing; Captain Blanchard severely wounded; Lieutenant Wayne "probably killed." This is not a list of casualties among the Federal officers, but a few names which occur in a despatch written soon after the battle. After defeating the enemy General Jackson continued his march; or, to use the choice phraseology of Federal commanders, "he was driven back." Need we add, General Fremont did not follow his retr. ating enemy, or prevent him burning Fort Republic bridge?

We hear of an important movement in East Tennessee. General Kirby Smith is advancing towards Nashville in considerable force. The people are manifesting the greatest enthusiasm in the Confederate cause. In Kentucky great preparations are being made for a Confederate demonstration. Mr. Lincoln will soon have to make a call for more men; and, simultaneously, Mr. Chase will have to increase his manufacture of paper money.

The reported advance of the Federal gunboats in James River was a Northern fabrication. They have not been able to get beyond Fort Darling.

General Beauregard's movements are still mysterious to the Federals. Some say he has gone to Richmond, others that he has advanced towards Memphis. Why not cease these curious speculations? General Beauregard is not gone for ever, nor is he sleeping. At the right moment he will put in an appearance that will satisfy the North of the strategical ability of Southern generals. In an editorial we give an officially endorsed account of the evacuation of Corinth, which is short, and will repay perusal. The last mails did not bring us any more Haileck romances. Certainly it would not do for General Pope to capture 10,000 Confederates by every mail. As it is, any one who will take the trouble of casting up the Federal records of captured, will find that already nearly all the Confederate soldiers have been taken—on paper.

The Southern army at Charleston has been increased, and the Federal Commodore Dupont "thought the attack on Charleston could not safely proceed until the Federals were reinforced." No one can accuse the Federals of being guilty of the imprudence of attacking the Confederates on equal terms.

Denmark has offered the Federal Government to convey 3000 slaves, who have lost their masters, to the sugar plantations in the island of St. Croix, and to employ them there upon the same terms as the free negroes. Mr. Seward has referred the offer to Congress. Additional labour would develop the

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

DETAILS of the occupation of Memphis by the Federals confirm the assurance we gave our readers last week, that the cotton had been destroyed. The report that "30,000 bales of cotton had been burnt in the neighbourhood of Memphis," is inaccurate, because a much larger quantity than 30,000 bales was consigned to the flames, in order to save it from the hands of the invaders. After the gunboat fight, which lasted for a hour and a-half, and, according to Federal accounts, resulted in the total destruction of the Confederate fleet, except one boat, and in one Federal being wounded and none killed, a demand was made for the surrender of the city, and the hoisting of the United States' flag, and to which the following answer was returned:—

TO CHARLES ELLET, JUN., COMMANDING, &c.

Mayor's Office, Memphis, Tennessee, June 6.

Sir,—Your note of this date is received, and the contents noted. The civil authorities of this city are not advised of its surrender to the forces of the United States' Government, and our reply to you is simply to state respectfully that we have no forces to oppose the raising of the flags you have directed to be raised over the custom-house and post-office.

Respectfully, JOHN PARK, Mayor.

The Federals took possession of the city, and a despatch published in the Northern papers says:—

No disturbance took place at the time of occupation. All the cotton in the city was burnt and much sugar destroyed. The Union soldiers cut down the rebel flag, which was nailed to the staff, amid the cheering of the people. The departing trains are crowded with refugees. The stores are closed, and Confederate money refused.

This is very pretty, but its effect is rather spoilt by the despatch of Colonel Ellet, which, by some accident, was published without that careful editing and emendation to which Mr. Stanton subjects the despatches of the Federal Commanders. Colonel Ellet reports:—

On receiving this reply the small party proceeded to the post-office to raise the national flag, and were then joined by the Mayor. It is proper to say that the conduct of the Mayor and some of the citizens was unexceptionable, but the party was surrounded by an excited crowd, using angry and threatening lan-productiveness of the little island of St. Croix, and we suppose Denmark thinks that as the illwind of the American war has not yet blown good to anybody, she is justified in trying to get a little advantage from it. It is a paltry affair, but not very creditable to Denmark. If her object is to relieve the North of a difficulty, it amounts to a desire to aid and abet the North in the wicked attempt to crush the independence of the South. Moreover, it is rather unfair to appropriate to one's own use the property of a neighbour lost in the day of trouble. Denmark will be called upon hereafter by the North to pay handsomely for the cargo of negroes she may now get hold of on easy terms. In our opinion the conduct of Denmark is impolitic, and assuredly it is mercenary, ungenerous, and unjust.

In the present number of THE INDEX is a leader entitled "Pickwickian Threats." Since that was in type Europe has been treated to another Federal menace. The Federal Secretary of the Navy has sent a letter to Congress suggesting the establishment of a navy yard in the valley of the Mississippi for constructing iron-plated ships. He says:—

It is a duty as well as a necessity to make the United States a great naval Power. Experience admonishes America not to let war come upon her unprepared; yet war may now be pending. The calamity that might follow neglect should warn America to be prepared. It is no longer doubtful that the future safety of America is dependent on her naval strength and efficiency. America can now commence the construction of a navy adapted to present times under as favourable circumstances as any nation. No nation can have the advantage over America if she now avails herself of the means and opportunity.

We may well smile at such official boasting. The object is to deter England and France from recognizing the Confederate States. The United States is represented in Europe, and therefore the Federal Secretary ought to know about the probability of "war now pending." If the recognition of the Confederate States is to be a casus belli, we share his opinion; but we do not imagine the leading Powers of Europe will withhold an act of justice, for fear of the Federal naval preparations. Certainly we should have imagined that a costly and exhausting war, and the prospect of national bankruptcy, were not "favourable circumstances" for the construction of a fleet to cope with the fleets of England and France. However, it is useless to seriously discuss the empty braggadocio of the Federal Secretary of the Navy. Surely the Lincoln Government should not intrude on the special province of the Northern press. Amongst our extracts we print an article from the New York Herald, which concludes by saying, "and our Government has awed the Mistress of the Seas by an exhibition of its inexhaustible resources, and its vast power on land and sea." It is true that the English flag has been frequently insulted, and Federal war-vessels have gallantly fired into defenceless merchantmen; but we think such proceedings are less likely to cause awe than disgust.

Mr. Chase's paper money is getting out of favour. A bill has been introduced into Congress for an additional issue of 150,000,000 dollars demand notes. This is strongly opposed by the New York World, a print which represents a more monied class than the New York Herald. But how can the Lincoln Government carry on if it is not allowed to issue paper money? Specie is fast leaving the country. The Saxonia and the City of New York, starting on the 14th inst., took 1,800,000 dollars. The price for gold 7. Money is abundant, but what kind of money? Paper money. We are told stocks are advancing. Why? Because Federal securities are the only securities that men will sell for Federal paper money. The New York Journal of Commerce says, that if evil follows ultimately, as it is almost sure to do in every case of violation of sound financial principles, it is to be hoped that its approach will be so gradual, that all will be prepared for it. But if public confidence is shaken, the evil will not approach gradually. A correspondent writes us; "I look for financial difficulties in Wall-street, on July 1. The specie in the banks will be much reduced about that time; the first batch of heavy war loans will then mature; and the dividends payable on that day, a large portion of which have to be remitted to Europe, will shake the house of paper." The Government may be able to tide over that difficulty, and postpone the evil day, but, to do so, the public must not be alarmed by timid journalists and probably Mr. Lincoln and his coadjutors may find it necessary to supervise the publication of financial news as they do the publication of war news.

Every paper we read, every Southern letter that reaches us, refers to the wholesale destruction of cotton. Besides, large quantities left unginned and unpacked have been spoilt by the damp. If the Federals could succeed in overrunning the Confederate States, there would be little more cotton in the South than there is in Liverpool.

On Sunday, June 1, a troop of Union cavalry made an attack on a few recruits and some sick soldiers at Brownsville, about thirty-five miles below Corinth. They destroyed four cars of army stores and captured some prisoners. After this gallant achievement they started for General Halleck's head-quarters, but about mid-way they encountered a division of Gen. Price's army, lost their prisoners, and over a thousand of the Union cavalry were captured.

It is rumoured that General Beauregard has obstructed the Tennessee River at Duck River Suck, about 125 miles below Eastport, by blasting the cliffs, and filling the channel with masses of stones and trees.

The Hon. Pierre Soule, ex-Senator from the State of Savannah, and former minister of the United States to Spain, has been arrested by General Butler on a high political charge, and is to be sent North for trial. From the manner in which the report reaches us, it appears that Mr. Soule had consented to act as Provost Marshal of the city of New Orleans.

The debate in the House of Commons in reference to the encouragement of the growth of cotton in India will have no practical result. How can the Government encourage the people of India to grow cotton instead of produce that pays them better? By imposing a duty on all other cotton? That would not be effective; for as soon as the war is over, and the South becomes reproductive, American cotton would find its way into France, and we should have to abolish the protective duty, or to close our manufactories. Legislation cannot change the order of nature, and so enable Indian cotton to compete with American cotton. If there was the slightest chance of a profitable development of the cultivation of cotton in India, there would be no lack of capital for the enterprise, and no need of Government encouragement.

We publish to-day a detailed account of the seizure of Judge Carmichael in his Court House. The savage atrocities committed are astounding. There never was such a case of maltreating a judge sitting on the judicial bench.

The new Canadian Ministry has introduced a militia bill, appropriating 250,000 dollars instead of 1,000,000 dollars, as proposed by the late Government. The rejectors of the former bill did not act from any want of loyalty. The militia of Canada is stronger than is generally supposed. We take from a contemporary the following statement of the Canadian militia, prepared by Colonel De Salaberry, Adjutant-General:—

LOWER CANADA.
Military districts	9
Battalions	178
Battalion officers	5,716
Sergeants	3,411
First-class service men (unmarried) ..	30,481
Second-class service men	45,288
Reserve men	33,573
Total rank and file	118,469
UPPER CANADA.
Military districts	9
Battalions	249
Staff of military districts	26
Battalion officers	3,858
Sergeants	2,958
First-class service men	42,342
Second-class service men	44,448
Reserve men	31,168
Total rank and file	117,200

There is a report that the French forces have been again repulsed by the Mexicans. The Emperor has determined to send out sufficient troops to force the way to the capital. The determination of his Majesty to put an end to Mexican anarchy will be very displeasing to the United States, as the restoration of order and the establishment of a strong Government will frustrate their design of conquering Mexico.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, June 25, 1862.

THE past week will long be remembered in our cotton market as one of the most extraordinary on record, whether we consider the enormous rise in prices, the heavy sales, or the rapid transfer of stock from hand to hand. That "universal scramble" for cotton, which has been predicted so long, has fairly come at last; so often had the expectation been baulked, that the public generally had quite lost confidence in the market, and even those who were prepared for a great advance, ultimately had no idea that the movement would be so rapid or continuous. In no single week since the war broke out, has so much excitement prevailed; about as great an advance was obtained in the week that concluded the settlement of the "Trent dispute," but no such eagerness was evinced to buy cotton, nor was the turning over of stock nearly so extensive.

Our last report left the market strong and buoyant at 13½ for middling Orleans, and 9½ for Fair Dhollerah. On Thursday and Friday the demand continued very good, and prices hardened in the two days ½d. per lb., with sales of about 15,000 bales each. The week's return on Friday presented some remarkable features; the sales reached 125,000 bales, leaving the total stock 260,000, proving the extraordinary fact that nearly half the cotton in the port had changed hands.

In East India cotton the transactions summed up 75,000 bales, nearly equal to the supply left in stock—96,000 bales! Public attention was called by these figures more forcibly to the astonishing curtailment of supply, and this feeling has been the controlling influence in our market for the last few days. On Saturday the demand continued good, till the receipt of the Europa's news at midday, which imparted an additional spur to the market. Some uneasiness had been excited by reports of the disharding and demoralization of Beauregard's army, and some holders feared that the market might be checked by news of some great disaster to the Confederates. But the Europa's news dissipated these fears; the Confederates were again reported to be making headway in Tennessee, while in Virginia, Jackson was dealing desperate blows to his pursuers. The taking of Memphis, and the destruction of the Southern flotilla, did not attract much attention, for, since the capture of New Orleans, it had been obvious that it was only a question of time, till the Federal gunboats had entire command of the Western waters. Besides, the burning of cotton at Memphis served to neutralise the news of its capture, so far as its influence on our market was concerned. On the receipt of these advices an immense demand sprang up—one house alone purchased 7000 bales—and buying went on till 6 p.m., the sales probably exceeding 25,000 bales, at a further advance of ½d. per lb.

On Monday orders came pouring in from the Continent. Spinners attended in large numbers, and, amid excessive competition for cotton, prices were forced up another ½d. per lb. with sales of 2500 bales. On Tuesday the excitement continued unabated, with a similar advance and sales of 20,000 bales. The Bohemian's news to the 14th was to hand in the afternoon, but contained few items of much interest beyond the continued rise in the premium of gold at New York, which has now reached 7 per cent. In Manchester the contagious influence of our excitement was felt, and a large business done, which has brought down spinners to-day in crowds, whilst export orders still keep pouring in. The sales to-day again reach the extraordinary figure of 25,000 bales, and the effect on our trifling stock is more marked than heretofore; prices are in many cases ½d. dearer than yesterday, and sales of Surats have been largely made at 1½d. advance since Saturday. Values now fluctuate so violently from day to day that it is scarcely possible to give reliable quotations; but Middling American Cotton may be quoted to-day at 15d. for Orleans, 14½d. for Mobiles, and 14½ for Uplands, showing 1½d. advance since our last report. In Surats the rise has been far more rapid, proportionately varying from 1½d. to 1¾d. in the six days. The market is now almost swept of desirable parcels, and after allowing for the amount definitely put aside for export, it is doubtful whether more than 30,000 bales remain for sale. Fair Dhollerahs may be quoted at 10½d. to 11d.; Omrawuttees 11d. to 11½d.; and Saw-ginned Dharwar, 12½d. The Dhollerah cotton forced off at 7d. during the panic six weeks ago is now worth 10½d.; and some parcels of New Omrawuttee, sold at 7½d., are fetching 11½d. to 11¾d., as they are landed. No instance of so enormous and rapid a profit has yet occurred in the many phases of this convulsion, nor, indeed, probably within the memory of this generation. In cotton to arrive an immense business has been doing daily all the week, and probably from 50,000 to 100,000 bales have been turned over; the prices now established are 11½d. for early shipments of Broach, in some cases even 11¾d. has been offered; 10½d. for early Dhollerahs, and Omrawuttee is worth 10½d. May and June shipments command about ½d. less than these rates.

The last mail from Bombay advises very large shipments, say, 64,000 bales to England for the fortnight, and the business doing was based on 6½ F. O. B., and freight for Dholerah and Broach Rd. to 8½ for Omrawutte and Comblab, and 10½ for Dharwar Saw-ginned. The amount of Surat cotton now afloat for England is 243,000 bales, and of East India for all Europe about 300,000 bales, representing arrivals at the rate of 25,000 per week.

Our statistics, on Friday, will show astounding results; the total stock will hardly exceed 200,000 bales, comprising some 70,000 American and 50,000 or 60,000 Surats, and these figures may encourage this wild excitement. Still it must be remembered that the trade now hold a stock of 100,000 bales, while export buyers have secured in the last three weeks as much; so that if any cause occurred to check the market, the demand might be almost suspended for two or three weeks and allow a sharp reaction.

The general feeling at present is, that the common run of Surats will be pushed up to 12d. and American to 16d. or 17d. before there is a pause; but, if this view is confirmed, the stop, when it comes, will be a complete one, and it will probably be a considerable time before high-water mark is passed again. It is evident that that this frenzy cannot last much longer, and some unforeseen occurrence in America might greatly change the face of affairs.

MANCHESTER, June 24.

THE past week has been one of unusual activity in the cotton trade, a steady daily advance in the raw material, caused by a general demand from all classes of buyers, has been responded to here more fully than at any time since the commencement of the year; gradual diminishing stocks have imparted more confidence to the holders, and buyers now find it too difficult to get on, especially if their requirements are such rendering execution of orders imperative as to selection of material made from American cotton only. Up to Saturday last, the week's advance in yarns may be broadly stated at ½d. to ¾d. in counts up to sixty, and in certain finer counts, fully 1d per lb.

The rise in cloths generally is not equal to that in yarns, and on the whole, more has been done in the former than in the latter. Stocks of articles, previously unsaleable, have been easily got rid of, and there were more offers made than there were for various goods, both from home dealers, and from merchants connected with other markets, than there were of India and China. For the Eastern markets, there are now purchases of the long neglected figured shirtings, and plain goods for the same markets are still going off, making the total week's business very considerable.

Prices being now more than ever disastrous to the manufacturer, and yet not very tempting to the merchant, no other prospect is considered possible than that production will soon decrease more than it has hitherto done. A correspondent from one of our Lancashire manufacturing towns states, in reference to the soup establishment, that about the gate there was a cluster of melancholy loungers, looking cold and hungry, and neither going in nor going away. Many of these were people who had neither money nor tickets for food, some of them houseless wanderers who had made their way to the soup kitchen to beg a mouthful from those who were themselves nearly starving. In the best of times there are such wanderers, and in spite of the generous provision made for the relief of the poor, there must be, in a time like the present, a great number who let go their hold of home (if they have any) and drift away in search of better fortune, and sometimes into irregular courses of life, never to settle more. Here and there a bonny lass had crept into the shade with her basin; and there was many a brown-faced man, who had been hardened by working in the Moor or at the stonewall.

Those who came with tickets, by far the greatest number, had to pass in single file through a strong wooden maze, which restrained their eagerness, and compelled them to order. Only a small proportion went through the maze, they were mostly women and children. There was many a fine intelligent young face buried blushing through the maze, many a bonny lad and lass who will be heard of honourably hereafter.

To-day our market has been much disturbed by the excited state of the Liverpool cotton market, the great and rapid advance in value of the raw material causing some producers to withdraw their stocks from the market, and refusing to make any quotations either for goods and yarns.

In yarns, the rise appears to be most marked in warps, cops, and 30s. water twist in the bundle, for which very extreme prices have been paid.

In home-trade yarns a similar advance, say ½d. per lb., has been established, but the amount of business transacted in this department appears to have been somewhat limited. Five-fold yarns are nominally dearer by ½d. to 1d. per lb., but we hear of no business doing at the extreme quotations, and in some counts, such as No. 80, the improvement since last week is very slight.

All kinds of cloth are held for much higher prices, and business consequently seriously checked. The business done has mostly consisted of sales made out of stock, at an advance scarcely equal to that on yarns; but manufacturers have generally refused to place themselves under contract for future delivery, except at much higher prices, which buyers, so far, refuse to pay.

Some transactions are reported in 7lb. and 8½lb. shirtings, at an advance of fully 3d. per piece on last Tuesday's rates, and a similar rise has been established in the lighter quality of T cloths, and also on certain kinds of L cloths, for which there has been more inquiry, especially for some of the Mediterranean markets.

Other kinds of cloth partake of the upward tendency, but business, on the whole, is checked by the extreme prices for which they are held.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

THE CONFEDERATE PRESS ON THE BATTLE BEFORE RICHMOND.

[From the Richmond Enquirer, June 4.]

General Hill's division went into the fight on Saturday evening at one o'clock. The engagement continued until after dark. It was a long and bloody one, we driving the enemy through the woods and swamps, and taking possession of their fortifications and encampments. R. H. Anderson's and Kemper's brigades (of Longstreet's division) reinforced General Hill late in the day, and contributed much to our success. On Sunday morning early the battle was renewed—Rains (of General Hill's division), Pickett, and Wilcox bearing the brunt. Huger's two brigades, Armistead's and Mahone's, were in the battle on Saturday for a short time.

This statement can be confirmed by Generals Rhodes, Garland, Rains, Colonel Anderson, and every other brave man. General Hill commanded both days, and was in front under fire the whole time. He overlooked everything, and received no orders from his superiors.

[From the Richmond Examiner, June 5.]

We are in possession of information which, though it is derived from a negro, we believe to be perfectly reliable, establishing the fact that the loss of the enemy in the battles of Saturday and Sunday last exceeds ours four to one. We will explain who our informant is, and our reason for crediting him, and then give his account. Mr. W. P. L. Quarles, who, previous to the falling back of our army, lived in the house on the left hand side of the Williamsburg-road, and in the centre of the battle-field of Saturday, owns a negro named William, who, until the day of the battle, was employed on the batteries at Drury's Bluff, from which place he was discharged on Saturday, with permission to return home. Mr. Quarles says William is an honest, trustworthy, and very intelligent negro, can read and write, and is somewhat acquainted with figures. This is William's account:—Being discharged from Drury's Bluff on Saturday night, on Sunday night, not knowing that his master (Mr. Quarles) had been driven from home, he unsuspectingly went down there, and was immediately taken prisoner by the enemy, who put a spade into his hand, and set him, together with one hundred and sixty other negroes, to work to bury the dead. The negroes worked all day, and gave assistance to the Yankee soldiers in the burial of two thousand men. William heard the Yankees say in conversation among themselves that their loss in killed in the two days' fight was between three and four thousand. This he heard repeatedly from different parties.

Besides the negroes at work, the Yankees had sixty who were kept tied. William asked why they were tied. The Yankees replied that it was for stealing; but our informant thought it was to prevent them from running off.

William saw a Confederate flag flying over a small house; and asking the meaning of its being suffered to remain there, was informed that the house was the prison in which all the "rebel" prisoners were confined. He asked permission to look into the house, but this was refused.

Sunday night, finding that he was not watched, the negro—who had from the moment of his capture determined to make his escape as soon as possible—stole off through the woods in a southerly direction; and without being hailed by a sentinel or picket, arrived by a circuitous route at General Mahone's headquarters, whence the General gave him a pass to this city. He reached here on Tuesday night. We have given this negro's story without addition or alteration; and if further testimony than his master's were not superfluous, we could cite the names of a dozen gentlemen who have assured us of his perfect reliability.

[From the Richmond Enquirer, June 6.]

The late two days' battle fought near this city is designated in the reports of the enemy, and is also known to some extent, at least, in our army, as the Battle of the Seven Pines. We have not been able to obtain a copy of a late Northern paper; but we learn that an official despatch has appeared from McClellan, claiming, as he did at Williamsburg, a brilliant and complete victory. Driven from their intrenchments—driven out of their camps—their cannon taken—their tents taken—their stores of all sorts captured—driven among the bullfrogs, and driven back where they tried to come out—500 prisoners taken, and saved from utter rout only because the bog protected them from pursuit—McClellan yet claims a victory. Surely he must be under an extraordinary pressure and necessity to make him thus sink all the instincts of manhood in the misrepresentations of the deliberate and habitual falsifier! When does McClellan propose to whip us again?

The following list of killed and wounded is taken from the Petersburg Express and the Richmond Enquirer:—

The following field officers were killed or wounded:—
Lieut.-Col. Copen, St. Paul's Louisiana battalion, wounded.
Col. Tennant Lomax, 3rd Alabama, killed.
Adjutant Johnston, 32d Alabama, killed.
Col. Champ. T. N. Davis, 16th North Carolina, killed and left on the field.

Adjutant Moore, 16th North Carolina, wounded.
The 16th North Carolina Regiment went into action immediately after marching double quick time for two miles, nearly exhausted with fatigue, and oppressed with heat. Col. Davis behaved most gallantly. He was wounded in the left arm so severely as to force him to abandon his horse. Upon slightly recovering the shock he started to leave the field, when he was shot in the back part of the head, the ball passing entirely through and coming out between and just above the eyebrows.

Assistant-Surgeon J. D. Martin, 14th Tennessee Regiment, killed.

Col. Edmunds, of the 18th Virginia Regiment, was wounded. His horse was shot.

Lieut.-Col. Whittle's horse was shot in three places.

Major Cabell's horse was killed just in front of a battery. The 38th has the colours of the 109th Pennsylvania Regiment.

Col. D. H. Christie, of the 23rd North Carolina Regiment, while leading his regiment, had his horse shot under him, and was painfully, though not seriously, wounded by the fall.

Lieut.-Col. R. D. Johnston received a severe wound in the head from a Minié ball, and had his horse shot under him.

Major E. J. Christian was mortally wounded; shot through the body, and had his horse shot under him.

Adjutant J. L. Ferry, of the 4th North Carolina Regiment, was wounded, and afterwards died.

Three colour-bearers were killed and four wounded in the same regiment.

Forty of the wounds received in this regiment are mortal.

Lieut.-Col. H. A. Carrington, of the 18th Virginia Regiment, was wounded.

General Pickens' brigade went into the action about ten minutes after the fight commenced on Sunday, between seven and eight o'clock, and remained until the last gun had been fired.

Major N. C. Wilson, of the 28th Virginia Regiment, wounded in the face.

Serg.-Maj. J. Harvey Phelps, of the 28th Virginia Regiment, had his arm shattered above and below the elbow.

Col. William Smith, of the 49th Virginia Regiment, was slightly wounded.

Lieut.-Col. J. C. Gibson, of the 49th Virginia Regiment, badly wounded.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The writer of this letter, a very old gentleman, dates from his plantation, a short distance from Charleston.

HALL, April 30, 1862.

MY DEAR A—,

Your letter dated March 12, from London, has just been received. I beg you not to think for a moment you are forgotten by me, for I have often wished to write you, but I heard that no letters reached you. What events have occurred since we last met, and how terrible for us the war of invasion which now rages! I never expect to see peace and happiness on this continent again in my day. Thank God I can report all well in our families. * * * * *

Your father is yet in Charleston; but since the fate of Palaski, and now of New Orleans, everyone is for leaving the city, and all the females will be gone in a short time. * * * For myself, I am here alone in my castle, with my loyal people around me, and as long as they will stick to me I shall stay here. I have lost none, and am here now the extreme outpost; all before me is abandoned; almost all our troops have been sent to the West and Virginia. We have only a regiment of Georgia infantry stationed * * * and a squadron of cavalry, who are also to move up to-morrow; so, you see, I may be run off by the Yankees on any night. We can concentrate, however, large forces here in a few hours if we are attacked. * * * * *

I am just about finishing planting my crops, chiefly of corn. We hear they are planting cotton, but it is a false rumour, obtained from Northern papers. The fall of the forts does not surprise me, as I saw some months ago it was inevitable, but I was not prepared for so formidable an artillery. Warfare is entirely changed, and old forts are not worth the materials they are made from. The bombardment of Palaski shook the windows in this house. All the harbours and rivers are the enemy's, or will be in a short time, and we shall have to concentrate large armies in the interior and fight as long as a man is left. McClellan, I fear, is only amusing Johnson on the Rappahannock, and will not give him a fight. We shall have to advance on them in some way. They keep their gunboats behind them, and these we cannot fight. * * * General Lawton and the Council of Savannah have resolved never to surrender the city. At Charleston they are again trying to strengthen, and have at last got their eyes open to the fact that M— is a dangerous place. This I have been preaching since the fall of Sumter. You must not think me desponding; I am not. We have two mighty armies in the field, led by skilful generals, and if the enemy will only give us a fair chance, you may hear of a very different state of things in a very few weeks. Unfortunately for us, the spring is a very wet one, and the western rivers high, which allows their gunboats full play. The North-Western boys are good fighters, and some of their regiments were almost entirely destroyed in the Battle of Shiloh. * * * Willie is in the —, stationed near —; he has hard duty, being on picket every other night in sight of the enemy. He had a narrow escape about two months ago (fortunately he was on a furlough), for his picket was surrounded (five men) by sixty Yankees. Our men fired their double-barrelled guns into them at twenty paces, and they returned the fire, killing two of our men. Their loss must have been large, for they went off, having had quite enough of the night's excursion. * * * * *

The — arrived about a week ago, with 6000 rifles and 1000 barrels of powder. The — has since arrived in Charleston, with 4000 rifles. I hope your vessels will get through, but they will have a narrow chance, for * * * * * Your uncle Henry's house has been burnt by the enemy. And now, good bye, my dear A—. Don't think we are going to give up this fight—never. Our people are more united and determined than ever; we can't give up, and we shall fight them to the death.

God be with you. Yours, affectionately, —.

C— reports officially to say we, (S. C.), have 39,271 men in service.

We are drinking cotton seed and rye coffee, and find it very good.

WILMINGTON, N. C., April 17.

* * * My regiment has seen its share of active service; we constructed and manned the batteries at —, which for five months so effectually blockaded the Potomac. We were constantly under fire, and the Yankees had some very fine guns of great range—Whitworth's, I think. I counted nearly 3000 shot and shell thrown at us from various sources, but our entire loss was but three wounded, none mortally, * * * Upon one thing you may rely, no matter what disaster occurs, the Confederates are banded together and most firmly resolved never to submit to Yankee domination—we will never live under the same Government, anything rather than that. All we ask of Europe is, to show us the same treatment they extend to the Yankees—to sell us arms as they freely do our enemies—to admit our ships to their harbours on the same footing as those of other nations, to refit and provision. We ask no aid, no recognition, and are content to endure the miseries of this most iniquitous war, its thousand hardships and privations, without a murmur, if we can but attain our end; our resolve to be our own masters is stern and unalterable. * * * Write to me, but not under a flag of truce; I will not be under the least obligation to anything breathing the breath of Yankeeedom.

Yours,

The following is an extract of a letter received from Maryland, published in the Liverpool Mercury :—

BALTIMORE, May 29.

We have had stirring times here, caused by the terrible defeat of Banks' army. You will notice that the Government will claim that the whole force under Banks was about 5000; this is false—we well know it here. I talked with officers and men who were on the spot in Banks' army. They say that his forces were between 16,000 and 18,000. On this fact you can rely. Banks crossed the river with less than 3000 men. He did not save a wagon or a gun, or a pound of stores. The forces of the Confederates have been variously estimated. They probably numbered 20,000 when they first attacked Banks, but as soon as they had created a panic in his army, and got them on the run, they left Ashby, with 3000 cavalry, to run them to the river, which he did in grand style.

You will notice by the papers what was the nature of the rout; Bull Run time is not to be compared with Banks' time. Since the world was made, no such time was ever made by a retreating army. Our city is now quiet, the mob rule has been put down, and we can safely pass through the streets. Many of our citizens have been badly beaten by the Pluguglies.

Foreign Correspondence.

PARIS, June 25, 1862.

You Londoners are not the only ones to complain of the bad weather. Even under the fair sky of France have we had so much rain, and such cold temperature, as to cause serious uneasiness about this year's crop. Some alarm was felt, under the circumstances, about the Russian incendiaries having begun their work amongst the wheat stores at Odessa. Did you notice a remarkable picture of Russian character in what took place at St. Petersburg a few days ago? The people, in perfect distress, and appalled at the organized system of incendiarism going on in their city, threw themselves in their Emperor's way, crying, "Father, behold thy children! Father, save us!" An impartial mind, attentive to the acts of Alexander II. since he sat on the throne of the Czar, must admit that the instinct of the Russian people is right, and that a liberal spirit of constant progress and useful improvement is exhibited in the land of Cossacks, whilst—what a lesson to the philosopher!—the once civilized United States of America are running back, under full head of steam, to barbarism.

Whilst talking of strange contradictions with the admitted characteristics of nations, who would have thought that a murderer condemned to death in France should have broken out of a French prison, as if it had been an Indiana county gaol; or that the austere "Cour des Comptes" should have to frown on such freaks as would become Cameron's or Welles' administration? The "Trélet de l'Eure," not content with 70,000 francs worth of furniture in his house, applied to its improvement another 49,000, which were destined to the enfants trouvés. St. Vincent de Paul, where are your successors! and it was only through an insignificant little item of 7000 francs, that a sale of 300,000 metres of ground from the Bois de Boulogne was discovered—how many millions of francs!

There has been a reasonable amount of gossip about who should command the fresh forces to Mexico. Count Palikao was much spoken of. If successful, the bâton de maréchal would have been a compensation for his failure to obtain the favour of the Corps Législatif. But the services of General Forey at Montebello have, it appears, been considered sufficient to secure him the preference.

On Sunday last, there was some brilliant racing at Fontainebleau, n'en déplaise to our sporting neighbours, and in the evening a magnificent ball was opened by their Majesties in the Salle de Henri II.; Strauss himself conducted the orchestra.

There is a man, M. A. Langini, who shows, in this remarkable age, a fine example of respect for those whose seat he next occupies. A theatre has been recently established at Pompei, where you know that the people were enjoying a theatrical performance, in the year of our Lord 79, when an eruption of the Vesuvius buried them alive. M. Langini is the manager of the new theatre, which, I earnestly hope, will not meet with a similar misfortune; and his circular announcing the reopening of that place of resort, is couched in these words:—"After having been accidentally shut up for 1800 years, our theatrical performances will begin again with the representation of "La Fille du Regiment." I am in hopes that the nobility and the citizens generally will not deprive me of the patronage which they bestowed on my predecessor, M. Quintus Martius, and I will spare no pains to follow in the steps by which he succeeded in making himself so popular."

I wonder if the same good feeling, in a contrary direction, would be shown by the Great King of the Huns to M. de Croy-Chanel. This son of Attila, whom the Siecle and other papers ejusdem farinae wished to oppose as a rival to Francis Joseph, is at Clichy, dil-on, for not having paid for the paper on which his royal claims were defended in print.

Duke Pasquier, who is restored to health, and who, with your Premier, is a fine example of vigorous seniority, has entrusted M. de Saint-Marc Girardin with the publication of his memoirs.

We were surprised here at the fresh exhibition of French newspaper correspondents in London. That some papers cannot afford to send over a better class of reviewers than Messrs. Assolant and Co., we can understand; but that La Patrie should publish such stuff as "the looking-glass standing in the Times office," "James Watt's remains being buried in Green Park," "Mr. Cruickshank converting himself into a Cruickshank Pantaloon to act second-fiddle to a Yankee speaker," and for a finisher (as General McClellan would say), the multiplied effects of light that St. Paul and Westminster have been producing upon a fellow in his cups, that Mr. Delamarre, who is very much of a gentleman, and knows England well, should allow such disreputable articles to appear in his sheet, seems almost incredible. The only way to account for it is that a French newspaper manager does not care for anything else but what is printed on the first page, and the rest of the paper is just filled up with anything, from the sea-serpent down to the reports on the Universal Exhibition.

Whilst an English paper has for its object to give all the information it can gather and it has room for, from all quarters of the world, a French paper desires nothing but to infuse partizan or clique opinions on the minds of its readers, and the whole of the talent it can dispose of is wholly spent on the "premier—Paris."

Such gentlemen as the English press employs abroad ought not to notice any more the French Correspondents. It is uncharitable to reprint their traits d'esprit, both as regards the public, and because it brings them to the very height of stultification, from believing themselves worthy of notice.

FROM AN ENGLISHMAN IN THE SOUTH.

To the Editor of THE INDEX.

KENTUCKY, June 10, 1862.

SIR—In my last, I restricted myself to a statement of what I conceived to be either positive facts, or fully justified inferences; but, as sequences, there arise in my mind, reflections, which, if not worthy of your notice, by being written will, at least, thus be matured, and made more profitable to myself. I may be pardoned for promising that for the last twelve years, I have been a silent, although not a thoughtless observer of political events. During sixteen years I have resided in the once United States, this period being about equally divided between a residence in the Northern and Southern portions thereof. The prejudices consequent upon my early associations and education, imbibed in my native land, were for a time serious obstacles to the formation of dispassionate conclusions. My ideas of slavery were associated with the lash and the chain, and I could not readily disabuse my mind of impressions which had grown with my growth, and had become a part of my very nature. I had not realized the magnitude of nature's great law—that of subjection. I had not studied the truths which science unfolds, and learned that the history of life has been the history of death. I had not recognized the ways of God, in placing one class of animals dependent upon another, from the lowest forms of animal life to the highest, and from the foundations of the world to the present time, with my ideas of His great character; and found it no easy task to be satisfied with the simplicity of the truth, that "His ways are not as our ways." But, sir, time and reflection have taught me some distinctions between reason and fanaticism, truth and falsehood, infidelity and faith. Professional duties, which for many years brought me into daily intercourse with both masters and servants, revealed to me no instance of inhumanity in the former, and but few of ingratitude in the latter. The moral status of the Southern slave I found infinitely above that of the Northern free black. And now, sir, with these remarks in parenthesis, if you please, I propose to proceed, and divine, if I may, the true causes which have induced the bloody war in which the two sections are now engaged.

A very general opinion obtains that it is a war for the abolition on the one hand, and the defence upon the other, of the institution of slavery, and some foreign Powers, apparently unaware of the true issues involved, are doubtless much influenced in their actions by accepting the correctness of this opinion. I am at a loss, however, to conceive how they can thus conclude, when such an object is distinctly disavowed and repudiated, and when it is well known that counter revolutions would manifest themselves speedily in the majority of the Northern States, if such a proposition were definitely made. But conceding the object of the Northern States to be as intimated, what philanthropist, what reasonable politician, here or elsewhere, is prepared to sustain them in their present mode of attaining their object, for if a love of the black race be the controlling motive, the practical question arises, whether or not their happiness would be augmented by freedom thus acquired; for, if any plan has been suggested, or provision made for them when free, I am certainly ignorant of it. The common dictates of humanity demand that they shall be provided for. Will the Northern States do so? No. Most of them will not even allow negroes to enter within their jurisdiction. Will such of them as are loudest in their expressed zeal do so? No; they could not if they would. What then? Shall the central Government declare them free and equal with the whites, and demand that States by statute shall not discriminate against them? Where then is State sovereignty? Shall we provide territories for them? What then? Territories only remain such until a period arrives at which their population and constitution entitle them to admission as States; and all the States are equal. This is legitimate reasoning. These are facts which may not be controverted. And who among us are prepared for such amalgamation? But, say some insane theorists, we will rid ourselves of them altogether. We will colonize them in Africa or elsewhere. Ah, then, yours is a war of hatred to them and for their banishment, not of love for them and for their improvement! And at whose expense will you make their paradise? Their own? They have nothing. Yours? You are already bankrupt. Their masters? Then yours is a war of subjugation, and you remove the yoke from the black man, to place it on the white. Another pretext brought forward in justification of the war is found in the assertion, that the rebellion is one of leaders only, who, by force of arms, have carried the seceded States with them; that the masses loved the old Union and only required the presence of the old flag, whose talismanic influence would rally them again around the nation's standard. Well, you have had eighteen months to test the truth of this question in, and have found it but a vague chimera.

Nay, more; you have yourselves declared against the right of States even to discuss this question. Its very mention was declared treason, and you have imprisoned the Legislature of Maryland for daring to moot it. Withdraw your armies to-day from Kentucky, Maryland, and Missouri, and they will pass ordinances of Secession to-morrow by overwhelming majorities. The press is no index of popular opinion. You have so subsidized or muzzled it that it has become a laughing stock, a hissing and by-word for foreign Powers. The establishment of newspapers with Southern names, by your army, is a ruse too well understood here to make your quotations from them of any value as indicative of Southern sentiments. Hence, if you have found yourselves self-deceived, would it not be magnanimous to confess your error and discontinue it? Would it not be simple justice to do so? By your unanimous complaints of the manner in which your armies are received, and the persistent insults to which they are subjected, you virtually do confess it; but yet your march is not retarded, neither is your ardour diminished. But the great rallying cry, which you have raised into the ears of an unthinking multitude, has been "The Union, the Constitution, and the Laws;" for you will know that the majority do not at first think, but act on impulse, just as in a thoroughfare one man may point intently toward the heavens, and soon engage hundreds in endeavouring to discover what he is pointing at. But what Union?—that of your fathers, founded in mutual interests and esteem, and having for its boasted basis “the consent of the governed?” This chain is broken in each and all its links. Can you imagine that it still retains its pristine strength, or do you think that fire and sword will weld its fragments? What Constitution?—that which you yourselves declare to be a league with death and covenant with hell? Surely you will not thus stultify yourselves. What laws?—those which you have yourselves abrogated—the right to trial by jury, and of Habeas Corpus? If not these, then show us the new Union, the new Constitution, the new laws, which you would have us support, and perhaps we will do so. No, gentlemen, you would not if you could. You could not if you would. And why? Because there exists an antagonism which you cannot adjust. Because, underlying this surface scum, you know that the whole secret of this war reposes in a silence that you cannot disturb, lest you might array a portion of yourselves against yourselves, and divulge your weakness to the world. The secret of that antagonism is found in envy, and in envy is also found the secret of this unholy war. Between the Southern planter and the Northern farmer there exists a gulf so wide and forbidding, that the latter could not pass to the former, and the former would not pass to the latter. The latter earns his livelihood by manual labour, the former by mental. The Southern planter has his hours of ease, and his servants remain at a respectful distance. The Northern farmer is constantly employed, and his servants are his equals, eating at the same table, and occupying the best rooms in his house. The Southern planter is also a traveller. He spends his money freely, and at hotels and watering places landlords, guests, and waiters pay him homage. The Northern farmer seldom leaves home, and when he does patronizes low-priced houses, or takes his luncheon with him. His daughters do not dance or sing, for they belong to some of the numerous “isms,” or “ites,” which have corrupted their neighbourhood. It may, therefore, be readily understood that their relative positions are widely diverse; and, since they are types of their respective sections, it follows that their sections must be diverse also. I have taken the agricultural representatives, because they afford these sectional distinctions most markedly; nevertheless we find the same relative difference pervading every class, not excepting the very slave himself, who pities, if he does not despise, the Northern nigger. This may seem strange to those not conversant with the character of the Southern slave, and such will discredit the statement that not only is this true, but he also feels himself above poor white men generally, but more especially the Irish labourer. All, however, who have lived among them know, as I do, that these are incontrovertible facts. Again, the Southerner loves liberty for its own sake. He is not radical, but distinguishes between democracy and red republicanism. No portraits of “Orsini” decorate the walls of his drawing-room, nor is he a stranger to veneration. He recognizes the code of honour, and acts upon it. The Northerner is not a coward, but by education he is taught to spurn the “code” as a relic of barbarism, and thus presumptuously, perhaps, stoops to vulgar epithets, and slander, and falsehood, and cringes and escapes under cover of his moral education.

In these and other wide dissimilarities are sown the seeds of that envy of which I have spoken in the one class, and of contempt in the other. It matters not that in this arguing both may be wrong. The fact itself is all I have to deal with, and, indeed, I might pursue these differences; but politically they resolve themselves into aristocracy and mobocracy, or, rather, these terms convey better than any other I can now command the prevailing spirit of the two sections. It matters not that in the South there is a sugarocracy, a riceocracy, and a cottonocracy, these are little distinctions among themselves. The two great antipodes are the Northerners and the Southerners, and for reasons intimated the former think the latter haughty, arrogant, dictatorial, contemptuous, and, worse than all, aristocratic. Hence is engendered that spirit of envy, hatred, and uncharitableness, which now finds vent in open hostility. Let financiers discuss the influence of the tariff question; and philanthropists, true or false, that of slavery; but for myself, I am satisfied, from long personal observation, that both of these, and especially the latter, could and would be willingly adjusted, if it were not for the causes indicated.

Having thus considered what I conceive to be the true causes of the war, its conduct next deserves attention, for it seems that even to this hour no definite rules exist regulating it. I am not a military man, and therefore do not distinguish infinitesimally between a state of war and one of rebellion, nor am I conversant with the niceties attaching to a recognition of contending parties as belligerents; hence I merely propose to speak upon the subject from what seems to me the stand-point of common sense and the dictates of common humanity. Nine millions of people on one side, and eighteen on the other, are armed in hostile antagonism, and seeking each others' lives. This, to my mind, is sufficient to induce the conclusion that there is a state of war. But, again, the contending parties are of the same colour, they speak the same language, they acknowledge the same God, they are intimately associated otherwise both by the ties of blood and marriage. How, then, should such a war be conducted? Surely upon principles which govern civilized nations. This will be conceded, theoretically, by the Federal Government, and be boisterously contended for when accusations of barbarity are made against their opponents; but, practically, it is denied.

I am not aware that any Christian people, under any circumstances, have heretofore denied the right of Christian burial to their adversaries. The high privilege was reserved for that people who claim to be God's vicegerents, and tyranny mocks liberty by emblazoning freedom upon the banner under which they commit their heinous outrage. The dead body inspires a sacred awe in all not lost to feeling; but it is reserved to the Federal army to spurn this womanish sensitiveness, and allow the bodies of Confederate dead to lie exposed for days, as at Pittsburg Landing, to teach, we presume, their willing troops what harmless things dead rebels are. The common impulses of humanity and policy alike have induced civilized nations to exchange prisoners; but one is almost justified in arguing, from the course of the Federal Government, that their army is made up of scum and scurf and foreign dregs, so they let them rot or die in Southern prisons. One Southerner is worth a dozen of them, and, arguing thus, they seem to act upon the premises drawn. The last question to which I shall advert will be, that in reference to the issue of the war. I wonder at those who talk calmly of whipping the South into the Union. Such are generally those who are reaping a rich harvest from the field of blood, or who have not any knowledge of Southern character. If the war is to continue until the South is subjugated, it will not end until the millennium. Rather than submit to the dictation of the Northern States, the South would gladly accept the protectorate of England or France.

I speak confidently upon this point, although I think that the erudite correspondent of the London Times was misled when he concluded, from this fact, that there was an abstract partiality in the South for monarchical institutions. They might, of two presented evils, choose the better, but it would not hence follow that either would be as acceptable as no evil at all. I grant you that in the South there is an admiration and reverence for England, while in the North one hears only virulent abuse of her people and institutions. Nevertheless, both sections are eminently republican in principle.

In endeavouring to devise a possible basis for an adjustment of our difficulties among ourselves, I find myself utterly incompetent even to conjecture one which might avail in the accomplishment of so desirable an end. A conservatism, in the North may manifest itself, but if so, will not the military power speedily crush out any demonstration of it? We all know how much easier it is to excite, than to subdue a military spirit. The tramp of martial hosts is the dead march of liberty. The history of the past asseverates this truth, and the present adds its bitter, bitter evidence in corroboration. Will a depleted treasury and general bankruptcy calm the madness of the party now in power, or wrest that power from them? No. So long as a steam press and ink and paper can manufacture the nation's wealth, and an oppressed people are compelled to accept the issue. Will any action of the South induce a peace? Will not the loss of her seaboard and borders compel her to yield? No; she foresaw all that, and sends the blazes of her cotton mountains high in answer to any such suggestion. She will retire inland, fighting as she goes, and looking back to the past year, and the 200,000 Northern victims of her strategy thus far, she will claim that as yet she has the advantage; but even if she had not, she would answer you with, “Liberty or death.” She will point you to the treatment of the Commissioners who she sent to Washington with the olive branch, and tell you the day for compromises has passed.

Since, then, we cannot settle this matter among ourselves, I hope and trust that God, in His wise Providence, will interpose a mediator of will and way, to command the peace in the name of Christendom and the Great Jehovah, and upon this basis—the basis of our Constitution; that which the North professes to fight for, and the South has never objected to—the consent of the governed.

ARREST OF THE HON. RICHARD B. CARMICHAEL.

JUDGE OF THE SEVENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT COURT OF MARYLAND.

(From the Eastern Star.)

Tuesday, the 27th day of May, 1862, will long be remembered as a memorable day in Easton. It was one of those terrible days, like the 19th of April, 1861, which will afford a theme for the historians centuries hence, if the providence of God should spare the world that long. We have never seen anything like it; we have never read of anything like it, not even in the civil wars of the Netherlands, under the blood-thirsty Alva and the determined Parma. The civil wars in England and France do not afford a parallel case. It was reserved for the free and Christian United States Government, upon the soil of Maryland, to enact a tragedy to surpass in atrocity the most infamous deeds recorded in history. The history of the affair is as follows: the truth of history and the misrepresentations that have been made concerning it, render it necessary that we should detail all the circumstances connected with it.

During the Fall of 1861, two companies of the 2nd Delaware Regiment of United States Volunteers, were stationed in Easton: under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Bailey. The companies were commanded by Captains Christman and Ricketts. While these companies were stationed here, a number of our citizens were arrested and imprisoned at their camp. These arrests caused great excitement and indignation in the community. A few days before the last November election, there was a political meeting at the chapel, about six miles from Easton. During the meeting there was some wrangling among a few men who had been drinking, but not more than is usual on such occasions. After the adjournment of the gathering, the Union speakers returned to town. That night a detachment of the military was sent to the chapel and arrested several Democrats, who were at the meeting. Being on the eve of the election, it necessarily increased the excitement in the county; but no resistance was offered to the military, our citizens showing a disposition rather to seek redress for their wrongs through the interposition of the law. In November, the court met, and Judge Carmichael charged the grand jury upon the law relating to illegal arrests. He recited the ten amendments to the Federal Constitution, showing that they were a shield to the citizen against arrest without judicial warrant.

The judge's address was subsequently published in this paper, and received the hearty approval of many Union men of the county. However, it was not to be expected that those who instigated the arrests should sanction it. They accordingly made a great hue and cry against the judge. The grand jury investigated the subject, and found bills against several, among whom was Henry H. Goldsborough, upon the testimony of William B. Clark, a Union man, for aiding and assisting in the arrests. Against this presentment much has been said by the Union men, but we cannot see how the grand jury could do otherwise with the testimony of Mr. Clark before them. After the adjournment of the court, things quieted down, and for a time the transactions of the previous fall seemed almost forgotten. In the winter, a detachment of the Home Brigade was stationed here, under the command of Major Kirby. These troops had not been here long before they commenced to arrest and annoy Democrats, after the example initiated by the 2d Delaware Regiment. This, of course, caused renewed excitement, but no resistance was offered, the aggrieved parties relying upon the law to punish the offenders.

These troops were subsequently removed from here, and the community became quiet. Upon the meeting of the court yesterday week the matter of illegal arrests was again called to the attention of the Grand Jury by the Judge, in the discharge of his duty under oath. In the conclusion of his charge to the jury, he asked the Clerk if the laws of the last session had been received, and receiving a negative answer, he stated that he had understood the law, styled the “Treason Bill,” had made it obligatory upon the courts to charge the jury specially upon its provisions, but not having the law, and not knowing its provisions, he could not do so; but if the laws should be received during the session of the court, he should then discharge his duty in that respect. The business of the court was then quietly transacted from day to day, up to one o'clock on Tuesday last, when the court was broken up and the judge arrested and carried off by the military. But we must go back a little, in order to give a connected narrative of the affair.

Mr. Goldsborough's case was marked for trial for last Monday. On the previous Saturday, Colonel Bailey, Captains Christman and Ricketts, and Lieutenant Guyer, all of the 2nd Delaware Regiment, came over from Baltimore in the steamboat, accompanied by the Deputy Provost Marshall, James L. McPhail, and the following assistants:—W. Cassell, John L. Bishop, Eaton Horner, and James Pryor. The arrival of McPhail and his party in town created considerable curiosity. It was known that the officers of the 2nd Delaware Regiment had been subpoenaed as witnesses for Mr. Goldsborough. At first it was conjectured that McPhail had come over to arrest the judge—then it was thought that he and his men might be only an escort to the military officers, to protect them from violence. We believe that, from the time of their arrival up to the arrest of the judge, the whole party was treated civilly by the community.

The judge intended to leave town on Saturday evening, but hearing it conjectured that they came to arrest him, he concluded to stay in town, in order that the arrest might be made with as little excitement as possible. We should have stated that presentments were found at last November court against all four of the above-mentioned officers of the 2nd Delaware Regiment, for illegally arresting and imprisoning our citizens. Writs had been issued for them and returned non est, and their cases had been postponed to the next term. As soon as they arrived in town, however, the clerk, without any order from the State's attorney, re-issued the writs, making them returnable on the following Monday morning. They were immediately placed in the hands of the sheriff and served.

Things remained in status quo from Monday until Tuesday noon, when it was announced that the Government steamer Balloon, was at Miles River Wharf, with troops on board. McPhail returned to town, and immediately proceeded to the court-room, where a civil case was being tried before a jury. A witness was on the stand at the time the officers entered to make the arrest. It being just at dinner time, there were but very few persons in or about the court room, except the jury empaneled in the case.

and the witnesses, and the lawyers engaged in it. Of course the military officers were at hand to assist McPhail, had there been any necessity for it.

THE ARREST.

About one o'clock p.m., the court being in session, and, as we have said, engaged in a civil suit between suiters, the jury empaneled, and a witness on the stand, with a few spectators present, McPhail and his subordinates entered the court-room, and proceeded to the judge's stand. He was heard to say something to the judge, supposed to be a notification of his arrest. The judge asked, "By what authority do you do it?" McPhail replied, "By authority of the United States' Government." The judge demanded to see his authority, whereupon McPhail turned around and attempted to adjourn the court. The judge told him "he did not commence the court, and he had no authority to adjourn it," and ordered him to take off his hat, which he did instantly. In the meantime Bishop had arrested J. C. W. Powell, Esq., the States' Attorney, who was engaged in the trial then pending before the court. Upon the judge's ordering McPhail to take off his hat, Bishop commenced to swear and grow boisterous.

The judge then called for the sheriff to preserve order in court. Mr. Wm. H. Shepard, the crier, immediately proceeded to the window and called loudly for the sheriff, whereupon he was assaulted and choked by Bishop, and told to cease calling for the sheriff. Shepard, of course, was silenced. In the meantime Bishop asked McPhail "if he would have the judge taken off his seat?" McPhail answering in the affirmative, Bishop seized the judge, and he and McPhail and the two others, who rushed in through the window behind the judge, commenced to choke him and beat him over the head with revolvers. He was dragged from his seat and beat and kicked in various parts of his body in a most brutal manner. He defended himself as best he could with his naked hands against their assaults; but what resistance could an unarmed man offer to five armed men who seemed bent on taking his life? He instinctively put up his hands to protect his head, and that was about all the resistance he offered, or he could offer, under the circumstances.

The statement that has been made, that the violence of the officers was provoked by the judge's kicking the marshal, is false. It was impossible for him to have kicked had he felt disposed, for he was seated in his chair, with his feet under his desk, and there was no room between the desk and the window for him to place himself in a kicking posture. There is barely room enough for the chair, with the judge's feet under the desk. We are thus particular on this point, as it is the only excuse that has been given for the violence.

The conduct of the marshal and his deputies was atrocious in the extreme. A part of them kept up a continual firing of pistol caps during the scene, in order to alarm the bystanders. Those that got up or came near the scene of conflict, were either struck or knocked down. Honourable John B. Kerr, late United States Minister to Nicaragua, and a leading Union man of the county and State, for protesting against their killing the judge, was struck over the head with a revolver and knocked down. He received a very ugly wound.

John L. Hopkins, Esq., the foreman of the jury, and a good Union man, got his head badly cut. Mr. Perry W. Steward, j.n., another Union man, was struck over the head with a heavy weapon and badly cut. Messrs. Joseph V. B. Wright and Jacob Woolen both received severe blows. Wm. H. Bostie, one of the bailiffs of the court, was assailed with great ferocity. Wm. H. Nabb, who at the time was in the court yard, made for the court room, was met on the steps, knocked down and most dreadfully beaten. A pistol was fired at him, and his life was only saved by the timely arrival of Lieutenant Guyer, who made the officer desist. Several pistols were fired in the court room, and percussion caps innumerable. As soon as the court room was cleared, Judge Carmichael, all dripping with gore, was taken to the Register's office below, where his wounds were dressed by Dr. Edward Jenkins. In the meantime A. A. Pascualt, Esq., one of our citizens, was arrested on the Court House Green, and taken with the other prisoners to the Register's office. There was great excitement and indignation among the citizens, but no resistance or retaliation was offered. What resistance could unarmed citizens offer to such a party had they felt disposed to resist? None whatever.

Soon after the arrests were made, Major Andrews, with two companies of the 2d Delaware Regiment, arrived from the steamboat, and remained for some hours, when the battalion escorted the prisoners to the boat. A number of our citizens were cursed and abused upon the Court House Green by the man Bishop, who appeared eager to provoke a general fight. He made no distinction between Union men and others—all alike received a share of his vulgar tongue, the Union men getting the most of it.

We forbear extended comments upon these high-handed proceedings, as our readers have all doubtless expressed themselves respecting them in much stronger terms than we feel at liberty to use. We never heard or read of a judge being dragged off the bench during a civil trial, and brutally beat and mangled by a set of ruffians, who assumed to act in the name of the law. The case is without a precedent. If they had in them one spark of regard for law, the office and the place, if not the man, should have restrained them from the commission of such unheard of violence. For his object was to disgrace the judge, they signally failed—for his proud spirit never flinched, and he preserved his personal dignity to the last, and only yielded after the assault, to superior physical force.

The judge and his fellow prisoners, Messrs. Powell, Nabb, and Pascualt, were that night taken and confined in Fort McHenry, where they were at last accounts.

Our citizens, though excited and indignant, behaved with prudence and forbearance. Had they behaved otherwise, we have not a doubt that the town would have been given up to destruction. Bad as the affair was, we are heartily glad that it was no worse.

NEGLECT OF BRITISH INTERESTS.

The following is an extract from a letter dated "Havannah, May 24," which has appeared in the columns of a contemporary:

The public prints will doubtless give full details of the robbery of the Dutch consulate and the personal indignities to which the consul was subjected. The $60,000 dollars stolen belonged to the House of Amsterdam, and was placed for security in the Consulate by Mr. Forstall. The French and Spanish Consuls were both threatened, and their consulates surrounded by troops, but they were saved from a similar fate by the presence of a French vessel of war opposite the city. The English acting consul seems to be a nonentity, for he makes no attempt to shield British subjects, who have been unlawfully incarcerated and put to hard labour with chains on their legs. The representatives of other countries appear to be acting with great vigour: not so the acting British Consul. In fact, the numerous British subjects resident in New Orleans are left without any protection whatever.

In such a crisis there should have been English men-of-war in the port, for it was known months ago the place was to be attacked; instead of which, one large ship, the Liffey, was sent there, and lay off the bar for something like a month, but the captain neither went to the city nor did he send any of his officers, although it is well known here that he and his officers were offered a passage on board the French gunboat Milan, which did go up to New Orleans. I blame the Government more than the captain of the Liffey. His ship could not cross the bar, and was entirely useless where she lay. A smaller vessel that could have crossed the bar should have been sent with her; but it seems that, notwithstanding England has the largest and most extensive fleet in the world, the Government had not even a small gunboat to spare for the protection of British subjects in the only place in the world at the moment where British subjects require protection, and for want of such protection have suffered, and are now suffering, indignities which are shameful. It is a disgrace to the nation that such a thing should be, and it is a further disgrace that at this moment, and for weeks past, British commerce has no protection in these waters. For weeks past, British vessels engaged in lawful commerce between neutral ports, and in neutral waters, are being daily boarded and fired into with shot and shell by American cruisers. These waters swarm with them, and they pay no more respect to the English flag than they would to a piece of dirty rag on the mast-head of a fishing smack. Numerous captures of English vessels have been made during the last six weeks, without a shadow of right. In fact, the Yankee fleet really blockade this port, and have it all their own way. Englishmen at home would naturally think that under such a state of things, and especially after the Trent affair, Great Britain would have a few cruisers in these waters; but I regret to say there is not one, nor has there been for weeks past. Perhaps the Government is afraid that if it had vessels of war here some English building would not submit to see the flag of his country daily outraged without using his teeth. Can you not get some one to represent the matter properly? I write only facts, and such facts ought to be brought before the House of Commons. I am obliged to close this hurriedly, &c.

THE SURRENDER OF NEW ORLEANS.

The following correspondence relates to the surrender of New Orleans. The letter of the 26th April, alluded to by Captain Farragut, was the communication in which the Mayor declared the city yielded "to brute force," and that no one in New Orleans could be found to hoist the enemy's flag.

The Common Council in New Orleans was convened in joint session, on the 27th April, when the Mayor sent to that body the following message, accompanying the above communication from the Commander of the Federal Fleet:

MAYORALTY OF NEW ORLEANS,
City Hall, April 28, 1862.

GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMON COUNCIL:

Herewith transmit to you a communication from Flag-Officer Farragut, commanding the United States' fleet now lying in front of this city. I have informed the officer bearing the communication that I would lay it before you, and return such answer as the city authorities might deem proper to be made.

In the meantime, permit me to suggest that Flag-Officer Farragut appears to have misunderstood the City of New Orleans. He has been distinctly informed that, at this moment, the city has no power to impede the exercise of such acts of forcible authority as the commander of the United States' naval forces may choose to exercise; and that, therefore, no resistance could be offered to the occupation of the city by the United States' forces. If it is deemed necessary to remove the flag now floating from this building, or to raise United States' flags on others, the power which threatens the destruction of our city is certainly capable of performing those acts. New Orleans is not now a military post; there is no military commander within its limits; it is like an unoccupied fortress, of which an assailant may at any moment take possession. But I do not believe that the constituency represented by you or by me embraces one loyal citizen who would be willing to incur the odium of tearing down the symbol representing the States' authority, to which New Orleans owes her municipal existence. I am deeply sensible of the distress which would be brought upon our community by a consummation of the inhuman threat of the United States' commander; but I cannot conceive that those who so recently declared themselves to be animated by a Christian spirit, and by a regard for the rights of private property, would venture to incur for themselves and the government they represent, the universal execration of the civilized world, by attempting to achieve, through a wanton destruction of life and property, that which they can accomplish without bloodshed, and without a resort to those hostile measures which the law of nations condemns and execrates, when employed upon the defenceless women and children of an unresisting city.

Very respectfully,

JOHN T. MONROE, Mayor.

After considering the above message and communication, the Common Council in joint session adopted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the views communicated by his Honor the Mayor to the Common Council, respecting the answer which it behoves the city of New Orleans to return to the ultimatum of Flag-Officer Farragut, meet the unreserved approbation of this Council, and embody their own views and sentiments, and the Mayor is therefore respectfully requested to act accordingly.

S. P. DELABARRE,
President pro tem. of Board of Ald.
J. MAGNON,
President Board Asst. Aldermen.

Approved April 28, 1862.

A true copy

JOHN T. MONROE, Mayor.

M. A. BAKER, Secretary to Mayor.

The following is Capt. Farragut's reply to a communication of the Mayor:—

U. S. FLAG SHIP HARTFORD,
At anchor off the city of New Orleans,
April 28, 1862.

To his Honor the Mayor and City Council of the city of New Orleans:

Your communication of the 26th inst. has been received, together with that of the City Council.

I deeply regret to see, both by their contents and the continued display of the flag of Louisiana on the Court-house, a determination on the part of the city authorities not to haul it down. Moreover, when my officers and men were sent on shore to communicate with the authorities, and to hoist the United States flag on the Custom house, with the strictest order not to use their arms unless assailed, they were insulted in the grossest manner; and the flag which had been hoisted by my order on the Mint, was pulled down and dragged through the streets.

All of which go to show that the fire of this fleet may be drawn upon the city at any moment, and in such an event the levee would, in all probability, be cut by the shells, and an amount of distress ensue to the innocent population which I have heretofore endeavoured to assure you that I desired by all means to avoid.

The election is therefore with you. But it becomes my duty to notify you to remove the women and children from the city within forty-eight hours, if I have rightly understood your determination.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) D. G. FARRAGUT,
Flag-Officer Western Gulf Blockading Squadron.

After having considered the above communication, the Council declared its determination not to recede from the position it had requested the Mayor to assume in his previous communication addressed to Flag-Officer Farragut.

The following is the Mayor's reply to Capt. Farragut's communication of the 28th ult.:—

CITY HALL, NEW ORLEANS,
April 29, 1862.

To Flag-Officer D. G. Farragut,
U. S. Flag-ship, Hartford.

Sir,—Your communication is the first intimation I ever had that it was by "your strict orders" that the United States' flag was attempted to be hoisted upon certain of our public edifices, by officers sent on shore to communicate with the authorities. The officers who approached me, in your name, disclosed no such order, and intimated no such design, on your part; nor could I have for a moment entertained the remotest suspicion that they could have been invested with such powers to enter on such an errand, while the negotiation for a surrender between you and the city authorities were still pending. The interference of anyone under your command, as long as these negotiations were not brought to a close, could not be viewed by me otherwise than as a flagrant violation of those courtesies, if not the absolute rights which prevail between belligerents under such circumstances. My views and my sentiments, with reference to such conduct, remain unchanged.

You now renew the demand, made in your former communication, and you insist on their being complied with, unconditionally, under a threat of bombardment within forty-eight hours; and you notify me to remove the women and children from the city that they may be protected from your shells.

Sir, you cannot but know that there is no possible exit from this city for a population which still exceeds in number one hundred and forty thousand, and you must therefore be aware of the utter inanity of such a notification. Our women and children cannot escape from your shells, if it be your pleasure to murder them on a mere question of etiquette. But if they could, there are but few among them who would consent to desert their families and their homes, and the graves of their relatives in so awful a moment. They would bravely stand the sight of your shells, rolling over the bones of those who were once dear to them, and would deem that they died not ingloriously by the side of the tombs erected by their piety to the memory of departed relatives.

You are not satisfied with the peaceable possession of an undefended city, opposing no resistance to your guns, because of its bearing its doom with some manliness and dignity; and you wish to humble and disgrace us by the performance of an act against which our nature rebels. This satisfaction you cannot expect to obtain at our hands.

We will stand your bombardment, unarmed and undefended as we are. The civil world will consign to indelible infamy the heart that will conceive the deed and the hand that will dare to consummate it.

Respectfully,
JOHN T. MONROE, Mayor.

THE ARREST OF BRITISH SUBJECTS IN NEW ORLEANS.

We subjoin the official protest of our Consul, General Butler's reply, and our Consul's rejoinder:—

BRITISH CONSULATE, NEW ORLEANS, May 8, 1862.]

Sir,—Mr. J. J. Burrows, a British subject, and who lately commanded a company composed entirely of British subjects, organized to comply with the law of this State, has informed me that, at your request, and in conformity with an order from Brigadier-General Juge, he appeared before you yesterday for purposes which I shall have the honour to state in my communication, and he begs my interference in behalf of himself and of the other British subjects concerned. Mr. Burrows states to me that you informed him that every member of the British Guard must report to you, with uniforms and arms, and those failing to do so must leave this city within twenty-four hours, or be sent to Fort Jackson. It has come to my knowledge within the past two days, and I am given to understand that you are in possession of information to the same effect, that some members (a minority of the whole) of the company of British Guard, believing that the duty which had been imposed upon them by the law of this State was at an end, and their services no longer required, a short time prior to the occupation of this city by the military authorities of the United States, sent their arms and equipments—their own private property, I believe—from the city, to whom or where Mr. Burrows is unable to inform me. For this reason it will be impossible for them to report to you as soldiers—a character in which the British subjects now in question have never been desirous of showing themselves in the existing strife in this country.

It is not my intention in this communication to shield my countrymen in the step they have taken, for it may be construed as a breach of that neutrality imposed by her Majesty on all her subjects; but if it is looked upon in that light, I feel convinced that they, when they took such action, were ignorant of the importance that might be attached to it, and did it with no idea of wrong or harm. It may not, sir, be irrelevant for me to mention that I much regret to hear that the position of British subjects in this city as neutrals should have been questioned or doubted. When the militia law of this State was enforced by the authorities, requiring all men between eighteen and forty-five, who were in the State, to perform militia duty, I was compelled to oppose the law, and informed the Executive of this State that the service imposed upon British subjects was contrary to the law of nations, and placed them beyond that neutral position which had been enjoined upon them by their Government. This was partly at the instance of many British subjects, and conjointly done with the Consuls of seven other European Governments. In consequence of our action, the United States' authorities, on taking possession of this city, found that the city was, to a great extent, in the charge of the foreign corps, and they were performing a service allowed by their own Governments, and one deemed incompatible by either belligerent. Consequently, it is scarcely reasonable to suppose that, after so strongly opposing the militia law for fear of losing or violating their rights as British subjects, they would voluntarily and knowingly place themselves in that unpleasant position which they have for many months carefully avoided. As I have had the honour to state above, and for the cause mentioned, it will not be possible for some of the British subjects, who were members of the British Guard, to obey the verbal order of questionable legality given to Mr. Burrows, that they should report to you as soldiers; and it would become my duty to solemnly protest in the name of Her Majesty's Government against the alternative stated by you, the enforcement of which would infringe the rights of British subjects residing in the United States. I have the honour to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE COPPELL,
Her Majesty's Acting Consul.
Major-General B. F. Butler, United States' Army, Commanding Department of the Gulf, &c., New Orleans La.

HEAD-QUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
NEW ORLEANS, May 11, 1862.

SIR,—I have your communication of May 8. With its evasion of fact I have nothing to do. A plain statement of the matter is this:—A number of residents of this city who have enjoyed the protection and advantages of the United States' Government in their large trade and property for many years (some of them more than a decade), and now claiming to have been born subjects of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, organize themselves into a military body, known as the "British Guard," and armed, uniformed, and equipped, patrolled the streets till the fleet of the United States' had the city under its guns. This body then, after a discussion in presence of its captain and at least one other officer, at eleven o'clock at night, deliberately voted in an organized meeting to send the arms and uniforms of the company to the army of the rebel General Beauregard, which vote was carried into effect, by sending to the rebels, substantially, all the arms, uniforms, and equipments in their armoury. This transaction was concealed from me for some days. I then sent for Captain Burrows, and he acknowledged the facts materially as above stated. In this flagrant breach of the laws of nations, of the United States, your Queen's proclamation, and the laws of God, I directed him to order his company to leave the city within twenty-four hours. To this he objected, saying, among other things, that this would be punishing the innocent with the guilty, as there were some members absent at the time of the vote; that each soldier of the Guard owned his arms and uniform as private property, and it would be hard to compel those to leave the city who still retained their arms and uniforms, and did not concur in the vote. I then modified the order, directing those to report to me who still retained their arms and uniforms—all others, having forfeited all rights of neutrality and hospitality, to leave the city within twenty-four hours, or I should have them arrested and sent to Fort Jackson, as dangerous and inimical persons. These people thought it of consequence that Beauregard should have sixty more uniforms and rifles. I thought it of the same consequence that he should have sixty more of these faithless men, who may fill them if they choose. I intended this order to be strictly enforced. I am content for the present to suffer open enemies to remain in the city of their nativity, but law-defying and treacherous alien enemies shall not. I welcome all neutrals and foreigners who have kept aloof from these troubles which have been brought upon the city, and will, to the extent of my power, protect them and their property. They shall have the same hospitable and just treatment they have always received at the hands of the United States' Government. They will see, however, for themselves, that it is for the interest of all to have the unworthy among them rooted out; because the acts of such bring suspicion upon all. All the facts above set forth can easily be substantiated, and, indeed, are all exclusively admitted in your note by the very apology made for them. That apology says, that these men when they took this action—sent these arms and munitions of war to Beauregard—"did it with no idea of wrong or harm." I do not understand this. Can it be that such men, of age to enrol themselves as a military body, did not know that it was wrong to supply the enemies of the United States with arms? If so, I think they should be absent from the city long enough to learn so much international law. Or, do you mean to say that, knowing their social proclivities, and the lateness of the hour when the vote was taken, therefore they were not responsible? There is another difficulty, however, in these people taking any protection under the British flag. The company received a charter or commission, or some form of rebel authorization from the Governor of Louisiana, and one of them, whom I have under arrest, accompanied him to the rebel camp. There is still another difficulty. I am informed and believe that a majority of them have made declarations of their intention to become citizens of the United States, and of the supposed Confederate States, and have taken the proper and imperative oaths of allegiance to effect that purpose.

Thus far you will do me the honour to observe, that I have treated your communication as if it emanated from the duly authorized Consul of her Majesty's Government at this port. The respect I feel for that Government leads me to err, if at all, upon the side of recognition of all its claims, and those of its officers; but I take leave to call your attention to the fact that you subscribed yourself "Her Britannic Majesty's Acting Consul," and that I have received no official information of any right which you may have so to act, except your acts alone, and pardon me if I err in saying that your acts in that behalf, which have come to my knowledge, have not been of such character as to induce the belief on my part that you rightfully represent that noble Government. I have the honour to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER, Major-General Commanding.
To George C. Coppel, acting as her Majesty's Consul at the port of New Orleans, La.

BRITISH CONSULATE, NEW ORLEANS, May 31, 1862.
SIR,—In answering your communication of date the 11th inst., it is my intention to confine myself to a correction of errors in your statement of facts.

The British Guard was organized under the general call for service from all residents within the ages which give legal exemption, and as the least obnoxious form in which, as neutrals, they could comply with (Major-General B. F. Butler, United States' Army, Commanding Department of the Gulf, &c., &c., New Orleans) the requisition. The privileges asked for them, and with some difficulty obtained, limited their service to the lines around the city proper. From the time it was ascertained that a portion of the United States' fleet had passed the forts until its arrival before the city, the public mind was disturbed by apprehended violence at home, and the city authorities called upon the foreign brigades, of which the British Guard formed part, to suppress any such attempt. Their services were, from that moment, those of an armed police, which were by yourself and by Commodore Farragut gratefully acknowledged. After several fatiguing days and nights passed in the fulfilment of these duties, between the hours of two and three o'clock in the morning (not eleven, as you have it), the guard left their stations and returned to their armoury to deposit their arms, considering that their mission was at an end, and that they were no longer wanted. Their existence as an organized body had virtually ceased. One, or it may be two, officers were in the armoury, returning with the rest. No meeting was either called or held; there was no voting beyond the few, not exceeding fifteen, with whom the measure originated; no formal announcement of the proposal to dispose of the arms was ever exhibited. Some of the members left the armoury ignorant of any such proposition, though there when, in desultory conversation, among others it was made and agreed to. It was the resolution of the moment, hardly to be characterized as a deliberate act, and the impulse which prompted it, it seems to me, can be reasonably referred to feelings which would actuate men whose friends and former companions were with the forces to which the arms are asserted to have been forwarded. The number of muskets did not exceed thirty-nine, if all were sent, for I am assured that there never was the number you have given (sixty) in the armoury. These facts are verified by all who can speak from personal participation in the whole or parts of them. The British Guard comprises gentlemen who have large responsibilities entrusted to their charge, and whose absence from the city would result in irreparable injury to the interests confided to their care; and whose word may be received with every confidence as vouchers for the verity of the above statement. The injustice of an order which includes those parties to the act, and those who were not, requires no explanation on my part. I have before observed that it is not my wish or intention to justify the act; my object is to explain its real import, and to diminish the importance which, unexplained, it bears upon its face, by stripping it of features which do not properly belong to it. With reference to that part of your communication which has relation to myself, I would merely add that I furnish, in proof of my official capacity, letters addressed to me, and signed by Earl Russell and Lord Lyons, which, as part of my official register, I must request may be returned to me; and that I am not aware that my accountability for the manner in which I may have fulfilled my duties extends beyond the source from which that authority emanated, and to which your letter will of course be forwarded in all its crudity. In conclusion, I would say that Mr. Burrows, to whom I had exhibited my last communication before sending it, now says that he did tell you that the arms were intended for General Beauregard, but that he could not, from his own knowledge, state whether they were actually forwarded. Referring to my last communication, I have the honour to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

GEORGE COPPELL,
Her Britannic Majesty's Acting Consul.

THE DESTRUCTION OF COTTON.

The Montgomery (Ala.) Advertiser states that there are about 50,000 bales of cotton in Montgomery, which will be burned on the approach of the enemy. The same paper publishes these orders:—

OFFICE ADJUTANT AND INSPECTOR GENERAL A. M.,
MONTGOMERY, ALA., May 8, 1862.

SPECIAL ORDER No. 29.—1. The large amount of cotton in the city of Montgomery renders its removal to a safe distance a work of time. Circumstances may render it necessary to destroy it before such removal can be effected. To avoid endangering the city by burning, all the cotton which cannot be removed to a safe distance will be removed to the warehouse known as "Gunter's Warehouse."

2. The Railroad Companies are hereby ordered to arrange by Monday next to use all their transportation power, save such as may be required for the service of the Confederate Government, to assist in transporting the cotton which owners may prefer to take from the city.

3. The officer charged with the execution of this order is hereby directed to press into service all the public drays of the city, save such as may be required for the service of the Confederate Government, to aid in transporting cotton from the warehouses in the city to "Gunter's Warehouse," the steamboat landings, and railroad depots.

4. Colonel Wm. H. Chambers, Special Aid-de-Camp, is charged with the execution of this order.

By order of
JNO. GILL SHORTEN,
Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

H. P. Watson, Adj. and Insp. Gen.

NOTICE TO OWNERS OF PUBLIC DRAYS.

All the public drays of the city are required to remove the cotton, under the military order of the Governor. The owners of licensed drays, except those employed in the service of the Confederate Government, will send them to Schar and Audis' warehouse, at six o'clock on Monday morning next, where they will report to Mr. J. G. Maxwell.

WM. H. CHAMBERS, Aid-de-Camp.

NOTICE TO OWNERS OF COTTON.

I have been informed that, in some instances, parties have removed cotton from the warehouses to their private premises. I hereby give notice that no cotton will be permitted to remain where it will endanger the city; and unless it is forthwith removed, it will be removed, under the military authority, to a place where it can be burned without destroying the city.

WM. H. CHAMBERS, Aid-de-Camp.

RICHMOND, Friday, May 2.

To Maj.-Genl. M. Lovell:—

The following despatch was sent to you on the 25th ult.

A. T. BLEUSOE,

Assistant Secretary of War.

"It has been determined to burn all the cotton and tobacco, whether foreign or our own, to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy."

"You will therefore destroy it all if necessary, to prevent them from getting it."

(Signed)

G. W. RANDOLPH,
"Secretary of War."

The Richmond Whig of May 21, says, editorially:—

The patriotic work of destroying the staple, in order to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy, is still going on with unimpaired unanimity. The Vicksburg Citizen learns that on Sunday, the 11th inst., 20,000 bales were committed to the flames between that city and Greenville. Some 9000 bales have been destroyed between there and Grand Gulf. Judge Perkins, alone, consigned 1300 bales to the flames. The Vicksburg Whig says: "We learn that cotton all along the river, as high as Napoleon, is being burned. Between here and New Orleans the flames have devoured it. A gentleman who came down the river yesterday in a skiff from Napoleon, informs us that the river was almost one mass of burning cotton. The cotton from Napoleon down has all been burned. He also says it was reported that a few planters who hauled their cotton back and hid it in the cane had been imprisoned."

A planter informs us that he saw the negroes on a plantation above this city shed tears when the cotton was being fired. It is very hard to destroy the labour of a whole year, but it is a necessity that cannot be helped. There will, no doubt, be a quarter of a million of bales burned on the Mississippi and tributaries, worth 12,000,000 dollars at ordinary prices.

The Charleston Mercury, of May 14, publishes the following circular, which, it says, is "the deliberate expression of probably the largest, wealthiest, and most influential class of the citizens of New Orleans," and says, also, that "for reasons that will be manifest to all," no signatures are attached to it:—

TO COTTON PLANTERS.—New Orleans has fallen, not degraded or enslaved, but yielding to armed ships with guns levelled at the homes of our defenceless wives and children. The escutcheon of Louisiana is unstained, and her flag has been desecrated but by her enemies. None could be found among us so vile, low, or degraded, as to lower her national insignia. We have yielded to brute force but for the moment.

It becomes now the duty of all planters to display, more than ever, their patriotism and devotion to their country. They have sealed that devotion upon the battle field. Now let us fight our enemies, as well by burning and destroying every bale of cotton upon the river or rivers liable to capture, as well as refusing to overship or sell a bale of cotton until peace is declared and our nationality is fixed. Let their conquest be a barren one.

The merchant fleets of Europe and of Yankeeedom will soon be bringing their riches among us to trade with us, expecting an exchange of cotton. If commerce is once revived we are enslaved for ever. Let Europe howl at the waste the barbarity of the North will have brought upon the country. The United States' Government has promised renewed trade to the world so soon as our ports are opened. If we are true to ourselves, there will be no trade, and the countless millions of foreign products will be without purchasers. How long will they remain idle spectators of such a scene? The Powers of Europe will see that there is no sentiment of regard for the old flag—that we despise the race; and when we withhold or destroy our property, they will find that Unionism is dead for ever.

The Raleigh State Journal says:—"An officer of the Confederate army who is engaged in this most important duty, tells us he burned not less than 1553 bales for two persons alone, Messrs. Wm. Grimes and P. Atkinson. He has already burned almost all the cotton at or near the water-courses, in Washington county, Pitt, Martin, and other counties, visiting the plantations even in the interior. He assures us he was aided in this patriotic work cheerfully by the owners themselves, except in one case only. But as a set off to this case, in another, the owner, Pulaski Cowher, Esq., had his burned, though the boat was at the landing to take it off. Not only the cotton has been burned, but large quantities of naval stores. The Buccaneers of the North got absolutely nothing in occupying Washington. This is the true way to defend ourselves. If the Buccaneers get nothing they will soon cease their marauding invasion of our country."

THE POLICY OF THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT IN REGARD TO THE REBELLION.

Notwithstanding the recall of Bull Run Russell as correspondent of the London Times, because he had been kicked out of all the Union camps and ejected from all decent society, in which for a while he was allowed to exhibit his snobbishness, there is no doubt that the secession tone which characterizes his letters was dictated by the managers of the Times. This fact is manifested by the reasons given for the discontinuance of Mr. Fickerman as the American correspondent. He was informed that it is the policy of the Times, and its owners, to speak favourably of the rebellion and to disparage the Federal Government, with a view to promote, as much as possible, a division of the United States. No doubt is entertained by those who have opportunities to know, that the private instructions to the correspondents of the Times show it to be unmistakably a staunch supporter of the rebels and their cause. For this reason it is desirable that their American correspondent should remain incognito. There is reason to believe that not only the Times, but influential parties connected with the British Government, have been, since the commencement of the rebellion, anxious for an opportunity to recognize the Southern Confederacy, and take the part of the rebel leaders. They have waited to long. If the war had been less vigorously prosecuted by the Federal Government, and the rebels had not been signally defeated at all points until the rebellion has been actually brought to its last gasp, there would have been imminent danger of British interference. As it is, the opportunity has been lost. Great Britain is already involved in an embryo difficulty with France, growing out of the conduct of the triple occupation of Mexico, and the Government has avowed the Mistress of the Seas by an exhibition of its inexhaustible resources and its vast power on land and sea.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through Henry Horze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered as his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, JUNE 26, 1862.

No News.

PUBLIC curiosity has been disappointed by the steamer arrivals of last week. The imaginative Halleck has not yet discovered the whereabouts of Beauregard; and McClellan, for prudential reasons still stops short within a few miles of the rebel capital. Is not this an eloquent, though silent, comment upon the boasted triumphs of the Federal arms? Is it not a singularly suggestive circumstance that brilliant victories always seem to paralyze the Northern commanders? Halleck's lieutenants gained a brilliant victory at Shiloh, and thereupon he immediately set to work to fortify himself in front and in the rear; and when he had pushed his fortifications, at the rate of a few feet per day, up to the lines of his "defeated" enemy, he finds those lines abandoned the enemy whom he so cautiously approached having gone no one knows whither, several days before, and taken with him the last gun, all his stores, and the last sick man in his hospitals. McClellan gained a brilliant victory at Fair Oaks, driving the enemy before him at the "point of the bayonet," and inflicting "enormous loss;" and yet he lies perdu, clamoring for reinforcements, within a few miles of Richmond, in a swamp, where his army is dying of slow fevers. Truly the faith must be great which still kindles bonfires, and chants Te Deums over the bulletins of the War Department at Washington.

It is now over three months since General McClellan, amid the derision of the world, returned to Washington from his grand advance upon Manassas, to find an easier road to Richmond. Since then let us balance the gains and losses of the campaign in Virginia. Detained before Yorktown until the Confederates had completed their interior defences, he comes up with the retreating enemy at West Point and Williamsburg, each encounter costing him the destruction of a division of his army. The iron-clad fleet, which was to support him by water, is repulsed, with a loss estimated by the Federals themselves at not less than 1500 men. Thus crippled, he summons his lieutenants to his assistance. One of them is suddenly attacked, and driven headlong across the Potomac, with the loss of all his stores, and half of his army in killed, wounded, and prisoners. And for a moment it is Washington, not Richmond, that trembles for its safety. Another, hastening to retrieve the disaster, rushes into defeat scarcely less disheartening. McClellan himself, when in sight of his coveted prize, has one of his divisions surprised and annihilated. Score up the tallies of those bloody battle-fields—West Point, Williamsburg, Fort Darling, the rout of Banks, the blow to Fremont, and the bloodiest of all before Richmond—and, by the Federal count, the cost amounts to upwards of 30,000 men, probably full one-fifth of the armies which were to concentrate upon Richmond. And these are the casualties of battle only, and do not include the hospital records, by which that number, under the lowest estimates, must be swelled to at least one-half more. These figures, were the full truth known, would doubtless reach even more fearful proportions. But here we have, by their own confession, an army thrice decimated within three months. Could the most successful defence against invasion have done more? could the most disastrous reverse have been more fatal? At this rate, the Federal army, though it were reinforced by the contingent of all Europe, would disappear like a shower falling upon a desert, before two of its columns, marching from opposite directions, could meet each other in the heart of the country to be conquered. It seems as though the world would not allow the Confederate the credit of victory unless they smote their opponent as the Destroying Angel of the Lord smote the host of the Assyrians. Yet we find it difficult to recall an instance of a better planned and more successfully executed defence against an invader, superior in numbers, resources, and appliances of war, than the last three months' campaign in Virginia, the results of which, to the Confederates, have been to reduce their enemy to two-thirds of his effective strength, and to enrich themselves by the much-needed spoils of many well won battle-fields. What have been the net results to the invader? Not one of the objects of the invasion is yet attained; no position has been gained which may not be lost again by the hazard of a single battle. They are nearer Richmond, but not nearer to its conquest than when the contending armies faced each other before Manassas. We, at this distance, find it difficult to imagine how the Confederates could have done more, or the Federals less.

In the West the condition of Halleck's army appears even more critical than before. It can neither advance nor retreat. In leaving its fortifications it runs the risk of being suddenly attacked at a disadvantage by an enemy who hovers unseen around it. In its rear a storm is brewing which threatens every moment to burst over it. A numerous army is concentrating in the mountain fastnesses of Eastern Tennessee; Kentucky is said to be fast ripening into revolt. A blow is impending—from what quarter it will come it would be vain to speculate, even if we had the information which Halleck so sorely needs. What we may confidently rely upon, from the antecedents of the wary general opposed to him, is, that the blow will come when least expected, and fall with fatal precision.

The interest is absorbed by the two great armies in the East and West, leaving only a secondary importance to the other operations on the vast theatre. In New Orleans General Butler appears to be quietly awaiting the arrival of the yellow fever, from the deadly clutches of which he himself has already prepared a refuge at a neighbouring summer resort. At Mobile no progress had, at last advices, been made by the Federal fleet, though it seems improbable that this city can much longer delay the fate of its sister port. At Savannah and Charleston the Federal Commanders need further reinforcements. How their needs can be supplied, as well as the more imperious ones of Halleck and McClellan, is difficult to conjecture, after such repeated drains upon the military population of the North. Meanwhile gold is steadily rising in New York; the cotton of the South, with which it is hoped to pay the great national debt, is burning, or rotting from exposure to the weather; the alarm has been sounded against the further issue of irredeemable paper; but the Federal Government at Washington, and the mob of which it is the puppet, heed not, and in their self-conceit are deliberately planning another war by land and by sea.

Are the Confederates Rebels?

ALL great political catastrophes appear at the time the sudden freak of some inexplicable and mysterious chance. Posterity, at a later period, perceives and traces in the dim distance the chain of events of which they were the concluding link and inevitable sequence, and wonders that so obvious a result of obvious causes should have taken the world by surprise when it occurred. But it is a law of our nature, that the immediate present and its promises, rather than the past with its warnings, should engross our attention, and fill our narrow scope of vision. Just as the French Revolution startled mankind as from a dream, though we, a half century later, can see the seeds planting, germinating, and maturing, which brought forth such terrible fruit—so the revolution which rent asunder the American Union, and in its convulsions endangers the prosperity and peace of all civilized nations, appears to us a phenomenon beyond human foresight and comprehension, though to posterity its causes will seem as intelligible as its effects. To posterity the full explanation must needs be left; yet it is not a hopeless task, even at this time, to attempt the solution of some, at least, of the mysteries in which it seems shrouded.

We have so accustomed ourselves to regard the United States as a marvel of rapid growth and unprecedented material development, that we failed to realize practically the hollowness of that dazzling prosperity and the rottenness of the fabric on which it rested. We have so accustomed ourselves to view this agglomeration of self-governing States as a unit, that we utterly lost sight of the irreconcilable differences of national character and interests which it concealed. A ferocious war of fifteen months' duration has revealed these in a lurid light, and we already wonder that we could have been blind to them so long. But this does not explain what sudden spark fired this latent hostility into so furious a blaze. The causes and objects of the war are still imperfectly understood, because the relative positions of the antagonists, both before the war and now, are not clearly defined to European minds.

When, on the 18th day of February, one year ago, the Chief Magistrate elect of the new-formed Confederacy of States took the oath of office, he said:—

It is by an abuse of words that our act has been denominated Revolution. The States here represented have formed a new alliance, but within each State its Government has remained. The rights of persons and property have not been disturbed. The agent through whom they communicated with foreign nations is changed, but this does not necessarily interrupt their international relations.

In the sense in which the word "revolution" is familiarly used, the successful uprising of a people, or a part of a people, against their constituted Government—a direct popular act directed against immediate superiors—Mr. Davis is assuredly right in saying that the word cannot apply to the act of Secession. In that broader sense, in which the word is made to indicate any great political change, of which foreign nations must necessarily take cognizance, history will doubtless apply the word to the event which founded two great Powers in the place of one. The reinstatement of an exiled monarch, the dethronement of another, an alteration of the dynastic law of inheritance—acts which have been exercised by the British Parliament, though with the sanctity of established law and usage, and without direct interference of the people, are yet acts so grave in their consequences, so rare in occurrence, so dependent for their justification on a great national emergency, that by common consent they are denominated revolutions. The act to which President Davis referred, was somewhat analogous. Secession was not a popular act; it was the act of the several State Governments, exercised according to the forms of law and usage. The States ceased to be members of the Union in precisely the same manner, and with the same formality, that they had entered. In other words, the withdrawal was a repeal, by the same authority which had enacted it, of that law on their statute books by virtue of which they became partners to the Federal compact. The annals of history present no instance of a similar revolution (for such history will nevertheless call it) accomplished without popular commotion, and without the abrogation of a single law binding on the individual citizen.

The question now naturally arises to whom the allegiance of the citizens was owed,—whether to the State Governments, or not rather to the Federal authority as the lord paramount. Europeans have been prone to consider the American States as mere governmental departments designed for the more convenient administration of an unusually extensive territory,—departments to which, indeed, large powers of local government were conceded, but which derived those powers from the central authority, and exercised them under the supervision and by the consent of that authority. The whole theory of the Federal Constitution is diametrically opposed to this assumption. It expressly affirms that the Federal Government is formed by the States, that it has no powers save those delegated to it by the States, and that all powers not so delegated are reserved to the latter. A few facts in practice are worth all the deductions of theoretical argumentation. Let us see whether or no these corroborate the assertions of President Davis.

In all countries, the idea of eminent domain attaches to complete sovereignty. The Federal Government of the United States had no eminent domain, except such as was at various times conceded to it for specified purposes, such as the grant of land by Virginia and Maryland for the purpose of building thereon a Federal capital. It could not even erect a fort, or an arsenal, or a dockyard, without obtaining from the State within whose territory the proposed site lay a cession of the same, and paying, therefore, a stipulated price. In all countries, also, justice is administered in the name of the sovereign authority. The tribunals of the United States had no jurisdiction outside of the limits of the grants thus ceded, except in cases of dispute between citizens of different States, or between States themselves; over its own agents, officers, and employés, and over offences committed on the high seas and such navigable waters as were the common property of all the States. Each State over its own citizens was the sole and supreme judge. In each State the tribunals exercised their functions in the name of the State, or commonwealth, or people, according to the adopted formula of its Constitution. A citizen of any State could not be tried for offences committed in another, and could be surrendered to the authorities of another State only with the consent of the chief executive of his State. A man might be a citizen of a State without being a citizen of the United States; and vice versa. That is to say, the naturalization laws of many of the States varied from those of the Federal Government, and persons might be electors and eligible to State offices without being so to Federal offices. On the other hand, each State prescribed for itself the conditions of citizenship; and a person might be a citizen of the United States without fulfilling these conditions in any one of the States. Again, each State was at liberty to alter, modify, or change its Constitution at its pleasure, so long as it remained Republican in form, for this condition alone had the States imposed on themselves and all future new-comers when they framed the Federal compact. With this reservation the State Constitutions might differ, and did differ, in the most essential features. It is one of the most prevalent errors of Europeans to lose sight of this fact, and to mistake the Constitution of the United States for the real political institutions of the country. This Constitution applies to the States alone, and only very indirectly to the citizens. With many faults, it is yet an admirable model of well-balanced Republicanism, which, however, nearly all the States have long since forgotten in the wild race to Democracy. For instance, in the Federal polity, only the chief executive and the legislature are elective, and its judiciary are appointed for life; while in too many of the State Constitutions every office, judicial or ministerial, is a prey to the vagaries of universal suffrage. This striking difference between the Federal and the State politics, which latter alone bear on the daily life and public morals of the people, is another instructive fact in our investigation. Without dilating on numerous others, a few more facts will suffice to demonstrate that no direct relations obtained between the people and the Federal Government of the United States. The highest branch of the Federal Legislature, the Senate, was filled by the several State Governments without any intervention of the people whatever. In the lower, so-called popular branch, the State is theoretically represented in the ratio of population; but even there it was left to its judgment by whom and in what manner its representatives should be chosen, and no numerical apportionment could violate the sanctity of its boundary, and jeopard its integrity as a self-governing State, though its entire population were but one tithe of the constituency of a representative in a larger State. The only other elective functionary of the Federal Government was its Chief Magistrate. Nothing can more strongly prove the amazing ignorance of Europe on American affairs than the fact that many of the most intelligent European statesmen have yet to learn that the President of the United States was, at no period of their existence as a Government, either in theory or practice elected by the direct vote of the people, but by the States as such. Each State had a number of votes equal to its aggregate representation, in both the houses of the Federal Legislature, and exercised the undisputed right to select those who were to cast its votes, either by universal suffrage, or, as in the case of South Carolina, by its Government. The progress of Democracy had made the former the universal practice, with the single exception named, and by an evasion of a constitutional clause the electors were always committed beforehand to designated Presidential candidates, but through these electors the State voted, not the people of the United States. The practical effect is obvious. A Presidential candidate might obtain the majority of State votes, and thus be elected, without having a majority of the popular vote, because a mere plurality would cast the whole weight of a great State like New York and Pennsylvania in the scale for him. This was the case, indeed, with President Lincoln, who, though every Northern State gave its vote for him, obtained but a little over one-third of the entire popular vote cast, and thus, by his very election, affords the most conclusive proof of that independence of State action to trample on and destroy which he has devoted his official career.

These facts—the verification of which is within every one's reach—can leave no doubt as to the relative positions of the States to the Federal Government. The war in America, then, is not a war between a people and their Government. It is a war between States, in which the people who are called rebels obey the same and the only lawful authority which they knew and obeyed in time of peace. In no sense, therefore, except in the bitterness of hate which it has engendered, and the brutality by which it is marked can it be termed a civil war. Whether the causes of quarrel between the warring States justify so disastrous a mode of settlement, and with whom rests the responsibility of provoking it, are questions to be treated separately. Our object has been to direct the reader's attention to the true character of the war, and the broad distinction which must be drawn between men fighting in the name of constituted authority under which they were born and reared to manhood, and men who abjure that authority upon any pretext, whether ill or well founded. The latter are insurgents, and may be termed rebels until success has made their pretext good. The former are engaged in defending what is nearest and dearest to them, and engaged in the discharge of a duty which mankind honours as patriotism and loyalty. Let any man who loves home and country decide for himself which of these characters apply to the people of the Confederate States.

We have spoken of the United States as in the past, because that portion of them which still retain the name and the alliance which it designated have sacrificed to a mad fury the political theories and practices which were the life of the Union. Virtually they are now a huge consolidated despotism or democracy, which amounts to the same, and any description of the United States as they were cannot apply to them. If the world needed proofs of the injustice of their present undertaking, it might find them in the violation of every private and public right, in the falsification of all former professions and principles, and the glaring inconsistencies with the past which became necessary to initiate and prosecute it.

Pickwickian Threats.

THE deference felt for the great principles of national self-government, and for the action of the people, when supported by the imposing forms of state organization, is so powerful that "the universal practice and usage of the present century has," to use the expression of M. Thouvenel, "fully established the right of de facto Governments to recognition, when a proper case is made out for the decision of Foreign Powers." With each Power, undoubtedly, rests the exclusive right of judging for itself, independently of the parties engaged in the contest, of the existence of the conditions necessary to constitute a de facto Government, and of determining what it considers a proper case calling for its decision. Though, we admit, no precise time has been fixed upon by the general principles of international law when such a decision should be made by existing Governments, "the laws of equity," says M. Fourcix, one of the most eminent professors of international law (in his "De la Reconnaissance Officielle des Etats Constitués de Fait") "require that they should act friendly towards a new-born Government, and greet her as a sister entering into the great society of nations. A denial of recognition would be a disregard of all rules of equity and humanity, and would but sanction the power of brutal force to overrule law and right."

We do not pretend to deny that prudence may sometimes recommend not to hasten or precipitate a recognition, for history furnishes examples of Governments disappearing as soon as they were organized; but when a Government is firmly established and supported by the unanimous will of a people determined to endure all the hardships and to confront all the dangers of war, when that people has shown its capacity to oppose to an invading foe an army of upwards of 400,000 men—and such is the case with the Confederate States of America—there can be no possible excuse for refusing it the benefit of recognition, unless, perhaps, this recognition exposes the Government granting it to a war endangering its own safety. These premises are so self-evident that they need no comment. We will, therefore, proceed to examine whether, in extending to the Confederate States a recognition to which international usage and courtesy entitle them, England would incur any risk whatever of being drawn into a war with the United States.

A close examination of the diplomatic records of that country will satisfy the most timorous mind that no such danger is to be apprehended from the present Administration of Washington. These records will demonstrate most conclusively that, taking advantage of the well-known unwillingness of the European Powers, and especially of England, to disturb the peace of the world, Messrs. Lincoln and Seward have, from the outbreak of the American difficulties down to the present period, resorted to a policy of intimidation to check the friendly disposition of Europe towards the Confederate States. They will further prove that, notwithstanding the arrogant and insulting tone of their diplomatic intercourse with foreign Powers, they have invariably construed their threats in a Pickwickian sense, whenever any foreign Government put their hostile intentions to the test. As early as April 10, 1861, Mr. Seward had inaugurated this intimidation policy, which, it must be painfully confessed, has proved but too successful for the commercial interest of the world. His despatch, No. 2, bearing date April 10, to Mr. Adams, United States' Minister at London, says:—

You will, in no case, listen to any suggestions of compromise by this Government, under foreign auspices, with its discontented citizens. If, as the President does not at all apprehend, you should unhappily find her Majesty's Government tolerating the application of the so-called Seceding States, or wavering about it, you will not leave them to suppose for a moment that they can grant that application and remain the friends of the United States. You may even assure them promptly, in that case, that if they determine to recognize they may at the same time prepare to enter into alliance with the enemies of this Republic.

You alone will represent your country at London, and you will represent the whole of it there. When you are asked to divide that duty with others, diplomatic relations between the Government of Great Britain and this Government will be suspended, and will remain so until it shall be seen which of the two is most strongly entrenched in the confidence of their respective notions and of mankind.

Despatch No. 4, April 27, 1861, reads thus :—

When you shall have read the instructions at large which have been sent to you, you will hardly need to be told that these last remarks of his lordship's are by no means satisfactory to this Government. Her Britannic Majesty's Government is at liberty to choose whether it will retain the friendship of this Government, by refusing all aid and comfort to its enemies, now in flagrant rebellion against it, as we think the treaties existing between the two countries require; or whether the Government of her Majesty will take the precarious benefit of a different course.

You will lose no time in making known to her Britannic Majesty's Government, that the President regards the answer of his lordship as possibly indicating a policy that this Government would be obliged to deem injurious to its rights and derogating from its dignity.

Despatch No. 10.

Washington, May 21, 1861.

Intercourse of any kind with the so-called commissioners is liable to be construed as a recognition of the authority which appointed them. Such an intercourse would not be the less hurtful to us for being called unofficial; and it might even be more injurious, because we should have no means of knowing what points might be resolved by it. Moreover, unofficial intercourse is useless and meaningless, if it is not expected to ripen into official intercourse and direct recognition. It is left doubtful here whether the proposed unofficial intercourse has yet actually begun; you will in any event desist from all intercourse whatever, unofficial as well as official, with the British Government so long as it shall continue intercourse of either kind with the domestic enemies of this country.

It is direct recognition to receive its ambassadors, ministers, agents, or commissioners, officially.

A concession of belligerent rights is liable to be construed as a recognition of them. No one of these proceedings will pass unquestioned by the United States.

The belligerent rights of the Confederates were recognized, and unofficial intercourse held with their commissioners, without Mr. Seward or Mr. Adams deeming it expedient to construe these instructions rigidly. We come now to the case of the Sumter.

Despatch No. 112, October 29, 1861, contains the following passages :—

In view of these facts, it becomes my duty to instruct you to inform the British Government that the President deeply regrets that Lord John Russell is altogether unable to give to our complaint a satisfactory solution.

When it is considered how important a part commerce plays among the interests of our country, it will be seen that the United States cannot consent that pirates engaged in destroying it shall receive shelter and supplies in the ports of friendly nations. It tends to the universal derangement of commerce when piracy is anywhere tolerated, and therefore its suppression is a common interest of all civilized countries. But if any Power fails to preserve this interest, and to act for the common welfare, then it is easy to see that each State must provide for its own security, at whatever cost, and however it may disturb the general harmony of the commercial world.

This Government will consider how its safety must be secured.

This threat having failed to produce the desired effect—that is to say, the refusal of shelter to the Confederate war vessels—England was favoured with another communication of Mr. Seward, No. 122, bearing date November 11, in which he says :—

Great Britain, as we are given to understand by the answer of Earl Russell, allows these pirates to visit her ports, and stay at their own pleasure, receiving supplies without restriction.

We find it difficult to believe that the Government of Great Britain has constituted this exception with full deliberation. I intimated in a preceding despatch, No. 112, a hope that the subject might be reconsidered before it should be necessary for us to consider what remedies we can adopt to prevent the evils which must result to our commerce from the policy thus indicated by Great Britain.

Mr. Seward had time to devise remedies; but he does not appear to have thought it prudent to apply any, except new, and equally harmless, threats.

The incidents accompanying the seizure of Messrs. Slidell and Mason are fresh in the mind of every one. No one has forgotten the eulogies passed upon the bravery displayed by Captain Wilkes in attacking an unarmed vessel; every one recollects the resolutions of Congress endorsing the brutal assault of that officer, voting to that would-be hero a sword of honour, and recommending to the President not to surrender the persons of the commissioners; the official endorsement of the act by the Federal Secretary of the Navy; all of which proceedings were immediately followed by a prompt retraction and shuffling apologies, so soon as it became apparent that Great Britain could not be overawed by threats.

But is that all? Similar arrogant threats were made to the Netherlands Government, with regard to the shelter accorded to the Confederate flag in the port of Curaçao; threats followed by like retraction when proved unavailing. The Sumter having been received in the port of Curaçao, and permitted to coal there, Mr. Seward addresses the Government of the Netherlands as follows, in his despatch to Mr. Pike, No. 15, dated Washington, August 15, 1861 :—

You are instructed to bring this matter immediately to the notice of the Government of the Netherlands. The subject of damages for so great a violation of the rights of the United States will be considered when we shall have properly verified the facts of the case. In the meantime, you will ask the Government of the Netherlands for any explanation of the transaction it may be able or see fit to give. You will further say that the Government of the United States, if the case thus stated shall prove to be correct, will expect, in view of the treaties existing between the two countries and the principles of the law of nations, as well as upon the ground of assurances recently received from the Government of the Netherlands, that it will disown the action of its authorities at Curaçao, and will adopt efficient means to prevent a recurrence of such proceedings hereafter. The United States will expect that the Governor of the Island of Curaçao will be promptly made to feel the severe displeasure of the Government of the Netherlands.

Despatch No. 24, October 4 :—

We therefore hope for satisfactory explanations. But, in any case, you will inform the Government of the Netherlands that the United States will expect them to visit the authorities of Curaçao with a censure so unreserved as will prevent the repetition of such injuries hereafter. An early resolution of the subject is imperatively necessary, in order that the Government may determine what is required for the protection of its national rights in the Dutch American ports.

Despatch No. 26, October 17, 1861 :—

With these remarks, I proceed to notice Baron Van Zulen's communication. You will reply to him that the United States unreservedly claim to determine for themselves absolutely the character of the Sumter. The United States regard that vessel as piratical, and the persons by whom she is manned and navigated as pirates.

The United States, therefore, cannot admit that the Sumter is a ship of war or a privateer, and so entitled to any privileges whatever, in either of those characters, in the port of Curaçao, nor can they debate any such subject with the Government of the Netherlands.

Should it determine to consider the Sumter otherwise, and not be able to place the conduct of the Governor-General at Curaçao in a better light than it has already done, it will become necessary to consider what means we can take to protect, in the ports of the Netherlands, national rights which cannot be surrendered or compromised.

To this extraordinary document, Mr. Van Zulen makes the following reply, October 29, 1861 :—

The Hague.

You regret that the Government of the King should have adopted the same treatment towards the war vessels of the Seceding States and those of the United States.

Without here entering into an extended discussion, rendered, moreover, almost superfluous by my two preceding communications, I shall merely permit myself, sir, in referring to their contents, to cause you to observe, that agreeably to the doctrine of the best publicists, neutrality imposes upon those nations which desire to enjoy its benefits a complete abstention from all that could establish a difference of treatment between the belligerent parties, and that this principle applies as well to the cases of civil war, or even of rebellion, as that of an ordinary war.

Your Government having expressed the desire that measures should be taken to prevent a prolonged stay in our ports of the Sumter or other vessels of war of the Seceding States, we have admitted the justice of the claim; but these measures shall apply to both parties.

What follows is almost incredible. In his despatch, No. 31, to Mr. Pike, dated November 11, Mr. Seward says :—

I learn from it that the Government of the Netherlands has made an order which will, it is hoped, practically prevent the recurrence of such countenance and favour to pirates in the ports of that State as we have heretofore complained of. You will express to Baron Van Zulen our satisfaction with this proceeding.

It is needless to cite further. The diplomatic notes interchanged between the United States and France, and Brazil; the voluminous diplomacy of Mr. Seward, from the first day of his taking office to the present hour, all prove the same fact—a trembling fear of foreign intervention, concealed under boastful threats, which were no sooner uttered than retracted, whenever challenged to make them good, but which served the double purpose of amusing the morbid vanity of the mob at home, and of imposing, in too many cases, upon foreign credulity or timidity. It is impossible that the truth should have escaped the scrutinizing minds of Earl Russell and Lord Palmerston. It is, therefore, idle for the Government to withhold from the Southern States the benefits of recognition, upon the plea that it may involve England in a war with the United States.

Financial Prospects of the United States.

A MERCHANT, whom we will call Mr. Jones, finding himself going to the bad, unhesitatingly convened a meeting of his creditors, made a full disclosure of the state of his affairs, and paid a dividend of sixteen shillings and elevenpence three farthings in the pound. After completing this operation he began the world afresh, and gave a small order to a late creditor who had profusely complimented him upon his honourable conduct. To the surprise and disgust of Mr. Jones, he received a formal intimation that the proffered business was declined, except on the hard terms of cash on delivery. The illused gentleman partook himself to the manufacturer, and reminded him that he (Mr. Jones) was an honest man, and had paid sixteen shillings and elevenpence three farthings in the pound, and that Mr. Smith, whose reputation was not altogether untainted, and who had paid only one shilling and sixpence in the pound, had been trusted to a large amount by the firm which had refused him (Mr. Jones) a trifling accommodation. The manufacturer made a very logical reply to this appeal. "My dear sir, I am sure you are honest, and that you divided your last sixpence among your creditors. I have a very poor opinion of Mr. Smith's honesty, and I am convinced he made a lump of money out of his compromise with his creditors. Now, my dear sir, if we trusted you, your honesty would not pay our bills at maturity; whereas, though Mr. Smith is rather a shifty customer, since he has the means we have a fair prospect of compelling him to redeem his obligations."

The above passage from the unpublished history of commerce is, to a certain extent, applicable to the discussion now going on in reference to the financial position of the United States. Granting, for the sake of argument, that the threats of repudiation are no more to be regarded than the menaces of the New York press to whip all creation within a week after the South is subjugated, and the Southerners driven into the Gulf of Mexico, we come to the all-important question as to the ability of the United States to pay its creditors. Our line of argument is, we admit, extremely unpoetical, but, at least, it has the merit of being practical and substantial.

According to the statement just issued by Mr. Chase, the public debt of the United States amounted, on the 29th of May last, to 491,448,984 dollars; but this is one of those ingenious balance-sheets which may tell the truth as far as it goes, but does not tell the whole truth. Mr. Chase's account does not include a large amount of paper money authorized to be issued, and which, ere this, has been put into circulation; nor does it include the debts due to States for advances made in raising regiments; or the Government responsibilities in respect to uncompleted contracts; or the bounty money due to the soldiers on the termination of their service. We may, therefore, without indulging in unfounded speculation, assert, that when Mr. Fessenden, on the 6th inst., informed the Senate that the public debt, on July 1, would be 700,000,000 dollars, instead of exaggerating, he understated the indebtedness of the United States.

But we have before us only the first instalment of the cost of the attempted subjugation of the South. The war is still going on, and its speedy termination, however desirable, is beyond the range of probability. As the war progresses, it increases in expensiveness, and the North is likely to be gratified by having a public debt vastly "bigger" than that venerable and greatly misunderstood institution—the National Debt of England. How the United States is to pay the debt it longs for, the friends of the North have not thought proper to inform us. When the question is asked, we are referred, in a blustering tone, to the English National Debt, and asked why the United States should not be able to bear a burden which has certainly not proved a hindrance to England, even if it has not, as some persons think, largely benefited her. We will endeavour to show that there is not the remotest analogy between the incidents, and therefore the results of the two cases; and this we may do in a single paragraph.

The English debt was of comparatively slow growth. In a single year the United States has contracted as heavy a debt as we did in a hundred years. The United States has mortgaged the property it may realize in the course of a century: England only spent from year to year her accumulated profits. The United States is engaged in the manufacture of paper money, which, at best, can only be regarded as drafts upon an uncertain future: England only used money actually in existence. The United States has her commerce paralyzed by the costly contest in which she is engaged: England, during the Continental war, did not suffer any loss of trade, but, on the contrary, by reason of her maritime supremacy, enjoyed a profitable monopoly of the commerce of the world; and, notwithstanding her enormous expenditure, instead of becoming poorer, her riches increased. We repeat, England spent her accumulated profits: the United States has spent, and is spending, her prospective profits.

We defy any one to indicate the whereabouts of the gold, or of the property convertible into gold, that is to redeem the United States' obligations. Sooner or later a financial collapse must take place; but we think it probable that, though the crash cannot by any possibility be ultimately averted, it may for some time be postponed. It is true the United States will not be able to get pecuniary assistance from abroad, because if any trust her integrity they are deterred from aiding her by the consciousness of her inability to meet her engagements; it is true that almost every steamer that leaves New York carries away a portion of her remaining and inadequate stock of bullion; it is true the financial bubble may burst at any moment: but it is not less true that the evil day may be put off, and national insolvency may be preceded by national pauperism.

There is a potent element of disturbance which we have not noticed. Besides the Government paper money, there is an unlimited issue of private bank paper money, which is, perhaps, more commercially valuable than the Government issues, because it is not made an enforced currency, but which is equally unrepresented by gold. At the most moderate estimate, the issue of private bank paper money is twice as great as the issue of Government paper money. Mr. Lincoln and his coadjutors view this with alarm, but their position is so critical that they dare not take any effective measures to check it. If this circulation of unredeemable private bank paper money does not precipitate the impending catastrophe, it will, when the fiat of national bankruptcy is struck, make the ruin felt in every homestead in the Union. The facts we are dealing with are indisputable, and the conclusions we deduce, however startling, must be, and are, endorsed by every financier in Europe.

The partisans of the North, who are as careful as the friends of the South not to invest in Federal securities, may twit us with the high price of United States' stocks and the depreciation of Confederate notes. But we reply, that the first is no proof of confidence or wealth, nor the latter of distrust. What is a citizen of the United States to do with his Treasury notes? He cannot purchase with them foreign merchandize. At home he cannot invest them in real property, for no man will part with his real property for inconvertible paper. There is no other investment for him than the public stocks, and since the public stocks and the floating debt rest upon the same security, there is no objection to change the one for the other. This is the main cause of the buoyancy of the stocks—a buoyancy which, under the circumstances, affords no tangible ground for Federal rejoicing. The reason of the depreciation of the Confederate notes is, that the Confederate Government has not made them an enforced legal tender; and they have, therefore, fallen to their legitimate value. The avowed financial position of the South, however gloomy it may appear, is infinitely better than the unreal, inflated position of the North. The former is at the worst, and any change will be an improvement; the latter is placed in a false position, and must have a downfall. Or, to put it in homely language, the finance of the Confederate States is commercially honest, and the finance of the United States is a huge sham.

Amongst the desperate remedies of the North we may class the suggested duty on cotton. We do not mean that the proposed duty, or a much higher duty, would disable the Southern planter to cope with the Indian grower. Even if India had no more profitable production than cotton, a duty of 15 per cent. on the export of American cotton would scarcely place the Indian grower on an equality with his American competitors. But the absurdity is, that in this year of grace, 1862, when the principles of free trade are so well understood, it should be imagined that an export duty on produce increases the wealth of the country. It would, of course (supposing any cotton should be shipped under the control of the United States' Constitution) bring a revenue to the Government. But who pays the revenue? The foreign buyer? No. As Mr. Bright can well explain to his Northern friends, an export duty is a tax paid by the producer, not by the purchaser. Suppose American cotton was bartered for English iron, if an export duty of 5 per cent. was levied on cotton, 5 per cent. less iron would be given for a bale of cotton. Price is governed by demand and supply, and not by legislation. If the South were still an integral part of the Union the North would gain by a duty on cotton, because it would, virtually, be a tax levied on the South; and if the South had not left the Union the unfair burden would, no doubt, have been imposed. We may also remark, that though the duty would be a tax upon the producer, it would to some extent impede the development of the cotton trade, inasmuch as enhanced price diminishes demand.

It is often assumed that the financial position of the United States will incline the North to put an end to the war; but it should be remembered that the North has no other hope of escape from bankruptcy than by conquering the South, and confiscating the property of 8,000,000 of people. It is an utterly desperate chance, but preferable to no chance at all. It needs great moral courage to meet a difficulty that can be temporarily postponed. If the recognition of Southern independence would pay the debts of the Union, it would, perhaps, induce the termination of hostilities, but inasmuch as the failure to subdue the South means national and individual ruin, we cease to wonder at the continuance of the hopeless and wicked struggle. A financial crisis may necessitate peace; but so long as the ultimately inevitable collapse can be avoided, the enormous indebtedness of the United States is a strong and irresistible incentive to carry on the war.

THE reader will find elsewhere a most interesting summary of the railway statistics of the Confederate States. It is copied from the United States' Economist, a Northern publication of established reputation, in which it appeared some eighteen months since. Several important links have since been completed, even since the outbreak of the war, but not of sufficient extent to materially affect the figures given, which may be relied upon as minutely accurate. From this the reader will learn, with surprise, that not only does the South compare favourably with most European countries in the extent of railway constructions, but it has actually surpassed its Northern competitor within the last eleven years. The reason why securities of this kind have occupied so small a place in the financial market of the Northern States and of Europe is that, with comparatively few exceptions, the Southern railways were not built with borrowed capital, but with the local subscriptions of the districts which they traverse, and the self-imposed taxation of the cities which form their principal termini.

GENERAL Halleck's famous despatch upon the evacuation of Corinth stated:—

For miles out of the town the roads are filled with arms, haversacks, &c., which have been thrown away by his fleeing troops.

We now present our readers with an account sanctioned by the Federal Government:—

[Approved by the Military Supervisor.]

Special Despatch to the New York Tribune.

CORINTH, Saturday, May 31, 1862.

Via CAIRO, June 1, 1862.

Yesterday morning our reserve divisions were brought up, and our entire front moved forward, the men having two days' rations in their haversacks. During the day we kept up a tremendous cannonading, shelling the woods furiously. The rebels hardly showed themselves, but replied feebly with a few shots.

Last night we threw up breastworks along the entire front, and slept on our arms within 1000 yards of the enemy's breastworks. At six o'clock this morning General Pope entered Corinth without the slightest resistance, and took possession.

At the same time the Mayor, who had come out on a different road, met General Nelson, and surrendered the town to him.

There were no inhabitants remaining except women, children, and old men, the rebels succeeding in carrying away absolutely everything except a few provisions, which, with the warehouses and railroad depot, were burned before we arrived. They took every invalid from the hospital, and every letter from the post-office. They did not leave a single gun, and had been moving away troops more than six days, and stores two weeks.

The most of the troops had gone toward Grand Junction. The rebel rear-guard, under Bragg, 10,000 strong, marched southward at midnight. Citizens assert positively that Beauregard was there in person, and left with it.

All concern that never more than 60,000 troops were there at once, and usually much less.

The rebel fortifications were five miles long, from the Memphis and Charleston to the Mobile and Ohio Road; but they were much weaker than we supposed. They could have been carried by storm any time. The few prisoners we have are deserters from the rebel rear-guard. There is great mortification in our army.

I have these details from one who was there in person.

WE have, in another part of our impression, reproduced from a paper published under Northern supervision, an account of the seizure of Judge Carmichael. The Federal army seems determined that the world shall know its lawlessness and brutality. We will not discuss the necessity or legality of the imprisonment of Judge Carmichael; but why arrest him when in his court-house, and in the discharge of his judicial functions? Why not have taken him when he entered, or when he left the court-house? We can assign no other reason than the desire of the military to show their contempt for all civil authority. How can we explain the brutality? Why was the defenceless judge knocked about the head with revolvers? Such conduct can only have been prompted by savage ferocity. But what can be expected of an army that tolerates the presence of a General Butler? If the soldiery are already brutalized, how will they be when the war has been continued for some time longer? What vent will be found for such licentiousness when the war is over? The people of the United States may then find that the dire curse designed for the South, comes home to roost.

THE Patriot of yesterday contains a paragraph announcing that the three French naval divisions, viz., the squadron of the Coast of North America, the squadron of the Gulf of Mexico, and that of the West Indies, are to be organized into one powerful fleet, under the command of Admiral Julian de la Graviere. The paragraph, which bears the signature usually supposed to indicate semi-official communications, concludes with the suggestive remark:—

The concentration in American waters of a fleet of sufficient power to protect the French interests there, is naturally accounted for by the possible contingencies arising from the war between the North and the South, as well as the state of the Mexican question.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.

THE TUNE OF DIXIE.

Norfolk, May 5, 1861.

We arrived here at daylight this morning in two special trains, after nearly twenty hours' continued but slow travelling. Our conveyances were again, as for the greater part of our many days' journey, cattle-cars, or box-cars, as they are termed; but these had been well aired and cleaned, a sort of rough benches fitted into them, and the sliding side-doors kept open, so that our situation, if not comfortable, was at least endurable. One passenger car was attached to each train for the officers and sick, of which latter we have already a goodly number, owing to the sudden change of climate, and of water and food, though no serious cases. The officers, for the most part, remained in the box-cars among the men, sharing their discomforts, and assisting in turning them into subjects of merriment.

The scenes on the way were a repetition of those we had witnessed in Georgia and Tennessee. Hordes of girls to greet us wherever the train stopped for wood and water, and gifts of flowers, cakes, and early fruit by the enthusiastic fair. Our "boys" have composed a set of doggerel rhymes to the tune of "Dixie," commemorative of the recent accession of Virginia and Tennessee to the Confederacy, and especially complimentary to the former. This they sing on every appropriate occasion, with marked effect upon the hearts of the Virginian beauties. Such was the popularity of the song at Norfolk, where it originated, that some considerate persons bethought themselves of having it printed on little slips of paper, as "The Song of Dixie, sung by the 3rd Regiment of Alabama Volunteers, on their passage through Virginia." These slips have been plentifully distributed on the road, and, I doubt not, will be preserved as historical relics, when the pretty girls who welcomed us shall have become grandmothers, and relate to the wondering little ones about the times when the first troops of Confederate volunteers came from the far South to fight the Yankees on Virginian soil.

Oh, have you heard the joyful news?

Virginia does old Abe refuse,

Hurrah! hurrah! hurrah!

And Tenne-see and brave Kentuck

Will show the North their Southern pluck,

Hurrah! hurrah!

and so on, through a dozen stanzas, each of which ends with the patriotic refrain—

"We 'll die for old Virginia."

It is marvellous with what wild-fire rapidity this tune of "Dixie" has spread over the whole South. Considered as an intolerable nuisance when first the streets re-echoed it from the repertoire of wandering minstrels, it now bids fair to become the musical symbol of a new nationality, and we shall be fortunate if it does not impose its very name on our country. Whether by a coincidence simply accidental, or from some of those mysterious causes which escape our limited intelligence, its appearance in its present form was the knell of the American Republic, and as such it seems to have been instantaneously received by the masses in the South everywhere. What magic potency is there in those rude, incoherent words, which lend themselves to so many parodies, of which the poorest is an improvement on the original? What spell is there in the wild strain that it should be made to betoken the stern determination of a nation resolved to achieve its independence? I cannot tell.

Most persons believe it to be of recent origin, first introduced during the last Presidential contest by an "Ethiopian minstrel's" troop performing in New Orleans. This is only partially true; its real origin is of much older date. Those who have travelled much on Western rivers must often have heard it, in various forms, among the firemen and deck-hands of the river steamers. For years the free negroes of the North, especially those employed on board the steamers on the Western rivers making periodical voyages South, have cheered their labours with this favourite song:—

I wish I was in Dixie;

In Dixie's land

I'll take my stand,

And live and die in Dixie.

Away, away,

Away down South in Dixie—expressed the negro's preference for his more genial and sunny native clime, the land which is the negro's true home, and the only land where he is happy and contented, despite the morbid imaginings of ill-informed or misguided philanthropists.

The word "Dixie" is an abbreviation of "Mason and Dixon's line," as the line separating Maryland and Pennsylvania is called, and which, both geographically and rhetorically, has expressed the Northern frontier of the South ever since the line was drawn by the surveyors whose names it immortalizes. Years before I heard the tune I have heard negroes in the North use the word "Dixie" in that sense, as familiarly as we do the more lengthy phrase from which it is derived.

ON THE SCENE OF ACTION.

Norfolk, May 7, 1861.

There can be no doubt that this is to be the field on which we must win our spurs in the country's service. I have accordingly seized with avidity the opportunity afforded me by a friend on the staff of the commanding-general, for obtaining an intelligent comprehension of what must unquestionably be the first battle-field of the revolution. A small military map, traced from the latest United States' Coast Surveys, has been of material assistance to me in this respect. I now more fully understand the hot haste with which we were summoned hither. My anxious prayer is that the enemy may allow us the time for those defences without which we must fall a useless sacrifice. On the other hand, I marvel at the imbecility which caused the precipitate abandonment of so important a place.

It now appears that Commander Prendergrast was frightened away by a ruse which almost passes credence that it should have produced such results. Mr. Malone, the President of the Seaboard and Roanoke Railroad, had heavy trains passing over that road all the day, and until late into the night of the 23rd ult. The noise of these trains could be plainly heard at the Navy Yard, as also the cheers which rent the air when each of them arrived. By the Federals they were supposed to convey large masses of troops, while, in truth, they were employed, and had been run purposely, to create that impression, and prevent any closer inspection into the condition of the town. All communication between the latter and the Navy Yard had for several days past been prevented by the authorities, aided by a Vigilance Committee truly deserving the name. Norfolk, however, besides its own citizens, armed as best they could, had at the time but 500 troops, who had hastened from Petersburg to its assistance. On the same night the powder magazine, at some distance from the yard, had been surprised and seized. This corroborated the fears of the Federals that they would be attacked, and some show of placing obstructions in the channel of the river inspired the further fear that their retreat would soon be cut off. I have the testimony of my own eyes to the panic with which they abandoned the place, without even giving themselves time for its destruction. The Merrimac, which, with immense stores of powder on her, they set on fire and scuttled, is already raised, and the ammunition in her hold is uninjured. She sank before the fire reached below the gundeck, and her hull and machinery are as serviceable as ever. The old frigate United States is also but little injured. None but the sheds, officers' quarters, and a few of the minor buildings, are consumed by the flames. All that is essential for our use remains. The explosion of the dry-dock is said to have been prevented by one of their own men, who managed, in the confusion of departure, to get away and turn the water on, thus extinguishing the train. When we, in turn, must abandon the place, which, in all probability, will be before long, we shall set about the work of destruction more deliberately, and more successfully. For this we are now preparing, even while working day and night at the defences; for it is almost too much to hope that the Federals, recovered from their panic, will allow us to complete the latter. Much of the rich booty has already been removed to Richmond. Some 1100 naval guns of various sizes, and considerable stores of provisions, and ammunition still remains, including some 30,000 shells. When all shall have been removed to a place of safety, I shall breathe more freely.

At present I can see nothing to prevent the Federal fleet from returning. Elizabeth River might be hotly contested at Sewall's Point and Craney Island; but at the former we are only just building a battery, and at the latter we have only a few guns. Both will be tenable in about a month, but not sooner. The approach by land is more difficult, but yet practicable. Norfolk is enclosed, as by a pair of forceps, between two deep, marshy creeks, or rather tide-water inlets, —Tanner's Creek and Broad Creek—the heads of which are only one and a-half miles apart. The bridge which spans the former is ready for the torch at the first signal of alarm. The only other practicable road to Norfolk, when this is burned, lies between the heads of the two creeks; and there it is now our first and most pressing duty to erect breastworks—also a work requiring, with the utmost zeal and diligence, at least four or five weeks. If the enemy grant us that time we may defy him by land and by water. It will be a wonderful good fortune on our part, and unpardonable stupidity on his, if he does.

Several regiments from Georgia, Louisiana, and North Carolina, have joined us here already, making in all about 4000 men. A recent copy of the New York Herald estimates our number at 20,000, upon the authority of a correspondent purporting to write from here.

Reviews.

MR. TROLLOPE ON SECESSION. *

MR. DICKENS very felicitously makes Weller the elder advise the immortal Pickwick to avoid the unpleasantness of incarceration for debt by a voluntary exile, suggesting America as a place of asylum, for many good reasons, but especially that the sojourner could employ his leisure in writing a book on the Americans, which, particularly if spiced with abuse, would be sure to sell, and pay the author's travelling expenses, and leave him a handsome margin of profit. In the English literary market there is not a safer investment than a Transatlantic journey. We admit it is extremely difficult to produce a good book on America, seeing that the accomplishment of such a task needs comprehensiveness of conception, combined with the rare faculty of giving the reader a vast perspective in a few lines; and also the somewhat opposite qualities of a cool, analytical judgment, and a warm, appreciative imagination. It is, then, idle to expect many first-rate books on America. On the other hand, from the inexhaustiveness of the subject, and the intense and mirth-provoking individualism of the United States' people, which passes with foreigners for semi-insane eccentricity, it is next to impossible for any one, though unblest with genius, and possessing mental endowments below mediocrity, to produce an absolutely unreadable book on America. Just as a commonplace bust or an ordinary engraving of Napoleon the Great is worth a glance, because artistic inferiority cannot veil the pre-eminent and speaking individuality of the original; so, in reading about America and the Americans, there is nothing downright wearying in the repetition even when the beaten track is followed by writers of very inferior calibre.

We are not surprised that Mr. Trollope should have determined to write "a book about the United States;" and, from his antecedents, we might have expected an amusing, though not a profound work. Curiously enough, he resolved to treat "on the nature and operation of their political arrangements, which had produced the social absurdities" described by his mother thirty years ago, although he confesses his inability to perform the task, truly observing, it "is a work which some man will do who has secured a right by education, study, and success, to rank himself among the political sages of his age." In the two volumes before us, the author has demonstrated, in a wonderful manner, the accuracy of the gauge he has made of his own powers, and of his utter incapacity to deal with political questions.

* North America, By ANTHONY TROLLOPE. Two Vols. London Chapman and Hall.

Being resolved to temporarily forsake his natural line of business—literary genteel comedy—and to essay the part of a political sage, we cannot understand why he should regret the occurrence of the contest which at present engages the attention of the world. Is it possible to conceive a better opportunity for judging of the soundness and value of political institutions, than when they are undergoing a fiery trial? The endurance and seaworthiness of a ship is tested in the raging storm, not when the weather is fair, and the waves unruffled. But, assuredly, “a man who professes to use a light pen, and to manufacture his article for the use of general readers,” displays a want of taste, and we must add, of that generous sympathy which is the prevailing element of civilized humanity, in writing lightly about a country in the cruel throes of intestine warfare. We do not intend to offer any criticism upon Mr. Trollope’s description of places and of the domestic manners of the people. They are often caricatures, yet on the whole, worthy of the “light pen,” professing to “manufacture for the general reader.” In the midst of carnage and devastation, we are in no mood to enjoy the humorous sketching of a “light pen.” Under no circumstances, should we be pleased with Mr. Trollope’s coarse attack upon the manners of Northern ladies. His apostrophe to Niagara is very well in its way, and is ingeniously made use of to inform the “general reader” that Mr. Anthony Trollope is not to be confounded with the herd of bookmakers who gather knowledge in the British Museum, and vegetate in suburban lodgings; but that he has been to Florence, to Rome, to Paris, to the “peaks of the Alps,” to Switzerland, to the Tropics, and to the Blue Mountains of Jamaica; but at this juncture, we have something grander than the Falls of Niagara to engage our attention, and an addition to the thousand and one accounts of them is obtrusive, even though it is in itself a fair specimen of “light pen” sketching.

Mr. Trollope’s political views are so singularly devoid of originality, that we should not have thought it worth while to answer them; but being covertly introduced into a work not professing to be a treatise on Secession, we deem it proper to expose their fallaciousness. We shall not trespass on the patience of our readers by noticing all our author’s errors, but confine our attention to a few of the most prominent of them.

In the general introduction, and in the third chapter of the second volume, the right of Secession is discussed but not very fully. Mr. Trollope denies, in toto, the constitutional right of Secession.

Nobody, no single Southerner, can really believe that the Constitution of the United States, as formed in 1787, or altered since, intended to give to the separate States the power of seceding as they pleased. It is surely useless going through long arguments to prove this, seeing that it is absolutely proved by the absence of any clause giving such license to the separate States.

Now it happens that, besides the partizans of the North, no one disputes the legality of Secession. The more the Constitution of the United States, and the history thereof, is studied, the more apparent becomes the fact that in entering into a Federal compact the sovereign rights of the separate States were solemnly guaranteed and reserved. Irrespective of this solemn guarantee and reservation, the very essence and meaning of Federation is a compact entered into and maintained by Sovereign independent States. It is absurd to assert that Sovereign States rebel, or are revolutionary, because they withdraw from a political alliance with other Sovereign States. Against whom did the Confederate States rebel? If the answer is, against the United States—and accepting Mr. Lincoln’s doctrine, that the Southern States are yet an integral part of the Union—we are forced to the rather strange conclusion that the Southern States are in rebellion against themselves. Mr. Trollope is loud in his advocacy of the right of revolution, in order to drown any remonstrance against his assertion of the rebellious character of Secession. The right of revolution is indeed necessary for any possible defence of the North. To bring back by force the seceded States into the Union, the North has remorsefully trampled on, and in every way violated, the Constitution. Mr. Trollope will tell us that such proceedings were indispensable, in consequence of the rebellious proceedings of the South; that revolution could only be met by revolution. Did not Mr. Trollope perceive that he was treading on dangerous ground when he opposed the right of Secession, because of “the absence of any such clause giving such license to the separate State?” It is at least quite as strong an argument in favour of Secession that there is no clause providing for action in the event of Secession; and that the Constitution is so framed that Secession cannot be opposed without violating the Constitution. Nay, according to the law of all civilized countries, an act not punishable under some existing law, is lawful. If Mr. Trollope were as astute as he is smart, and as unprejudiced as he is honest, he could not fail to perceive that the Constitution of the United States assumes the right of Secession. The most rabid Northerner cannot dispute that before the Constitution of the United States was accepted by the States, the States were independent Sovereignities, at liberty to accept or reject the Federal compact. We presume that Mr. Trollope, though he “manufactures for the general reader,” is too conscientious not to have read the debates in Convention when the Constitution was being framed by the delegates, and that he has also made himself familiar with the ordinances of the several States by which they accepted the Constitution. In Convention the great battle and contention was to preserve the sovereign independence of the several States, and the amendments and the declarations of the several States all evinced a similar anxiety. Mr. Trollope cannot say that the States, at the formation of the Union, imagined that they were giving up their sovereign independence. A clause giving license for Secession was not inserted in the Constitution, because it was unnecessary, seeing that the sovereign rights of the States were reserved; and, further, it was tacitly but unmistakably acknowledged by the absence of any provision to oppose it.

The next point to which we refer is the opinion expressed by Mr. Trollope, that the South was fully prepared for Secession, that pro-Southern Presidents had unduly stored arms and ammunition in the South, and that Mr. Buchanan “sent military materials to the South with the self-acknowledged purpose of using them against the Union.”

I am not aware that Jefferson Davis is a traitor; but that Buchanan is or was a traitor admits, I think, of no doubt. Under him, and with his connivance, rebellion was allowed to make its way. Under him and by his officers, arms, and ships, and men and money, were sent away from those points at which it was known they would be needed if it were intended to put down the coming rebellion, and to those points at which it was known that they would be needed if it were intended to foster the coming rebellion.

That Secession was anticipated some day, we do not deny. It was even advocated in the North. European statesmen foresaw that the huge and incongruous Republic could not always hold together. Mr. Trollope himself must have looked forward to a division, for he frankly admits that there will be ultimately a Southern, Western, and Northern Union. But we do not believe that the leaders of Southern Secession anticipated separation from the Union in 1860. It was precipitated by political intrigues, we might almost have said, by a political accident. When the proximate cause of the formation of the Confederate States is known, its insignificance will give rise to universal astonishment. But be this as it may, it is untrue, it is a dishonest ignoring of palpable facts to affirm that the South was prepared for war with the North. Had the South prepared a fleet to protect her forts and commerce? No. Had she furnished herself with artillery and small arms for carrying on a war? No. Had she erected powder mills, and established foundries? No. The assertion is utterly false. Never was a nation involved in a war so unexpectedly, as was the Confederate States. If they anticipated Secession in 1860, we may rather charge them with culpable negligence, and unwise credulity in confiding in the constitutional integrity of the North, instead of putting themselves into such a state of defence as to secure their independence against attack. If the South had been prepared for war, the North could not have entered into the contest.

Mr. Trollope displays the most unmitigated ignorance with respect to the wealth of the South. We will quote a few passages to show that “unmitigated ignorance” is a mild term to apply to such monstrous fallacies:—

No doubt the North had done much for the South;—had earned money for it; had fed it;—and, moreover, in a great measure, fostered all its bad habits. It had not only been generous to the South, but over indulgent.

It must, I think, be conceded that the Gulf States have not suffered at all by their connection with the Northern States; but in lieu of any such suffering they owe all their national greatness to the Northern States; that they have been lifted up by the commercial energy of the Atlantic States, and by the agricultural prosperity of the Western States, to a degree of national consideration and respect through the world at large which never could have belonged to them standing alone.

The Tropics can produce; but the men from the North still sow and reap, and garner and enjoy.

There is much more of such assertion, including predictions of the decadence of the South when Secession is accomplished, that we do not think it worth while to reproduce. We confess we are surprised that even an author who professes to manufacture for the general reader, should have fabricated such ridiculous falsehoods, especially when there was a host of United States’ official documents to refute them. The South has produced food enough for her own consumption, and contributed to the supply of the Northern deficiency. The wealth of the North has been created by the South. In a paper we published in our seventh number, upon the productiveness of the South, it was shown, from calculations based upon United States’ official documents, that of grains which constitute food the North and West, allowing for the difference of population, produced in 1850 nearly 50 per cent. less than the South; that the total agricultural products of the South (not including cotton) was 498,030,077 dollars, and of the North and West 541,663,717 dollars, being about a dollar a head in favour of the South; the cotton crop in 1859 was worth 233,500,000 dollars; in that year the total exports of the United States amounted to 278,392,080 dollars, of which 188,693,496 dollars were of Southern origin; that the amount of Northern manufactures sold in the South reached 240,000,000 dollars; and that in 1850 the value of Southern manufactures amounted to 164,579,937 dollars. The North has been fostered by the South. We cannot explain what is meant by the North sowing and reaping in the South, but we fully appreciate the “garner and enjoy.” Hence this wicked war. Because the South is rich and enriches the North, the North is willing to risk all things, and to resign social and political freedom, to subjugate her. Had the South been poor, the North, which Mr. Trollope describes as a dollar worshipping community, would not have warred against Secession. Mr. Trollope himself, with incredible inconsistency, thus writes:—

The South and West are both agricultural producing regions, desirous of sending cotton and corn to foreign countries, and of receiving back foreign manufactures on the best terms. But the North is a manufacturing country; a poor manufacturing country, as regards excellence of manufacture; and, therefore, the more anxious to foster its own growth by protective laws.

With some parts of Mr. Trollope’s chapter on “The Causes of the War,” we entirely concur. He admits fully and unreservedly the inherent differences of the people.

It would have been surprising had they not desired Secession. Secession of one kind, a very practical Secession, had already been forced upon them by circumstances. They had become a separate people, dis severed from the North by habits, morals, institutions, pursuits, and every conceivable difference in their modes of thought and action. They still spoke the same language, as do Austria and Prussia; but beyond the tie of language they had no bond, but that of a meagre political Union in the Congress at Washington.

Is it not, then, madness, and worse than madness, to attempt to hold together people so widely separated? Further, our author says, the contest between the sections has been going on for thirty years, “and almost always to the detriment of the South;” that the South has, “in truth, been the losing party as regards national power;” that “when Mr. Lincoln was elected, the South knew its day was over;” that “an evil day was coming on the Southern politicians, and it behoved them to be prepared;” and that “as part of the Union they were too weak to hold their own if once their political finesse should fail them. That day came upon them, not unexpected, in 1860, and therefore they cut the cable.” Entertaining such views, it passes our comprehension how Mr. Trollope can assert that Secession was not justified. He tells us, and it is perfectly true, that for thirty years the South has done its utmost to keep in the Union, and that the cable was cut only when the last effort was frustrated. Are we to be told that it was the duty of the South—of 8,000,000 of the Anglo-Saxon race, inhabiting a country of more than 800,000 square miles—to submit to political annihilation?

And since Mr. Trollope thinks the United States must some day be divided, we should like to know if he can conceive a more fitting opportunity than when the whole of a section is unanimous in demanding independence; and when the only choice lies between Secession and political serfdom?

Mr. Trollope’s opinions on negro slavery will shock ultra abolitionists.

The abolitionists hold that the negro is the white man’s equal. I do not. I see, or think that I see, that the negro is the white man’s inferior through laws of nature; that he is not mentally fit to cope with white men—I speak of the full-blooded negro—and that he must fill a position simply servile. But the Abolitionist desires him to be the white man’s equal. But yet, when he has him at his elbow, he treats him with a scorn which even the negro can hardly endure.

Charming pictures are drawn for you of the negro in a state of Utopian bliss, owning his own hoe and eating his own hog. But the enfranchised negro has always thrown away his hoe, has always eaten any man’s hog but his own,—and has too often sold his daughter for a dollar when any such market has been open to him.

Everybody knows that “Abolition, in truth, is a political cry.” The North hates and loathes the black race, and provided the South had submitted to political dependence, and been contented to fill the pockets of the North, the dollar worshipping people would not have cared if the South had been foolish enough and wicked enough to maltreat the slaves in the way set forth by Mrs. Stowe. In no respect was slavery a cause of the war.

In a chapter on the army of the North, we are treated to an abstract of the report made to the House of Representatives touching Government contracts. Such complete rottenness, such wholesale, unblushing speculation, is almost incredible. Passing by the cases of Messrs. Comstock and Starback, who only swindled the Government to the extent of £6,000 or £7,000, we come to the remarkable history of Mr. George D. Morgan, brother-in-law of Mr. Welles, the Secretary of the Navy. This person retired from the grocery trade and became the Government agent for purchasing vessels. It was not his fault that he knew nothing about ships or their value; but there were numerous officials who were competent to discharge the duties assumed by the ex-grocer, only the ex-grocer happened to be the brother-in-law of the Secretary of the Navy. In five months Mr. Morgan managed to mulct the Government of £20,000, besides paying fabulous prices for ships, and, it is probable, getting tips from the owners. Mr. Trollope unhesitatingly expresses an opinion that Mr. Welles shared the plunder. Indeed, the Committee say in their report, they "do not find in this transaction the less to censure in the fact that this arrangement between the Secretary of the Navy and Mr. Morgan was one between brothers-in-law." Yet Mr. Welles did not resign, nor was he dismissed.

The case of Cummings, the friend of Mr. Cameron, Secretary-at-War, is truly sensational. He was entrusted with £400,000, and bought selected herrings and ships at the vendors' prices; amused himself by paying £4 8s. for carbines that had been twice sold by the Government as useless for 14s. each, and finally forgot to mention, in his accounts, a little balance of £28,000. Mr. Cameron resigned his office, but he was not disgraced; as a compliment to Russia, he was appointed Ambassador at St. Petersburg.

General Fremont, through the agency of a person named Beard, outwitted the doings of the friends of Messrs. Welles and Cameron. Mr. Trollope recites a long string of offences and remarks:—"After that, who will believe all the money went into Beard's pocket? Why should General Fremont have committed every conceivable breach of order against his Government, merely with the view of favoring such a man as Beard?" The same General Fremont is now in high command; and, our author remarks, "is as probable a candidate as any other that I could name for the next Presidency." Is it at all wonderful that the South should shrink from political contact with and submission to a Government so corrupt that a man guilty of speculation and the betrayal of public trust is regarded as a likely candidate for the Presidency?

In a chapter on "The Constitution" the political corruption is again referred to:—

The very word "politician" is foul and unsavory throughout the States, and means rather a political blackleg than a political patriot. It is useless to blink this matter in speaking of the politics and policy of the United States. The corruption of the various politicians of the nation stinks aloud in the nostrils of all men. It behoves the country to look to this.

And yet the Constitution that has fostered, and still fosters, such corruption is held up as an object of envy.

But in the States a system of government has been produced under a written Constitution, in which no Englishman can disbelieve and which every Frenchman must envy.

Mr. Trollope has certainly very little knowledge of French character, if he imagines that that proud and honourable nation would submit to a corrupt and degrading Government. As to the sympathy of Englishmen, it is sufficient to remark that the working of the United States' Constitution has made us intensely conservative, and the idea of an extended franchise utterly distasteful.

Mr. Trollope denounces the unconstitutional proceedings of the Lincoln Government, but still he is sanguine enough to hope that the people of the United States will shortly be restored to the enjoyment of those social and political liberties of which they have been so recklessly deprived. We do not sympathize with these anticipations. When a nation, to preserve its independence, sorrowfully and for a time gives up its social and political rights to strengthen the hands of the Executive we are bound to suppose that when the danger is past the sway of the constitution will be restored. But the United States has sold her freedom for the purpose of trampling on the freedom of another people. Instead of sorrowfully submitting to the gagging of the press, the despotic embargo on all expression of opinion, and the suspension of the habeas corpus—the bulwark of personal immunity from tyrannical arrest—the Lincoln despotism was hailed with enthusiasm. It was evident, too, from the very commencement of the war, that King Mob had decreed the downfall of the civil authority. The army of the United States is drawn from the governing classes, from the electors of the Government. Well, how did the army comport itself towards the civil power? Why it is notorious that the officers, who, be it remembered, in the United States' army are on a social equality with the privates, missed no opportunity of manifesting their contempt for members of Congress. Or look at the conduct of Federal Generals; how constantly they have assumed a military dictatorship, and issued edicts contrary to the law of the United States, and infringing on the rights of the President. Or look at the case of General Fremont. We cannot suppose that the Lincoln Government willingly bestowed a high and responsible command upon an officer who had shamefully and notoriously abused his public trust. But King Mob and the army are one; and King Mob thinks none the worse of an officer because his hands are fouled with gross speculation. We do not say the contempt for the United States' Government is unmerited; but, be that as it may, we cannot ignore the fact that, virtually, the United States is under military domination. If the subjugation of the South could be effected, the army, flushed with victory, would be little inclined to give up its authority. And when it is manifested that the 800,000 square miles of territory, and the 8,000,000 of the Anglo-Saxon race cannot be conquered and held in base servitude, the disappointed mob will find an outlet for their rage in subjugating law and order at home. We do not predict the perpetuation of military despotism, but we are convinced that many years must elapse, and terrible and humiliating sufferings be endured, before liberty, so wantonly outraged, will again smile on the unhappy country.

Even with regard to the finances of the United States Mr. Trollope is hopeful. We will not enter into a discussion as to the willingness of the country to pay its debts; we prefer looking to its ability. The debt is not only large, but it has attained its present dimensions in a wonderfully short time. Mr. Chase has put forth a statement that the public debt on May 29, 1862, amounted to 491,448,982 dollars. Assuming this account, as far as it goes, to be correct we must bear in mind that it does not include 44,120,000 dollars of paper money in hand, and which, ere this, has been issued. Then there are the current obligations to contractors, and to the States for advances made in raising regiments. It was stated in the Senate by Mr. Hensenden, after Mr. Chase's account had appeared, that the Government debt would, on July 1, amount to 700,000,000 dollars, and even to this indebtedness we must add the promised bounties to the soldiers. It was not altogether an idle boast of the New York Herald, that the United States spend as much in one year as Great Britain spends in a century. And this is one reason that makes a comparison between the indebtedness of this country and of the United States fallacious. Besides, our money was spent in foreign wars, and our trade was not impaired, but, on the contrary, we became the carriers of the world. And further, England could look forward to peace without diminished resources. Not so the United States. Suppose the South conquered; the North could not hold her conquest without a large army of occupation; for it is now clear, even to the North, that instead of Union sentiment in the South, there is only bitter hostility. Nor will the independence of the South give any immediate help to the North, in respect to its pecuniary burden. The monopoly of Southern trade is gone for ever. There is no chance of Europe being made to pay the duty on cotton that has so vauntingly and angrily been proposed, because Southern cotton will not find its way to Northern ports, and it will be many years before international animosity has sufficiently subsided to allow the North her natural share of Southern commerce. Besides Mr. Trollope, we do not suppose there are ten sane Europeans who think there is any other prospect for the United States but national insolvency.

We will conclude by quoting a very eccentric passage in reference to slavery, and which would be laughable if it were not horrible:—

I am no abolitionist. * * * There are the slaves, and I know they cannot be abolished, neither they nor their chains; but, for myself, I will not willingly join my lot with them. I do not wish to have dealings with the African negro either as a free man or as a slave, if I can avoid them, believing that his employment by me, in either capacity, would lead to my own degradation.

To this is added an explanatory note, but which explains nothing:—

In thus speaking of the African negro, I do not venture to despise the work of God's hands. That He has made the negro for His own good purpose, as He has the Esquimaux, I am aware. And I am aware that it is my duty, as it is the duty of us all, to see that no injury be done to him, and, if possible, to assist him in his condition. When I declare that I desire no dealings with the negro, I speak of him in the position in which I now find him, either as a free servant or a slave. In either position he impedes the civilization and the progress of the white man.

Avoid the negro! Let him not come near you either as slave or free labourer! He is God's creature, so is the serpent. Treat the negro kindly, but treat him as the leper with whom contact is doubly accursed! Dare we believe that the beneficent Creator made the negro for such a purpose? Surely a more revolting doctrine was never enunciated. We have not misstated the sense of the above passages; but we trust, for the sake of humanity, that Mr. Trollope, when he wrote them, did not comprehend their significance.

A HISTORICAL PARALLEL. *

No. vi.

THE death of William was a sore affliction to the people, but it did not give rise to a thought of submission. The worthy Hollanders did what they could under the circumstances. Maurice of Nassau was chosen as leader, and preparation was made for the long struggle that was to ensue. We do not propose to treat on that contest. We should, indeed, have to repeat the lessons we have endeavoured to inculcate. The battle of freedom was often lost yet ever won. Antwerp fell, and Flanders was weakened. Whenever the people placed reliance on foreign aid (we are referring to the period between the death of William and 1590) they were disappointed. Although they loved Queen Elizabeth, and, likely enough, the virgin queen sympathized with the Provinces, yet, owing to the fears entertained of exciting Spanish anger, and from the half-consciousness that Philip meditated unfriendly designs, the support of England was uncertain; and even whilst the Armada was getting ready for the conquest of England, Elizabeth was willing to give over the Provinces to Philip for some paltry considerations, the chief of which was that she should be repaid about £70,000 which she had advanced. But though the prospect was often very dark, it was never so profoundly gloomy as at the moment when Father William, the terror of Spain and the hope of his country, was cut off by assassination. If national liberty could survive that blow, and emerge from such a position, there could never be a reason for despair.

We frequently see it announced by the people of the Northern States, that if they conquer the South they can get from it the treasure they so much need. An enslaved country is never productive, and after the first exactions, becomes a charge, and not a profit, to the conquerors. Commerce will not domicile in a land subject to foreign dominion. It has been so in all countries and all ages—it was so with the Netherlands:—

If the effects of despotism and of liberty could ever be exhibited at a single glance, it was certainly only necessary to look for a moment at the picture of the obedient and of the rebel Netherlands.

Since the fall of Antwerp, the desolation of Brabant, Flanders, and of the Walloon territories had become complete. The King had recovered the great commercial capital, but its commerce was gone. The Scheldt, which, till recently, had been the chief mercantile river in the world, had become as barren as if its fountains had suddenly dried up. It was as if it no longer flowed to the ocean, for its mouth was controlled by Flushing. Thus Antwerp was imprisoned and paralyzed. The docks and basins, where 2500 ships had once been counted, were empty, grass was growing in its streets, its industrious population had vanished, and the Jesuits had returned in swarms. And the same spectacle was presented by Ghent, Bruges, Valenciennes, Tournay, and those other fair cities which had once been types of vigorous industry and tumultuous life.

The Federals think that as soon as they possess themselves of the cities and rivers of the South, they will be able to restore the trade of those cities, and once more cover those rivers with shipping. They have been in possession of New Orleans for some time. General Butler, the soldier who makes shameful war upon defenceless women, is master of the city. He can plant as many United States' flags on the public buildings as he pleases; he can suppress annoying newspapers; he can and has sent forth a shower of appeals to planters to bring their cotton to market; he has grossly insulted foreign consuls; he has done all that Parma could do in a city of the Netherlands. He has, too, been supported by his Government. The Cabinet at Washington has not evinced any displeasure at proceedings that have disgusted the civilized world. The blockade has been raised and merchants invited to trade with the reopened ports. In vain are all these efforts. The Lincoln Government can destroy, but it cannot create. Commerce will not attend to its mandate, or obey the commands of a military dictator. The attempt has been made over again to get commerce by force of arms, or by acts of legislature, but such attempts never have succeeded and never can succeed. So long as the presence of the invaders desecrates the South, there will be no Southern commerce. The idea of the commerce of the South obeying the military rule of the North is as absurd as the suggestion of restoring and cementing the Union by carnage and devastation.

In our survey of the first years of the Netherlanders' struggle for liberty, we have been anxious to set forth the weakness and dangers of Federalism, the infusibility of races, and the impossibility of destroying the independence of a liberty-loving people. And the last has engrossed the greatest share of our attention.

* The Rise of the Dutch Republic. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. History of the United Netherlands. By JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. London: John Murray.

Not that we think the South needs encouragement. We have abundant proof of her inflexible resolve not to submit to Northern domination. As difficulties and dangers have increased, there has been manifested a sterner determination to maintain the unequal contest. Every success that has attended the Federal arms has taught the Confederates that any sacrifices are better, are light, in comparison with the sacrifice of nationality. The tyranny of General Butler is not without its use, since it has convinced the most sceptical in Europe of the stern necessity of Southern resistance. The burning of cotton, the destruction of property, the invincible loyalty of the people, have proved to everybody, except the United States' mob, that Federal conquests in the South are not only barren victories, but still further estrange the already divided nations. We repeat, we are convinced there is not the slightest occasion for encouraging the South to persevere in her heroic defence of her national independence; and our object in producing these papers has been to encourage the European friends of the South, who may possibly have felt disturbed by the isolation of the Confederate States, and the reiterated boastings of the North. It is always unfortunate to have to receive the testimony of an enemy, but still more so when that enemy is notorious for unscrupulous mendacity. If Southern news was generally as accessible as Northern news, no one, not even the partisans of the North, could believe that the Federals had made the slightest progress towards the conquest of the Confederate States; for a nation is not conquered by the mere fact of invasion, or by the occupation of its frontier cities.

We have directed attention to some of the analogies between the Netherlands' resistance to Spanish tyranny, and Southern resistance to the Northern attempt at subjugation. We will, in conclusion, point out a few of the differences that make the wicked lust and cupidity of the United States doubly certain of being defeated.

Spain was the most powerful nation on earth, in territorial extent, in resources, and in possessing the finest troops in Europe. The United States is by no means a dominant nation. In population and in resources she is inferior to every leading Power in Europe. She has to learn the art of war—an art that is not learnt in a single campaign, or, indeed, in a single warfare. The same may be said of the Confederates, but in the Netherlands, it was veteran troops against new troops, while in America, it is new troops against new troops.

Spain had hereditary rights in the Netherlands, and though they were justly forfeited by her misconduct, from first to last they gave her considerable influence. The United States has no more right to interfere in the Confederate States than has England, or France, or the Emperor of China.

Though Philip himself was too shrewd to suppose that he was serving God by robbing and devastating the Netherlands, his ignorant and bigoted soldiers were sustained by the belief that they were fighting for religion. The United States' soldiery are inspired by no higher motives than the gratification of intense cupidity and semi-barbarous cruelty. The plea of abolition humanitarianism was too transparent a sham to be put forth. It would not do to tell the Federal troops that they were to risk their lives for the sake of a race whom they abhor and treat as reptiles.

The Netherlands was a small country, and therefore its conquest did not seem desperate. A glance at the map will show that the size of the Confederate States makes their conquest by the United States impossible.

The Netherlands were disunited—the Confederates are a singularly united people. The Netherlands were extremely parsimonious in contributing the funds necessary for the defence of their rights—the Confederates are ready to sacrifice everything they possess.

The climate of the Netherlands was not obnoxious to Spanish occupancy—but the climate of the South is a deadly foe to the invader. The Netherlands trusted time after time to foreign mercenaries, and were repeatedly defeated, and, indeed, the same fate befell the patriot armies. The Confederates fight their own battles, and have never been routed except when the enemy has been aided by gunboats.

We might add to this list, but we have written enough to demonstrate the impossibility of the South being subjugated by the North. We are surprised at the endurance and success of the Netherlands in resisting the attempted subjugation by Spain; future generations will marvel at the folly as well as the wickedness of the United States in essaying the conquest of the South, and that civilized Europe hesitated to acknowledge a national independence so nobly defended and of which the consummation was so inevitable.

SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

(From the United States' Economist.)

Nothing can give a more forcible idea of the growing importance of the Southern States than a survey of their immense railroad system. There is a too numerous class of persons, resident in the Northern States, who, from defective information or perverted party statements, have adopted most erroneous impressions as to the commercial status of the vast section of country located south of Mason and Dixon's line. They pride themselves on the idea that all the commercial enterprise of the country has by some unknown means centred amongst the Northern people. It is a settled fact in their minds that the Southern States are half a century behind the advanced civilization of the North, and that that region of country is in an altogether raw and undeveloped condition. The railroads of the South, however, are a standing refutation of all such misconceptions. We know of no surer indication of the wealth and enterprise of any people than the extent of their railways. If their roads are few and ill conducted, there is either a lack of capital or of commerce, or of both, or there is an unwholesome adherence to old ideas; if, on the contrary, their roads are numerous and well managed, the inference is clearly legitimate that a large amount of commerce is pressing for accommodation, and that it is under the control of a competent and intelligent people. Measured by this standard, the South has something of which to be proud. We have compiled the following statistics, showing the extent and the value of railroad property in the several Southern States. The figures date up to the close of 1859, and show the length of road constructed or in course of construction, the length in actual operation, and the cost of the roads, including building and equipment:—

State.	Length.	In operation.	Cost.
			Dollars.
Virginia	2,058.5	1,525.7	43,069,360
North Carolina..	1,020.0	770.2	13,998,495
South Carolina..	1,136.0	807.3	19,083,343
Georgia	1,617.2	1,241.7	23,687,220
Florida	730.5	289.8	6,368,699
Alabama	1,822.4	798.6	20,975,639
Mississippi	445.1	365.4	9,024,444
Louisiana	1,160.0	419.0	16,073,270
Texas	2,667.0	284.6	7,578,943
Arkansas	701.3	38.5	1,130,110
Missouri	1,337.3	723.2	31,771,116
Tennessee	1,434.4	1,062.3	27,348,141
Kentucky	698.4	468.5	13,852,062
	16,828.1	8,794.8	235,960,842

It will be observed that Virginia has a greater length of road in operation than any other State, and that she has invested a much larger amount of capital in those works than has any other section of the South. The total length of line in that State is 2058 miles, and the length in operation 1525 miles, the cost of building and equipment having been over 43,000,000 dollars. In 1855, the total mileage of road in operation in Virginia was 986 miles; the increase since that period having been 539 miles, or about 58 per cent., a progress most creditable to the enterprize of that State. Next in importance comes the State of Missouri, which, although its length of road is not equal to that of some other States, has yet expended an amount of capital in its road surpassed only by Virginia. Upon an operative mileage of 723 miles, that State has expended nearly 32,000,000 dollars. Tennessee, with 339 miles more road than Missouri, has invested only 27,348,141 dollars in structure and equipment; whilst Georgia has built and equipped 1241 miles (518 miles more than Missouri), at a cost of only 23,687,220 dollars. Alabama has secured a large extent of road at a comparatively light cost, having opened 998 miles at an outlay of 20,975,639 dollars. The growing wants of that State have caused the projection of a much larger extent of railway accommodation, there being at the present time 1024 miles of road awaiting completion. In South Carolina the cost of the roads has been still lower than in the last-mentioned State—the length of road being nine miles additional and the aggregate cost nearly 2,000,000 less. The cost of the North Carolina lines has been even still lower than that of South. For somewhat less than 14,000,000 dollars, that State has constructed and equipped 770 miles of road, the average cost per mile having been only 18,179 dollars. Louisiana, on the other hand, has invested a large capital for much more limited results. Her length of road in operation is 419 miles, at a cost of over 16,000,000 dollars; the average cost per mile being 38,361 dollars, or 20,182 dollars more than that of the North Carolina roads. Louisiana has at the present time 741 miles of road uncompleted, which, if finished at the same rate of cost as that already in operation, will involve an additional outlay of 28,425,501 dollars, making the total cost of railroads in that State nearly 44,500,000 dollars. Kentucky is somewhat behind some other parts of the South in the extent of her railroad works. Her neighbouring State, Virginia, has 1525 miles of road in operation, with a population of 1,500,000; whilst, with a population of 1,000,000, Kentucky herself has only 468 miles of operating line. The comparatively heavy cost of road-building in this State may have tended more or less to limit the extent of railway accommodation, the average outlay per mile on the completed lines having been 29,600 dollars.

Mississippi does not own a great length of road, ranking in this respect tenth among the States of the South. She has, however, the great Mississippi River skirting her entire western boundary, which renders unnecessary a proportionate length of road; and it is to be taken into the estimate that her population being only 600,000, she has not such large requirements as have some of the more populous States. Texas has yet a great work to perform in railroad construction. She has only 284 miles of completed line for development of her immense territory. With a population, however, of 350,000, she cannot be expected to do much more immediately; and the probability seems to be, that she must wait patiently for some years ere the 2383 miles which her enterprize has projected can be completed. Five years ago she had only thirty-two miles of road; and it is highly creditable to the State, that, with so few inhabitants, she should have completed 250 miles of line in the interim. The roads of Florida, though limited, are probably proportioned to her wants—290 miles of railway to less than 100,000 inhabitants being a very fair ratio of accommodation. Arkansas is as yet only commencing her railroad works. With a large territory, and a population of about 400,000 she has need of vastly more than thirty-eight miles of railway, of which she seems to be fully aware, having in contemplation the construction of 663 miles additional. In 1855, the total length of line in operation in the Southern States was 4426 miles; and since that period 4368 miles have been completed, at a cost of about 115,000,000 dollars: no evidence, certainly, that our Southern citizens are deficient in either capital or enterprize. The entire length of road completed in the whole of the United States since 1855, is 11,248 miles, of which 6822 miles belongs to the Northern States and 4426 to the Southern States; from which it is apparent that, according to population, the South has built a greater length of road than in the North.

In the States of the South there are 745 miles of road more than in the whole of Great Britain; the total cost of the Southern roads being 233,960,842 dollars, against 1575,000,000 dollars of capital expended on the British lines. The total mileage of road in operation in the three countries of Austria, France, and Prussia in 1858 was 9139—an excess over that of the Southern States amounting to only 345 miles! The total capital expended upon the lines of those countries is 680,000,000 dollars—or three times the amount of that invested in our Southern roads.

THE CAPTURE OF THE CIRCASSIAN.

The following letter has been published in the Times.—

SIR,—Your well-known willingness to afford publicity to any wrong must be my excuse for troubling you with the following specimen of what cannot but be considered a gross outrage on international law, and also a private wrong to many innocent sufferers.

The facts are these,—1, with the rest of the officers and part of the crew of the steamship Circassian, joined her in London to go thence to Cardiff and afterwards to Bordeaux, and there await orders as to our final destination.

On our arrival at Bordeaux we were informed that our vessel was to proceed to Havannah, after taking in a general cargo for that place.

The goods (consisting chiefly of wines and spirits) were accordingly shipped, and we proceeded on our voyage, and, after touching at St. Thomas's for coal, we had arrived to within about thirty miles of Havannah, and were at the same time, not more than seven miles from the coast of Cuba at nine a.m. of the 4th of May last, when we discovered an American war steamer approaching us from the offing. On nearing us, after asking us our name, "where from, and where bound?" and receiving in reply our name, port of departure, and destination, we were ordered to "heave-to" and stop until they should search us, this order being, as we considered, in direct violation of the right of search. We still continued our course, with the English ensign still flying. On our persisting on our course, which still was and always had been direct for the harbour of Havannah, the American steamer (the Somerset, Captain English) immediately commenced firing, first a blank shot, and then live shells from her rifled guns in quick succession, which burst in all directions, luckily wounding but one man slightly, but doing a good deal of injury to our rigging, &c., the whole of the port side of the fore shrouds being completely shot away.

We then, in order to save life and further damage to the ship (being completely unarmed), heave-to, on which they ceased firing, and sent a boat on board, well manned and armed. They then examined our papers, but finding them correct, commenced broaching and examining our cargo, and although they found nothing contraband of war, they took possession of the ship and cargo in the name of the President of the United States, assigning no reason whatever for so doing.

After taking possession of the ship they sent more men, heavily armed, and a number of marines on board, who were drawn up on the quarterdeck, and ordered to "load with ball cartridge," and "fix bayonets," which being done, they hauled the English ensign down and hoisted the American flag in its place, at which the crew of the Somerset commenced cheering vociferously, in honour of their daring achievement. Half of our crew were then ordered on board the Somerset, and we were taken in tow by her to Key West, where we remain still.

A few days after our arrival here a boat from the Somerset came alongside with more men and marines (at about eight o'clock in the evening), who immediately were placed as sentries to all our cabins, those officers of our own ship being required to remain on deck, where they happened to be when they placed the sentries, and we were one by one ordered to accompany an officer and two marines to each of our cabins, which were then minutely searched, and all our private letters and papers seized, and have not yet been returned.

The Commodore, having arrived in the meantime, ordered our crew, who were prisoners on board the Somerset, to be sent back to the Circassian, and the English ensign to be once again hoisted.

I have further to add that on our arrival here the Captain repeatedly asked permission to go on shore to the English Consul, but was each time refused, and we had not the benefit of his advice and counsel until we had been in the port three days.

This, Sir, is the substance of the case, and I have only now to subscribe myself your obedient servant,

Key West, May 22.

AN OFFICER.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, U.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, U.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, U.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, U.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, U.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, U.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, U.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, U.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specimen sent of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEED AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDIN AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rainford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
U.S.A.

Represented by
Jos. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS,
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
and descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, U.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BRESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissioners for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

AMERICAN DIFFICULTIES;
Their Origin and the Remedy for them.
Price 1s.
London: HOGGTON, New Bond-street

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE.

14, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT
GARDEN, LONDON, and 20, SOUTH FREDER-ICK STREET, EDINBURGH, have published
the following Catalogues of their Stock:—

1. CLASSICAL CATALOGUE. Greek and Latin
Classics, Archaeology, Philology, Roman Law.
2. THEOLOGICAL CATALOGUE. Hebrew and French Books—Philology, Metaphysics, &c.
3. FRENCH CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Voyages, Travels, &c.
4. GERMAN CATALOGUE. General Literature,
History, Belles Lettres.
5. MAP CATALOGUE. Foreign Maps and Atlases.
6. ENGLISH CATALOGUE. European Languages.
7. ORIENTAL CATALOGUE. Oriental Languages,
History, &c.
8. SCIENTIFIC CATALOGUE. Natural History,
Zoology, Botany, Mineralogy, Chemistry, Mathematics, Astronomy, Medicine, and Surgery.
9. FRENCH BOOK CIRCULARS issued periodically, and sent Post-free to Purchasers, contain
New Books and New Purchases.
10. SCIENTIFIC BOOK-CIRCULARS. New Books
and New Purchases.

ANY CATALOGUE SENT POST-FREE FOR ONE STAMP.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Importers of Foreign
Books, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London,
and 20, South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organized,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organized in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interests that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganized trade.
The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. To ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF SOCIAL SCIENCE AND CONGRESS INTERNATIONAL DE BIENFAISANCE.

LONDON MEETING, JUNE, 1862.
The Sixth Annual Meeting of the National Association for the Promotion of Social Science is in connection with the Third Session of the Congress International de Bienfaisance, will take place in London from the 5th to the 14th of June.

The Departmental Meetings of the National Association will be held at Guildhall in the Forenoon,
and there will be Evening Meetings for the discussion of special subjects in Burlington House.
The Session of the Congress will be held in the Forenoon, in Burlington House.

A series of Soirées will be given during the period
of the Meeting; and it is intended to provide for visits to places and institutions illustrative of the objects of the Association.

Members' Tickets, price One Guinea each (entitled to the volume of "Transactions"), and Ladies' Tickets, price Half-a-Guinea, will admit to
all the Meetings of the Association and Congress,
and to the Soirées, &c.

Tickets will be issued, and every information
given, on application at the Offices of the Meeting
at Guildhall, E.C., and 12, Old Bond-street, W.

As the local expenses have in all former cases
been borne by the towns in which the Association
has met, and as the expenses of the London meeting
will necessarily be considerable, the Finance Committee appeal to the inhabitants of the City and the Metropolis for contributions in aid of the local fund.

For every 45 subscribers to this Fund, subscribers
are entitled to a Member's Ticket and a Lady's Ticket for the meeting.

Subscriptions will be received by Andrew Edgar,
Esq., Finance Secretary, at the office for the London
Meeting, 12, Old Bond-street, W., and at the City
Office, Guildhall, E.C., by Messrs. Messers, Bouvier, and Co., 1, Pall-mall East, S.W.; the London and Westminster Bank, Lombury, E.C.; the Union Bank,
Princes-street, E.C.; Messrs. Heywood, Kennard,
and Co., 4, Lombard-street, E.C.; and by Mr. George
Ledger, 4, Charlotte-row, Mansion House, E.C.

GEORGE W. HASTINGS, Hon. Gen. Sec.,
and Chairman of Finance Committee.
A. EDGAR, Finance Secretary.
G. WHITLEY, M.D., Foreign Secretary.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Bois de Boulogne, offers quarters of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Langier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 31st November, 1861, for which certificates will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gardin, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE: 78, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,333,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 600,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,750 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1850.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
H. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poux.
C. Rowland.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Stocomb.
B. F. Voorhies.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 801,576 74
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets on 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,959 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 31st September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI- CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.
These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and
land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £43 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primage.

PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 3s. each and upwards, according to size.
Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made
up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 329th section of the new Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, any dangerous goods, or any goods of any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving
notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board
any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum;
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to IX. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political,
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent,
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe, without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little
had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thought, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to "but one side of the quarrel." It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a per-
plexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply, so far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely in
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX" it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we
shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET-ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crane-court, Fleet-street, and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—June 26, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I.—No. 10.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 3, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	145
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	146
Manchester Letter	147
Tobacco Market	147
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Further List of Killed and Wounded at the Battle of Shiloh	147
Southern Account of the Battle before Richmond	148
Private Letters and Extracts	148
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
Summary of Confederate Official Report of the Campaigns in the West and East, during the months of February and March	149
Washington	150
Paris	150
Brussels	150
LEADERS—
The End of the Spring Campaign	152
The Approaching Prorogation of Parliament ..	152
The Ingredients of the Contending Armies ..	153
The Cotton Famine	154
REVIEW OF BOOKS—
Southern Statistics	155
The Colonial History of Virginia	156
OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE NAVAL ENGAGEMENT IN HAMPTON ROADS	158
ADVERTISEMENTS	160

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

GENERAL McCLELLAN has sustained another disaster. It does not appear that on this occasion the Confederates "took advantage of a terrible storm," but merely availed themselves of the vulnerability of the Federal lines to make an excursion to the enemy's rear, destroy some of his property, seize some of his stores, cut the telegraph wires, injure the railroad, kill and wound some Federal soldiers, and to capture a considerable number of troops. By a singular oversight, Mr. Stanton has not proclaimed this sortie to be a great Federal victory; hitherto whenever the Confederates have captured stores and made prisoners, it has always been styled in Washington a Federal triumph.

It appears from Northern accounts that a body of cavalry and artillery left Richmond, under the command of Colonel Fitz Hugh Lee, passed round the right flank of the Federal army, penetrated the Federal lines, and the next day drove in the Federal outposts of Old Church. The Confederates then proceeded to Garlick's Landing, on the Pamunkey River, where they burnt two schooners engaged in unloading forage, and captured seventy-five waggons laden with stores. Many of the Union troops at that point were killed, and the rest made prisoners.

The Confederates then marched to Tunstall's Station, fired into a train, killing or wounding a Federal colonel, and killing a Federal private. The railroad was then torn up for some distance, and the telegraph wires were cut. The Confederates next proceeded to Baltimore cross-roads, where a small number of the enemy were captured and a large amount of medical stores; they then crossed the Chickahominy between Bottom's Bridge and the James River, en route for Richmond. The correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer is correct in remarking that the Confederate "entrance was made by the right, though their exit was effected by the left."

Such is the substance of the Northern narrative, and if we are to receive it as the whole truth, we must conclude that General McClellan is a wonderfully incompetent general, or that his troops are greatly disorganized and demoralized. We are told that the Confederate forces did not exceed 1500 men and six pieces of artillery, and some accounts place the number of troops at less than 1000. We are told that the Confederate force remained for some hours in the Federal lines unobserved. Why does not General McClellan employ some balloons to look after his own lines? But when the Federal outposts were driven in at Old Church, the presence of the Confederates could no longer have been a secret. To what point were the Federal outposts driven? We presume they were forced back on the main body of the division to which they belonged. But how was it the division, thus roused, did not prevent such a small body of the enemy from quietly burning shipping and capturing stores and men at Garlick's Landing, and afterwards cutting the telegraph wires and injuring the railroad at Tunstall's Station? Was the division defeated or panic-stricken? This suggestion is rendered more probable by the wording of the Northern telegram, which says the Confederates "destroyed forage and tents, took many prisoners, and retreated safely." The forage and prisoners may be accounted for by the attack upon Garlick's Landing; but what tents were destroyed? The destruction of tents is surely a sequence of defeat.

After the demonstration at Tunstall's Station, we are informed that the Confederates "retreated safely." This "retreated safely" means that instead of retiring to Richmond by the way they came the Confederates made their exit by the left, having entered on the right, seizing on their march more prisoners, and a large booty of medical stores. They were allowed to enter unmolested on one side, and to carry off their booty unmolested on the opposite side. Comment is needless, such facts speak for themselves.

General McClellan is harassed by small Confederate bands in his rear, and is making urgent appeals to Washington for more men. The Northern telegram, dated June 18, says:—

The rear of McClellan's army before Richmond continues to be harassed by guerilla movements.

McClellan is not in sufficient force to resume the offensive. He has demanded large reinforcements. The demand has been partially complied with, but the Government has not the force at its disposal to grant him immediately all the men he requires.

We hear, per North America, under date June 21, that

An active skirmish has taken place before Richmond, the Confederates assuming a more menacing attitude.

The Confederates opened fire upon the Federal fleet at City Point. The Federals returned the attack, silencing the Confederate batteries.

It is significant that the result of the active skirmish is not stated. Perhaps that skirmish will account for the currency of "wild rumours of the defeat and success of McClellan." We may be sure that if the Federals had met with any success the Government would not have kept back the news.

The telegraphic summary of the Federal commander's despatch is really pathetic.

General McClellan reports this afternoon (June 21) that "things are pretty quiet to-day, and there is not quite so much shelling as usual. Our preparations," he continues, "are progressing well. The enemy opened fire with some heavy guns yesterday, but did no harm."

It must be highly gratifying to the people of the North to know that on June 21 their idolized General is preparing to make a beginning. A trifle less of promising, and an instalment of performance, would probably be very acceptable to his ardent admirers.

The Federal left-handed victory of May 31 has crippled General McClellan. The losses are much heavier than at first stated or even now admitted. A correspondent of the Times, whose letter we publish, puts the number of killed, wounded, and missing at 16,000, and advises his friends not to heed the newspapers or official despatches. In our Southern intelligence will be found a very interesting account of the fighting on May 31 and June 1.

General McDowell, who commanded General McClellan's rear, has effected a junction with the forces of the latter.

The Times's New York correspondent reports that a telegram authorized by the Federal Government, which stated some days ago that Little Rock, the capital of Arkansas, had been occupied by a Federal force under General Curtis, is unfounded. That city still remains in the possession of the Confederates.

The brilliant operations of General Jackson in the Shenandoah Valley, and for a late account of which we refer to our Foreign Correspondence, have completely destroyed the Federal plans. The Northern prints publish the following document, which they say was found in Winchester after General Jackson left that place:—

Head-Quarters, Department of Northern Virginia,
May 27, 1862, 9 o'clock, 15 minutes.

To General T. J. Jackson.

General,—I have just received your letter of yesterday, by Lieutenant Boswell. A copy of a despatch telegraphed by that officer from Staunton reached me this morning. After reading, I wrote to you by a special messenger, suggesting a movement threatening Washington and Baltimore, unless the enemy still has in your vicinity force enough to make it rash to attempt it. He has no force beyond the Potomac to make it dangerous; only what he has on this side need be considered.

You cannot, in your present position, employ such an army as yours upon any enterprise not bearing directly upon the state of things here, either by preventing the reinforcements to McClellan's army, or by drawing troops from it by divisions. These objects might be accomplished by the demonstrations proposed above, or by a movement upon McDowell, although I fear that by the time this reaches you it will be too late for either. The most important service you can render the country is the preventing the further strengthening of McClellan's army. If you find it too late for that, strike the most important body of the enemy you can reach. You compel me to publish orders announcing your success so often that you must expect repetition of expressions.

Yours very truly, J. E. JOHNSON.

If these were General Jackson's instructions they have certainly been rigidly obeyed. On June 18,

General Fremont's army is reported short of supplies, and in a precarious position in the Valley of the Shenandoah.

General Jackson has been heavily reinforced, and Fremont is falling back to Mount Jackson.

The last Northern advices state:—

General Jackson has a considerable force at Harrisonburg and Fort Republic.

General Shields has concentrated his forces at Strasburg. Fremont is advancing to New Market, and an engagement is expected in the Valley of the Shenandoah.

Perhaps General Jackson, with true Confederate obstinacy, may refuse the battle so nicely arranged, and elect to defeat the enemy in his own way. The most sanguine Northerners cannot think the Federal position in Virginia very promising.

Per Persia, under date June 18, we are informed:

General Beauregard is still in the field, at the head of 8000 men at Okolona.

Per North America, with date three days later, we hear:—

Beauregard is at Okolona with 80,000 men. Kirby Smith is at Chattanooga, 20,000 strong; and Vandorn, with a small cavalry force, is at Granada.

It is singular that General Beauregard's force should have increased from 8000 to 80,000 in three days. Under the circumstances, we are not surprised that "General Pope has relinquished the pursuit of Beauregard," especially as General Pope has never been in pursuit of the Confederate General.

It is reported in the Northern papers that the Confederate force at Granada is 65,000.

Our next item deserves attention:—

It is reported that the Federals will now form a defensive line from Corinth to Memphis, and abandon their aggressive policy in the West during the summer months.

Will any one be good enough to tell us something about the "aggressive" policy of General Halleck that is now to be abandoned? We are under the impression that aggression and inaction are not the same thing, and we know that General Halleck has done nothing. Possibly he has determined, during the summer months, to relinquish his romantic pen, and not gain any more paper victories, or capture any more prisoners with his goosequill.

Commodore Farragut has failed in his attempt to reduce Vicksburg, and it is rumoured that Captain Davis is preparing to attack it on the other side. The Federals before Charleston are to be reinforced with the troops from the West. It is reported that great efforts will be made to defend Mobile. General Buell's army has left for East Tennessee, via Huntsville. It is said that the "Federal gunboats have captured a Confederate battery on White River after a sharp engagement." This may be true, or only a Stanton invention to make the Federal accounts a little brighter.

The following paragraphs are suggestively vague:

Severe fighting has occurred in the neighbourhood of Baton Rouge, but the result is unknown.

Fighting has also taken place at James Island, near Charleston, without decisive results.

At Baton Rouge there was evidently a result, and it is curious that the fight should be reported, and not the result. "Without decisive results" has hitherto stood for "the Confederates had the best of the encounter;" and this was most likely the case at James Island.

Our Foreign Correspondence contains an account of the Confederate operations during the months of February and March, compiled from official documents. Our readers will also find in another part of our impression the official account of the celebrated naval battle in Hampton Roads.

At Memphis it has been found necessary to appoint a Federal supervisor of the press, and "Federal sentinels have received orders to shoot any persons attempting to lower the Federal flag or to molest Union citizens."

The Hon. Pierre Soule has arrived at New York, and is confined in Fort Lafayette. It is rumoured that the charges against him are that he is President of a society formed to oppose the Union, and that he composed the spirited letter sent to Commander Farragut by the Mayor of New Orleans.

General Butler, who has lately had the pleasure of hanging a man for lowering the Federal flag from the mint, has defended his shameful edict in the following letter to the Mayor:—

Head-Quarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, May 16.

Sir,—There can be, there has been, no room for misunderstanding of General Order No. 28.

No lady will take any notice of a strange gentleman, and a fortiori of a stranger, simply in such form as to attract attention. Common women do.

Therefore, whatever woman, lady or mistress, gentle or simple, who, by gesture, look, or word, insults, shows contempt for, thus attracting to herself the notice of, my officers and soldiers, will be deemed to act as becomes her vocation as a common woman, and will be liable to be treated accordingly. This was most fully explained to you at my office.

I shall not, as I have not, abated a single word of that order; it was well considered; if obeyed, will protect the true and modest women from all possible insult. The others will take care of themselves.

You can publish your letter, if you publish this note and your apology.

Respectfully,

BENJ. F. BUTLER, Major-General Commanding.

John T. Monroe, Mayor of New Orleans.

General Butler fully admits the enormity with which he was charged. He admits he has licensed his soldiers to treat as harlots any Southern ladies who, in the opinion of his officers and soldiers, may by gesture, look, or word, show contempt for the invaders of their country. Any Federal officer or private may treat a New Orleans lady as a harlot, and be excused by saying that her gesture or look was not respectful. The explanation is as bad, if not worse, than the edict.

The House of Representatives has passed a bill confiscating the slaves of "rebels;" and likewise the Senate Bill prohibiting slavery in all the territories of the United States. It would be wise, we think, for the North to conquer the South before commencing the work of confiscation. Mr. Lincoln is too shrewd to dispose of the lion's skin until the lion is killed. In reply to the Emancipation Committee, he said, "that an emancipation proclamation would not attain the desired end, as the Constitution itself cannot now be enforced in the Southern States." It is true, Mr. Lincoln would have been more correct if he had said that it was no use confiscating Southern property until the violation of the Constitution could be enforced in the South.

The protective policy of the North is being eagerly pursued. The Committee of Ways and Means have reported a bill largely increasing the temporary duties upon imports, imposing an additional duty of 25c. per gallon upon brandy, and an additional duty upon all spirits, iron, copper, coal, carpets, woollens, books, tobacco, coke, and drugs; in fact, upon all articles of foreign importation.

The United States is determined to try how many insults and threats England will submit to. The Circassian has been condemned. The Naval Committee have reported a Bill to Congress establishing naval depôts and yards on Lakes Erie, Michigan, and Ontario. The idea of invading Canada is exceedingly popular, and therefore the Government encourage it.

Mr. Lincoln is about to make a call for additional troops, and it is likely he will find it easier to get men than the money to carry on the war.

On June 21 gold was 6½ premium, and the City of Washington had that day left with 2,400,000 dollars in specie. A financial crash is generally supposed to be imminent.

On Monday, in the House of Commons,

Mr. Hopwood asked the First Lord of the Treasury whether Government intended to take any steps to endeavour to put an end to the civil war in America.

Lord Palmerston said, I trust I need not assure the hon. member and the House that Her Majesty's Government are deeply sensible of the sufferings now existing in the cotton manufacturing districts. We know that the privations in those districts are great, and also that those who suffer them have endured them with the most heroic fortitude and patience (hear, hear), thus doing the greatest possible credit to their understanding and intelligence. They know that the sufferings which they endure have not resulted from any bad legislation or any misconduct on the part of the Government of the country. They know they are caused by circumstances in other countries over which we have no control. (Hear, hear.) Her Majesty's Government would be most happy if it were in their power to do anything which would be likely to afford relief to those unhappy classes of the population. But I am sure the House will see that anything like interference with the war now going on would only aggravate still more the sufferings of those now under privation. (Hear.) With respect to mediation and good offices, there is no doubt whatever that both Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French would be delighted to avail themselves of any opportunity that appeared to offer a fair prospect that such a step would be attended with success. But in the present state of the contest, while the two parties seem animated with the most vehement anger and resentment against each other, I am afraid that any proposal of that kind would not be well timed, and would be sure to meet with objection on both sides. If, however, at any time, a different state of things should arise and a fair opening appear for any step which might be likely to meet with the acquiescence of the two parties, it would be not only our duty to offer our services, but would afford us the greatest possible pleasure to do so. (Hear, hear.)

In the House of Lords, Lord Brougham called attention to the war in America. He said:—

For upwards of sixty years he had been known as a warm advocate at all times of the American Government and the American people. Same might recollect that he was once called the partizan of Jefferson and the Attorney-General of Madison. Others, too, who had uniformly taken the part of the Americans, were now most cruelly shocked and disappointed by the present course of events. If the civil war continued they would be bound to admit that the worst stain on the American character was not domestic slavery. The white men had suffered more in the war than ever did the negroes under the most cruel of their masters. The present strife was doing more mischief, creating more misery, and laying the foundation of more lasting animosity, even than slavery. If the Americans would only listen to the voice of their true friends they would, if they regarded the continuance of their reputation in this country and of our affection towards them, see the absolute necessity of putting an end to this horrible war. He could not, for his life, believe that the good sense of those among the Americans who were better informed and capable of calm reflection, would not, sooner or later, be exerted to put a stop to this calamitous quarrel.

The report of the emigration during the past year to our North American colonies has just been published, and shows that they have benefited in this respect by the American war. The number of persons landed at Quebec during the season was 19,923, or 9773 more than in the previous year. There were also 4664 arrivals in Canada by the American route. At all times, however, a large proportion of those who sail hence for the St. Lawrence intend to proceed to the United States, and on the present occasion the total was 10,700, so that out of 24,587 arrivals in the province the aggregate that actually remained was 13,887.

The latest intelligence from Mexico is considered very favourable by the French. No doubt is entertained of the perfect safety of General Lorencez's army.

The principal domestic event of the week is the marriage of the Princess Alice to Prince Louis of Hesse. It was solemnized at Osborn on Tuesday last.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, July 2, 1862.

The past week has been in every point of view a more extraordinary one than the preceding, whether we consider the amount of sales, the advance in prices, or the furious speculation and excitement. Indeed, it is doubtful whether a parallel can be found to it in the whole history of the cotton trade of this port.

Our last report left Middling Orleans at 15d. and Fair Dhollerahs at 10½d. to 11d. On Thursday the demand continued good, much additional business being done in the afternoon on telegrams from London, the sales reached 20,000 bales at ¾d. to 1d. advance in Surats, but no change in American. On Friday the Persia's news came to hand about two p.m., and strengthened the feeling already prevalent that the forces of the two parties were so evenly balanced that nothing but a protracted conflict was possible. An immense demand at once sprang up in the market, and the sales reached 25,000 bales at ¾d. to 1d. advance in American cotton, and ¾d. in Surats. In cotton "to arrive" a very large business was done, and Dhollerahs, which were selling freely in the morning at 10½d. were eagerly bought in the afternoon at 11d.

On Saturday the excitement in our market grew wilder than ever. 30,000 bales were sold at a fresh advance of ¾d. on both American and Surats. Fair Dhollerah was pushed up to 12½d., and middling Orleans to 15½d. An enormous business was also done "to arrive," and the closing quotations were 1d. to 1½d. above the rates of Friday morning, actual cases occurring in which re-sales were made at 1½d. advance on the day before. Dhollerahs of early shipment were sold at 11½d., and Broach was understood to be done at 12½d.

On Monday speculators returned to their task with unabated eagerness, the sales reaching 20,000 bales, and again prices were started about ¾d. Fair Dhollerahs at 13d. and middling Orleans at 16½d., but cotton to arrive showed a smaller advance, and 12d. was the extreme price attained for Dhollerah. On Tuesday morning there seemed some disposition to take breath, and wait the response from Manchester, but as the day wore on large orders arrived to buy, and the business reached 15,000 bales, at a further rise of ¾d. to 1d. To-day the "North Americans" news was before us, and gave increased confidence to buyers. Attention was called to the precarious situation of McClellan's army before Richmond, and the reported resolutions of the Federals to adopt a defensive policy in the South-west confirmed the general opinion that the progress of the war would be slow and indecisive. A very heavy business has again been done, sales reaching 25,000 bales, and the demand running more on America than formerly, and prices are about 3d. up for that class and 3d. for Surat. In Brazil and Egyptian cotton very large sales have taken place at a greater rise than in America. Those descriptions have long been relatively cheap, and are now being bought freely to mix with American cotton.

The quotations for Middling American may be given to-day as 16 1/2d. for Orleans, 16 1/2d. for Mobiles, and 16 1/2d. for Bowdles. In Surats it is hardly possible to fix the values of the different grades, as the market is already swept of desirable parcels, and the various qualities are all huddled together in the most extraordinary manner. Fair Dhollerah and Omrawtee may be put at 13 1/2d. to 3d.; Broach, at 14 1/2d.; and Saw-ginned Dharwar, at 14 1/2d. to 15d. Scarcely any cotton can be found under 12 1/2d., and very poor stuff, indeed, is selling at 13d. In cotton "to arrive," a very heavy business has again been done to-day, and the current prices now paying for early shipments are 12 1/2d. to 12 3/4d.; for Dhollerahs, 12 1/2d. to 12 3/4d.; for Omrawtees, and 13d. for Broach. The total advance in our market since this day week is therefore 1 1/2d. to 2d. on American cotton, 2 1/2d. for Surats on the spot, and 2d. on cotton afloat. The returns last Friday showed sales of 158,000 bales, leaving the stock at 210,000 bales; it is not impossible that the returns next Friday may show the sales and stock for the week equal. Perhaps the nearest approach to this occurred in the year 1825, when 101,000 bales were sold in the week ending April 23, out of a stock of about 120,000 bales, and the rise in prices for the week was 2d. on American, 3d. on Brazil and Egyptian, and 2d. on Surats. Fair Bowdles were then quoted at 18d. per lb., having risen to that point from 9 1/2d., at which they stood at the beginning of the year; and it may be added that they kept declining almost without a pause till they reached 7 1/2d. at the end of the same year.

It is hard to believe that this furious speculation in our market will prove an exception to all former experience, and escape the inevitable retribution. However strong the prospects may be ultimately, it is evident that speculators are determined to discount them to the uttermost farthing, and take out of the market in two or three weeks all the advance which could justly be looked for in several months. A perfect frenzy has now got possession of the public mind, and all sorts of persons are rushing into the market under the impression that prices must go on advancing indefinitely till some fabulous point is attained. Attention is exclusively fixed on the decreasing stock and the ruinous state of affairs in Manchester is quite overlooked. Spinners there are wholly unable to get an advance at all corresponding with that on the raw material; where they are paying 5d. more for their Surats in the month, it is doubtful whether they can sell their yarn at 3d. advance, and it seems inevitable that there must soon be a further great contraction of the consumption, and then, when the excitement in our market calms down, the usual result must follow. The trade having bought large stocks, and facing a ruinous loss, will reduce their purchases to a mere trifle, while the export demand will cease in sympathy; the business may fall to 10 or 15,000 bales per week, while large arrivals of Surats take place, and in that sensitive state the market would be peculiarly open to political rumours from America. This period of mad excitement may be followed by one of great stagnation and depression, and the high water mark reached now may remain like that of the 9th January—a long time high and dry before the tide covers it again.

Prices of Surat Cotton are now far higher relatively than American, and the tendency is to throw the trade back more freely in the latter class.

MANCHESTER, July 1, 1862.

This market has been daily excited by accounts from Liverpool, and few sellers remain willing to accept what offers they receive. All more or less, are asking wide advances, or have withdrawn their goods entirely. Now that stocks have been much reduced by late operations, manufacturers feel themselves at liberty to wait, especially since the capital released from holding goods has been reinvested in the raw material, with every prospect in the latter of less and less supplies hereafter. Accordingly, buyers have had to be content with what goods they could obtain, and for necessary wants have had to pay whatever was required. Such absolute orders have again chiefly been limited to yarns mainly, warps and cops for the Continent, and mule to the East; but, in odd transactions, special cloths have also really felt a gain of 6d. per piece. Transactions of this character have, however, been the exception; as a whole, a merely distant response has been given to the surpassing energy of the cotton demand.

At to-day's market the continued excitement in Liverpool has further influenced holders of yarns to advance their prices, and business has been considerably checked by the enhanced quotations. Buyers, however, have been compelled to pay a large advance on the prices given this day week, more especially where quality of material has to be regarded in the fulfilling of imperative orders.

Little business is going on in a regular way. Where holders of stocks meet buyers at more or less of a compromise, they are effecting sales.

This state of things will lead to a further curtailment of production, and it is heartrending to anticipate the inevitable distress which must necessarily arise from the effects of the fratricidal war now raging on the other side of the Atlantic, cutting off the supplies of the raw material and causing ruinous disaster, not only to the operatives but to their employers.

THE TOBACCO MARKET,

LONDON, July 2, 1862.

It may be well to call attention briefly to the position and prospects of tobacco as it is affected by the war, a reference only to the stock of lbs. weight in the United Kingdom as just published in the Board of Trade Returns for the month ended May 31, might mislead. We have a large stock in the country, sufficient, probably, for a year and a half's consumption at the ordinary rate. There is no present deficiency; and whilst cotton has now advanced in price fully 100 per cent. above its average market value, under the plain indications of a rapidly diminishing stock, and small prospect of any substantial replenishment. Tobacco has not been the subject of any general speculation, the market having attained its present point, say about 50 per cent. above the average rate, in a gradual, steady advance and with little more than the ordinary operations of the trade. This is owing, no doubt, to the fact of the large stock, and we must look a-head to discern any cause for uneasiness from deficient supply to be actually expected from a war waged in the Border States, in which tobacco is chiefly cultivated.

The stocks in warehouses in Great Britain and Ireland:—

In lbs. weight, Dec. 31, 1860 ..	63,073,434
" " May 31, 1860 ..	55,155,841
" " Dec. 31, 1861 ..	70,523,892
" " May 31, 1862 ..	55,861,381

So that stocks, at the close of May last, were about as low as at the same time last year, notwithstanding the excess of upwards of 7,000,000 lbs. at the beginning of this year.

The gradual melting of supply is attributable to two causes, diminution of import and increase of export.

The imports for the periods as above were:—

	1861	1862
Five months to May 31	9,668,902 lbs. ..	6,355,215 lbs.
The Deliveries:—
Home use	14,511,142 ..	14,489,159 ..
Exportation	2,484,588 ..	6,382,670 ..

The revenue derived in Great Britain is about five and a-half millions, and in France, equal to 8,000,000 sterling. The other regions of Europe derive a heavy revenue from the Government monopoly. The continuance of the war will, therefore, severely affect the revenue of most European Governments, so far as derived from American tobacco, as the prevalence of the war in the tobacco States has certainly greatly curtailed the cultivation of tobacco, and its preparation in the interior for European markets. The crop of 1861 is now coming forward from Kentucky and Tennessee, and will be received in this country in the Autumn of this year; in Virginia it is looked up, and will not be reclaimed till the war is concluded, or the blockade raised. But in Virginia the chief seat of a war which has diverted all the ordinary labour of the country to its own wasteful purposes, hardly any tobacco can be raised, and in the other tobacco States only such amount as may consist with the inducement to grow the absolute necessities of life, and the proportion of hands that can be spared for agricultural purposes at all.

The real deficiency in tobacco created by the war will not be felt till next year; but it will assuredly be felt then, and this coming event might cast a good long shadow before it.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

FOURTH LIST OF KILLED AND PARTIAL LIST OF WOUNDED AT THE BATTLE OF SHILOH.

LAFORCUE CREOLES AND GUARDS.

The killed in the Lafourche Creoles are Alcide Bare, Guedry, Hymel, McEvers, Rouvert, Achée, Auguste Boudreaux, Brogde, J. Bottle Guillot, Levron, Parés Rouge, Dantin, White. Wounded: Bourgeois, Chac, Falgout, Joseph Leonard, Franklin Ancon, Thibodaux, Buck, François Guillot, Badaux, Delaney, Gbori, Lombas, Pedras, Knoblock, Dos. Boudreaux, Marcel, Ledet. Killed in Lafourche Guards: Auicksall Corbit and Prosper Le Blanc.

CRESCENT REGIMENT.

Crescent City Guards, Company A.—Killed: Private William Meeker. Wounded: Lieutenants B. E. Hand and L. H. Legay; Privates William Waterson, and — Dysart.

Crescent Rifles, Company B.—Killed: Sergeant John Laurens; Privates — Johnson, R. S. Camm, F. R. Grimshaw. Wounded: Captain Andrew F. Haynes; Sergeants Charles E. Black, and C. F. W. Danks; Privates F. J. Baldwin, Jr., B. Frist, J. D. Kemper, Edward Carter, Jr., F. R. Southmayd, William L. Black, Ben Wall.

Louisiana Guard, Company C.—Killed: Captain G. H. Graham; Privates John Sinclair, D. A. Clark. Wounded: Sergeant L. D. Cook, Colour-Sergeant H. T. Shilling, Corporal T. B. Chance, Privates John B. S. Dimitry, E. C. Kelley, Paul Laparie, A. M. Pepper, Isidore Richards, Joseph O'Brien.

Beauregard Rangers, Company D.—Killed: Private W. J. Mason. Wounded: Sergeant P. Carpiette, Privates H. Ries, J. Mulhall, E. W. Mudge, W. A. Smith, S. A. James, G. F. Fuchs.

Twiggs Guard, Company E.—Killed: Sergeant Henry Sherry, Privates James Cullen, F. H. Salles, Corporal J. M. Kennedy. Wounded: Charles Pagod.

Crescent City Guard, Company F.—Killed: Private B. Horner. Wounded: Privates W. S. Wiggins, Thomas Healey, Sylsbe and Harnett, Sergeant Geo. P. Betts.

Ruggles' Guard, Company G.—Killed: Privates C. M. Price, and J. B. Joseph. Wounded: Corporal Buchanan, Privates R. Kuck, J. F. Rehbein, Charles C. Kennedy, E. N. Stringer, and Corporal H. C. Swain.

Orleans Cadets, Company H.—Killed: Private Theodore Shulta. Wounded: Lieuts. S. C. Fisher, Lieut. H. C. Perry, Sergeant R. W. Kennedy, Corporals D. Wicks and M. Powers, Privates P. A. Newton, R. B. Cenas, H. Surgi.

Crescent Blues, Company I.—Killed: Privates Samuel B. Todd, Carl Sodawasser, (drummer). Wounded: Capt. John Knight, Corporal B. F. Chambers, and Privates G. W. Stone, John Thiner, Geo. French, F. Ostreich, John G. White, W. R. Elliott, Fred. de Meza, A. Reese.

Sumter Rifles Company — Killed: Captain C. C. Campbell, Private H. Macanlay. Wounded: Sergeants John Collins, and W. D. Hyer, Corporal A. Myers, Privates Thomas Leggin, Conner, Larkin, D. Peters, Geo. D. Hipwell, Oscar Czarnowski, J. G. Gorman, Samuel Laycock.

Alexandria Rifles, Company K.—Killed: Privates Beck and Kennedy. Wounded: Lieut. Fellowes, Privates Dunmore, Walter O'Crain, M'Grath.

PARTIAL LIST OF THE WOUNDED.

Jas. Winborn, 3rd Miss., Jno. Kegan, 2nd Tenn., J. J. Thomas, 4th Ky., Wm. Adams, 5th Ky., Jas. Chancellor, 5th Ky., Ed. Kerns, 5th Ky., Craig Taylor, 5th Ky., E. S. Trask, 15th Mi., Clark Owen, 4th Ky., R. G. Methvin, 16th La., Thos. Babin, 15th Tenn., G. P. Gett, 2nd Ky., G. L. Miller, 5th Miss., W. A. Fulger, 27th Tenn., D. Gootamer, 4th La., John Rider, 16th Mo., Albert Marsh, 6th Miss., Millhorne 19th Tenn., Lieut. A. S. Lee, 23rd Tenn., Lieut. C. W. Todd, 23rd Tenn., Wm.

Hurd, 5th Tenn., Pat Forely, 15th La., Phillip Connel, 2nd Ark., Geo. Nelson, D. O. Neil, 20th Tenn., R. Goss, 45th Tenn., P. H. Clay, 6th Tenn., Jacob Miller, 154th Tenn., J. M. Manes, 23rd Tenn., S. J. Hoke, 31st Ala., Jas. Nelson, 1st Mo., Willie Collough, 13th La., B. Cotton, 4th La., John Davis, 4th La., Capt. Ishin, 9th Ark., W. M. Laseter, 5th Tenn., Lieut. B. King, A. A. Gen. to Gen. Ruggles, since dec'd, M. L. Bickam, 17th La., J. L. Williams, 1st La., M. Divine, 2nd Ark., W. O'Donogh, 9th Tenn., C. Perkins, 7th Ark., S. Abain, 4th La., William O'Conough, 2nd Ark., M. Divine, 2nd Ark., Jas. Mugger, 18th La., J. A. Dijnac, 18th La., W. D. Huff, 13th La., Sergt. L. Hurkee, 1st La., R. G. Sims, 22nd Tenn., G. W. McClelland, 6th Miss., T. M. Ballard, 1st Tenn., Wm. Smith, 1st La., W. D. Brink, 9th Tenn., R. M. Mabry, 28th Tenn., H. C. Robeiro, 18th Ala., Joe Tipton, 18th Tenn., A. L. Hines, 15th Tenn., S. R. Timberlake, 15th Miss., Wm. Cullena, 23rd Miss., T. Elkhart, 1st La., B. C. Cordon, 44th Tenn., J. Ferguson, 1st La., W. Dougherty, 1st La., C. Malloy, 1st La., T. Carter, 1st La., M. F. Calaway, 9th Ark., Dennis Stone, 19th Tenn., J. M. Rieves, 23rd Tenn., W. J. Whittington, 4th Ky., Jos. Dutret, 13th La., J. S. Whittington, 4th Ky., A. Hart, 22nd Ala., Jno. Gray, 19th Tenn., C. Cohen, 1st Ark., Jno. Hodge, 1st Ark., C. Wright, 1st Ark., W. H. Cook, 4th La., W. J. Fletcher, 31st La., J. M. Jones, 15th Miss., J. R. Wilkins, 15th Miss., J. H. Shepperd, 15th Miss., E. D. Crawford, 19th Tenn., E. Sexton, 1st La., J. J. Powell, 15th Miss., Wm. Mitchell, 1st Ark., T. Graies, 15th Miss., H. Sundown, 1st Ark., H. C. Arrington, 23rd Tenn., John Lowery, 26th Ala., Capt. Trezevant, 1st La., Capt. W. F. Hanby, 19th Ala., R. Latham, 9th Ark., R. C. Reap, 9th Ark., J. M. Ezell, 20th Tenn., J. A. King, 21st Ala., John Hines, 15th Tenn., H. F. Finkley, 3rd Miss., W. Corters, 21st Ala., Jno. Ruff, 2nd Miss., T. J. Bigley, 20th Tenn., Col. M. Martin, 23rd Tenn., David Parsons, 1st La., P. Payton, 15th Miss., Jno. M'Farland, 15th Tenn., R. Allen, 1st La., J. H. Pratt, 27th Tenn., Lieut. R. S. Anderson, Shoup's Bat., A. Milton, 1st La., W. B. Booty, 27th Tenn., T. L. Roswell, 27th Tenn., Isaac Abbott, 13th Ark., D. C. Seales, Q. M. Depot, J. J. Richardson, 12th Tenn., J. D. Vaughn, 25th Ala., J. T. Walker, J. B. Morgan, 27th Tenn., B. H. Smith, 6th Tenn., A. J. Kennedy, 12th Tenn., C. W. Raglan, 7th Ky., J. M. Rea, Hooper's Battery, Wm. Taylor, 12th Tenn., S. M'Call, 1st Mo., J. E. Peacock, 15th Miss., W. H. Oglerie, 20th Tenn., J. H. Johnson, 20th Tenn., T. Falvey, 20th Tenn., B. F. Clark, 1st La., Robert M'Elwin, 1st La., John Murteff, 1st La., W. E. Fugh, 15th Mi., P. Sweney, 21st Ala., A. T. Embry, 6th Ark., C. C. Frierson, 15th Miss., M. W. Tate, 4th La., J. H. Plunkett, 6th Ark., John Porter, 1st La., A. J. O'Neal, Smith's cav., Jas. Williams, Smith's cav., G. C. Meek, 19th La., T. R. Carter, 19th La., T. Olson, 22nd Miss., Lt. Col. J. Holtzlaw, 18th Ark., Sam. Reynolds, 3rd Confed. Miss., Eli Sparks, 25th Ala., Sterling Hedron, 2nd Confed. Miss., G. M. Drake, 1st Mo., Capt. S. Fowl, 154th Tenn., John O'Brian, 1st La., Jno. Holly, 1st La., W. H. Perkins, 15th Miss., J. F. Gandy, 3rd Miss. Batr., W. Walker, 154th Tenn., F. M. Green, 3rd Miss. Bat., R. H. Hall, 3rd Miss. Bat., Jarvis Seal, 3rd Miss. Bat., H. K. Vinkley, 3rd Miss. Bat., J. Nicholson, 2nd Ark., Capt. A. E. Mixson, 6th Ark., W. H. Daniel, Hubbard's Battery, R. E. Mixson, 6th Ark., W. K. Harrison, 6th Ark., Jas. Larkin, 8th Ark., C. A. Yarbrough, 2nd Tennessee, G. M. Crowell, 16th Ala., Thos. Redd, 16th Ala., D. Smith, 1st Ark., P. H. Phillips, 6th Ark., D. Cassard, 13th La., Lieut. J. W. Hunt, T. Whitty, 8th Ark., Lieut. Allan, 13th Tenn., J. B. Tyler, 6th Ark., F. M. Anderson, 27th Tenn., W. T. Eppinger, 1st La., Thos. Kearny, 1st La., M. Stewart, 1st La., P. Knowland, 1st La., H. Brothers, and G. A. Kirk, Bligh's Miss. Regt., E. M. Roach, 27th Tenn., I. I. Thompson, 27th Tenn., B. J. Semmes, 154th Tenn., J. Fmdy, 21st Ala., S. L. Mosely, Forest's cav., J. M'Wase, 154th Tenn., Wm. McDonald, 1st La., Capt. W. L. Huff, Bligh's Miss., J. Sanderson, 27th Tenn., R. A. Morton, 11th Ala., Lieut. Pat Henry, 6th Miss., C. C. Honus, 22nd Ala., Co. D, John Field, 1st La., J. C. Myrick, 154th Tenn., Wm. James, Bligh's Miss., L. P. Roberts, 26th Ala., W. G. Stanfield, 154th Tenn., M. Cummings, 154th Tenn., J. A. Hagathy, 15th Tenn., Capt. J. C. Brannon, 44th Tenn., F. Weller, 154th Tenn., Sergt. Chas. Johnson, 1st La., Pat Ryao, 1st La., Ed. Bue, 1st La., John Taylor, 1st La., — Spain, 154th Tenn., M. V. Todd, Bligh's Regt., C. M. Crouch, 4th Tenn., Jno. Cruise, Co. E, La., J. W. Petit, 154th Tenn., W. T. Percb, 20th Tenn., F. Johnson, 18th Ala., T. L. Lewis, 18th Ala., Jas. King, 27th Tenn., N. Higgins, 20th Tenn., D. Dennin, 3rd Confederates, B. H. Montgomery, 8th Ark., D. Sutton, 22nd Miss., W. Boreland, 12th Tenn., J. M. Hawkins, 22nd Tenn., Lieut. Pat Kerns, 2nd Tenn., Col. Allen, 4th La., Lieut. B. F. Myers, 5th Tenn., Wm. Ramsey, 13th Tenn., Jas. Neill, 13th Tenn., Jas. Morgan, Wm. Horman, 1st Ark., C. J. Witt, 15th Tenn., W. C. Haviland, 16th Ala., Lieut. R. B. Reddick, 12th Mi., W. W. Patrou, 16th Ark., M. C. Jones, 1st Ark., W. A. Hart, 15th Miss., J. Paizee, 18th La., John Calhoun, La. Independent, D. W. Gibson, 22nd Ala., J. H. McNeil, 22nd Ala., R. D. M'Cutcheon, 154th Tenn., B. F. Seth, 16th La., H. Garr, Smith's Battery, R. C. Kennedy, 1st La., Ed. Craigen, 13th La., Frank Mulligan, 2nd Ark., Felix Williams, 45th Tenn., J. H. Shipley, 10th Ark., P. Murphy, 1st La., R. I. Ogilvie, 45th Tenn., H. Simmonds, 5th Tenn., M. Thompson, 3rd Confed. Miss., W. J. Taylor, 24th Tenn., Thos. Peay, 11th La., R. L. Flyno, 6th Ark., J. E. Byum, 22nd Tenn., C. F. Bright, 2nd Tenn., M. J. Black, 26th Ala., J. H. Harper, 27th Tenn., R. Crough, J. W. Owen, J. E. Morton, S. A. Carr, 5th Tenn., M. M'Dermott, 1st La., C. Myer, J. Egan, 2nd Tenn., R. Collaugh, 1st La., Lieut. H. Cary, 3rd Confed. Miss., Capt. Cameron, 3rd Confed. Miss., G. Williams, 16th Ala., J. Jennings, Bligh's Miss., J. Roah, 22nd Ala., Capt. W. B. Yowat, 154th Tenn., Pat. Branon, 1st La., A. G. Bush, 2nd Tenn., Jas. Mullins, 1st La., J. Hark, 16th Ala., Gen. T. C. Hindman, Ark., Lieut. N. C. Biscoe, L. F. Brazil, 16th Ala., Ed. Bryant, 22nd Ala., S. Murphy, 2nd Tenn., W. F. English, 1st Ark., W. J. Conran, 154th Tenn., J. B. Ball, 154th Tenn., Capt. C. De Vaux, 21st Ala., S. Baggett, 13th Ark., A. M. Vandyke, 13th Tenn., J. H. Childs, 15th Miss., O. T. Rice, 27th Tenn., Lieut. P. Augustine, 21st Ala., J. W. M'Hughes, 13th Tenn., Seth Thomas, 27th Tenn., W. M. Bell, 2nd Tenn., Major Winn, 26th Ala., J. C. Glascock, 31st Ala., Wm. Rufferty, 2d Ark., W. O. Lucas, 15th Miss., D. T. Murley, Co. B, 4th La., T. L. Robinson, 9th Miss., W. J. McKinsay, 6th Miss., Wm. Brooks, 1st La., A. J. Wallace, 9th Ark., A. W. Sherrill, 9th Ark., Chas. Retchfort, 13th La., W. J. Wallace, 9th Ark., J. E. Rudolph, 9th Ark., F. A. Walters, 1st Ark., E. L. McCloud, 6th Miss., J. Russell, 18th Ala., E. T. Collins, 18th Ala., Lieut. T. Murry, 22nd Miss., G. W. Brown, 22nd Miss., A. A. Cooper, 22nd Miss., W. J. Falkner, 18th Ala., D. A. Greyer, 2nd Miss., E. Canterbury, 22nd Miss., M. Fox, 18th Ala., Lieut.-Col. C. G. Nelms, 22nd Miss., Jas. Shelby, 13th Tenn., Wm. Davenport, 13th Tenn., Fairfield, Cruise's Tenn. Battalion, Wm. Morris, Cruise's Tenn. Battalion, Wm. Walker, 15th Miss.

A SOUTHERN ACCOUNT OF THE BATTLE BEFORE RICHMOND.

Special correspondence of the Memphis (Tennessee) Appeal.
RICHMOND, May 1, 1862.

The storm of last evening was one of the most violent and long continued that we have known in Virginia for years. From half-past four in the afternoon till long past midnight, the sky was a sea of fire, so vividly and incessantly did the flashes of lightning succeed each other; while peal upon peal of thunder broke upon the ear with startling vibrations. There was something awfully impressive in the elemental fury, coming upon us as it did when the rage of battle was expected, and causing two great armies to pause in their hostile operations and witness the grandeur of nature.

The effects of the tempest we have no means of knowing as yet to the full extent. Just at its height, about half-past nine in the evening, all the lights in the city were suddenly extinguished by the inundation of the gas works—leaving the vast majority of our citizens without other illumination than the momentary glare of the lightning.

This morning an officer came into town and reported that the camp of an Alabama regiment had been visited by a thunder-bolt, which struck a tall pine, and, descending to the earth, scattering in every direction, killing two men, and prostrating thirty or forty others, besides destroying the horses of the field-officers. I give this statement as narrated to me by that officer himself, without vouching for the truth of it.

The vast quantity of water discharged from the clouds is shown in the James river to-day, which is several feet above its accustomed level, and pours over the falls with angry volume. The drivers of the market carts tell us the Chickahominy is swollen far beyond any freshest of late years; and as the heaviest portion of the cloud was in that direction, this would seem extremely probable.

About one o'clock to-day a furious cannonade was commenced, as near as we can judge from the sound, in the neighbourhood of Bottom's Bridge, thirteen miles east of the city, and has been kept up with little intermission to the time of this writing, six p.m. The reports were louder and in more rapid succession than any we have yet heard. The streets are full of rumours with regard to the occasion of the firing, but no couriers have arrived from the field to bring definite intelligence. The story runs that a large body of the Yankees, variously estimated from twelve to forty thousand, crossed Chickahominy yesterday, and being unable to get back again, in consequence of the flood, were vigorously attacked by Generals Huger and Longstreet, sent for this purpose since daylight. If this be so, there is every probability that the whole body has been captured or driven pell mell into the turbid waves of the swollen stream. Heaven grant this may prove true. I have no idea that a general battle is going on, but certainly the numbers engaged in the skirmish are large, for all day the authorities have been sending ambulances down the Williamsburg road to bring in the wounded from the combat.

The Hon. R. M. T. Hunter arrived in town to-day, and was greeted with great enthusiasm by his friends, as the apprehension had been felt that he was in the enemy's hands. Mrs. Lee, the wife of General Lee, and her daughters, are prisoners at the White House, on the Pamunkey River, having been caught there by the ascent of the guaboats past West Point.

DIXIE.

RICHMOND, June 2, 1862.

The heavy cannonade and rattling fire of musketry, heard throughout Saturday, as stated in my last letter, proved to have come from an obstinately contested and bloody battle fought within eight miles of the city. I shall endeavour to give you an account of it, such as I have been enabled to make up from the statements of intelligent officers and men who were active participants.

A very large force of the enemy, variously estimated at from 35,000 to 50,000, having crossed the Chickahominy as early as the 29th of May, had entrenched themselves at several points along the Williamsburg-road, and further strengthened their position by felling the trees in the woods, and thus making a considerable abatis. The purpose having been formed to attack and dislodge them, the divisions of Generals Hill, Longstreet, and Whiting, with a portion of General Huger's division were sent to the immediate neighbourhood of the enemy's advance position at an early hour on Saturday morning, and arrived upon the ground about ten a.m. Very soon thereafter the battle was opened with musketry, and maintained on our side most gallantly by two or three regiments of Hill's division (the 2d Florida, 6th Virginia, and 5th South Carolina) thrown out as skirmishers, their fire being hotly returned by the Yankees from the cover of the woods. This lasted for an hour or more, when the regulars of Longstreet, the same who won the day at Williamsburg, came upon the ground, and began to move upon the enemy with alacrity, though meanwhile the Federal artillery had commenced to play with sad havoc upon the open ground between the woods, concealing them and the Confederate lines. The 2nd Mississippi and 28th Georgia were the first to dash vigorously against the foe sheltered behind the fallen timber, and driving them through the woods, caused the destructive infantry fire for a time to slacken. But the Yankees retreating to their breastworks and again making a deadly use of their Enfield rifles, the 4th North Carolina was ordered forward, and little recking the murderous discharges of the enemy, succeeded in carrying the first line of earthworks, which, however, they were unable to retain, in consequence of the fearful rain of canister from the Yankee howitzers that bore upon the spot.

Falling back in excellent order, they were reinforced by fresh arrivals of Longstreet's command, and a battalion of Louisiana troops, who continued the attack supported by Latham's battery, which opened upon the Yankees with such tremendous energy that they abandoned their four brass howitzers in confusion. The valor and steady determination of our troops up to this point can only be appreciated when it is stated that their advance to the enemy's entrenchments was for a long distance through a deep bog, where the men were frequently up to their knees in the mire, and where it was well nigh impracticable that artillery could be moved at all.

A desperate fight now ensued in which victory seemed doubtful, so obstinately and bravely did the Yankees sustain their position. At length, after a furious fire given and received by the 1st Virginia (which was literally annihilated, bringing only twenty-six men out of the action) the 1th and 6th South Carolina, and the 12th Mississippi, and other regiments, supporting and strengthening their columns, the intrenchments of the Yankees were carried and all their artillery (nine pieces), together with their camp, fell into our hands. Night then closed over the scene, but not before the courage and persistency of the gallant Tennesseans had been brilliantly illustrated in another part of the field in repelling an attempted flank movement of the enemy. I regret that I cannot give you the numbers of the Tennessee regiments which achieved this noble success, following the flying Federals into the waters of the swollen Chickahominy up to the waist, amid the cheers of their companions in arms, who looked on with delight. They were commanded by the brave General Hutton, who here received his death wound.

When dusk had seen the gas lamps spurring into light throughout the city, the wounded men began to arrive in ambulances from the field, and late into the night did the streets contain excited groups of citizens, eager to hear the latest intelligence from the contest. Committees also were already at work in receiving the sufferers, and directing their removal to the places to which they were assigned.

Early on Sunday morning the whole city was astir. The fortunate individuals who could secure horses, were in the saddle after an early breakfast, and on the road for the battle-field, while hundreds, without the means of conveyance, went afoot, eager to be witnesses of, or volunteers in the conflict of the day. Random guns had been heard at sunrise, and discharges at long intervals were kept up for three or four hours, when the battle of the day previous was renewed suddenly enough, at a few minutes past nine o'clock a.m., by a murderous volley discharged by an invisible foe, into the unformed line of the 9th Virginia, Lieut.-Col. Goodwin commanding, from a dense wood in front of them. The 9th sprang quickly to their arms, and forming in order of battle, rushed upon their unseen assailants across the fallen timber of the abatis, and drove them from their covert. The 3d Alabama and 12th and 31st Virginia regiments, coming immediately to the assistance of the 9th, pressed forward upon the enemy, and from that moment until four o'clock in the afternoon the fight was a continual advance of our troops and retreat of the Yankees, until we had carried all their entrenchments, and taken the camp occupied by them the previous night, with large quantities of knapsacks, india rubber tent cloths, small arms, and overcoats, and some stores, such as coffee and lemons, &c.

Our loss in the two days fighting cannot be accurately ascertained as yet, but it will probably not exceed twelve hundred nor fall short of one thousand, in killed and wounded. We lost no prisoners, but took about 600. At least two to one of the enemy were killed, though their number of wounded will, perhaps, be less than ours. A large majority of our wounded were shot in the hands or arms, the result of a cross fire, the bullets taking effect as their pieces were at an aim. Of the casualties few names can be given which are not to be found in the Richmond papers of this morning. The lamented General Hutton I have already mentioned. Colonel Lonax, of the 3rd Alabama, was killed instantly, on Sunday morning, soon after the combat was opened. General Pettigrew, of South Carolina, fell the same day. General Joseph E. Johnston was wounded slightly on Saturday, in the shoulder. For a few days he will be disabled from the command, which will be assumed by General R. E. Lee.

Our troops fell back last night, because of the miry nature of the ground, and of the horrible stench already filling the air for a mile around the field, from the rapid decomposition of the unburied corpses under the hot sun of June. To-day it was supposed the fight would be again commenced along the whole line, but the enemy sent a flag of truce asking a suspension of hostilities for the burial of the dead, and both armies are engaged in this work of humanity.

Among the trophies captured on Saturday, were the magnificent colours of the 92nd New York, General Casey's brigade, which were sent to the Spotswood House for the inspection of Mrs. Johnston, but have since been taken to the War Department.

We have a rumour to day that the Yankees are crossing the James River below Drury's Bluff, under the protection of their gunboats, with a view of attacking our batteries from the land side, while the fleet should shell them in front. This is probably intended to make a diversion, but if it be a serious movement, we are not unprepared.

The President, the Secretary of War, General Lee, and Governor Letcher were all on the field on Sunday.

I need not undertake to describe the appearance of our city, nor the manner in which the people of Richmond have met the duties of this trying hour. All business is suspended. Every house is a hospital, and but one thought occupies the public mind—how the brave defenders of the capital, who are suffering from the enemy's well-directed fire, shall be made comfortable.

DIXIE.

MARRIAGES AND DEATHS.

MARRIED.

On April 15, in New Orleans, at the McGehee Church, by the Rev. J. B. Walker, B. A. Hoffman to Miss Kate E. Barnes, both of that city.

DIED.

On April 14, at Corinth, Miss, Asou Jerauld, eldest son of E. H. Fairchild and Mary A. Harrington, aged 18 years and 10 months.

On Tuesday, April 8, at half-past one p.m., at New Orleans, Henry W. Rayburn, a native of Tennessee, a resident of that city for fifteen years.

On Tuesday evening, April 8, at half-past four o'clock, at New Orleans, Dawson Canonge, son of B. Z. Canonge and Belzire Forstall, aged 35 years.

On Wednesday morning, April 9, at ten o'clock, at New Orleans, Mr. Hugh Fisher, a native of Edinburgh, Scotland, aged 35 years.

On Wednesday, April 9, at his residence in Casacalvo-street, between Port and St. Ferdinand streets, New Orleans, James D. Beck.

On Wednesday evening, April 8, at nine o'clock, at New Orleans, Gavino Ledda, born at the city of Sassari, Island of Sardinia, aged 40 years.

On Wednesday night, April 9, at half-past eleven o'clock, at New Orleans, John Ewing, a native of Glasgow, Scotland, aged 32 years and 6 months.

On Tuesday, April 1, at New Orleans, of typhoid pneumonia, on board steamer 35th Parallel, Lieut. George Mather Turcaud, of Scott's Cavalry Regiment, aged 23 years.

On Thursday, April 10, at one o'clock, at New Orleans, William Thelford, a native of Belfast, Ireland, and for the last twenty-years a resident of this city, aged 69 years.

On Thursday, April 10, at two p.m., at New Orleans, George S. Wilbanks, eldest son of the late G. H. Wilbanks and Janephine Guerin, aged 9 years and 2 months.

On Sunday, April 6, in the Battle of Shiloh, Delphin Coutourie, a native of the Island of Guadalupe, and member of the Orleans Guards Battalion, aged 27 years.

"A handful of dust in the land of his choice,

And a share in song and story,

'Moog names which Fame, with her brazen voice, Shouts—'Died on the field of Glory!'"

On Sunday, April 6, killed in the Battle of Shiloh, James Russell Grimshaw, son of James Grimshaw, of New Orleans, in the 19th year of his age.

On Saturday, April 5, at Clifton, parish of West Baton Rouge, Helen Eliza, only child of A. Sidney and Maria A. Robertson, aged 12 years, 1 month, and 25 days.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following extract comes to us from a highly respectable source, and for this reason we insert it, though without vouching for its correctness, concerning which we confess to grave doubts:—

NEW YORK, June 12, 1862.

Since I last wrote you, many changes have taken place; within the last three weeks we have gained three glorious victories, and I have just heard that the Monitor was taken by surprise. In a few days it will come out, but the Government will not allow any news to be published which is not favourable to them.

This news about the Monitor was told me by a gentleman who is appointed by Government to see all despatches, says it is true. I only hope so.

A great number of our men were brought here last Sunday wounded, and among the number was General Klink, from Charleston; he had his leg amputated—he died yesterday. I am doing everything in my power for our men by nursing them. Among a hundred wounded expected here is Johnson Pettigrew, A. Cochman, and Lieutenant Robertson, all of Charleston. All the women and children have been removed to the country, and we expect to hear every day of a bombardment. Some gentlemen from there, via Nassau, said the place would be burned if it could not be defended.

—, WISCONSIN, June 6, 1862.

A fortnight ago a gentleman was nearly strangled at the dinner table of our principal hotel, for merely venturing to doubt the military talents of General McClellan. About the same time a Confederate prisoner of war, suffering severely from dysentery, was taken unwell before he could get as far off as the sentry thought he ought to have gone, and, in consequence, he was abused in a most savage and brutal manner; his brother, also a prisoner, remonstrated, upon which the soldier shot him dead, and no notice was taken of it by any one. I find, to my surprise, Secession rife among the principal inhabitants here. * * * A Liverpool man (W. P.), lately in Halleck's army, at Pittsburg Landing, has returned here for his health, and reports that the mortality among the troops is frightful, amounting to hundreds and almost thousands per day.

REBO. HOPKINS, Co. Kr., May 30, 1862.

The horrors of the cruel and unholy war which one section of the Union is waging against the other, to subdue or bring it under their unnatural yoke, are not likely to be lessened by its progress; and the heart of every good man must be sickened at the thought of what is yet to come; for my part, I confess I am all the time oppressed by it, to think of the unparalleled trouble and distress, continually on the increase, which pervades our whole land. I acknowledge, my dear sir, that I am greatly troubled, but do not despair. The North, I know, is, in her resources and numerically, the stronger of the two; but the battle is not always to the strong, for the Lord, the righteous judge of all the earth, who rides upon the whirlwind and directs the storm, is, I doubt not, so guiding and directing this terrible strife as in the end to bring all things out right; and, relying as I do upon the justice of our cause amidst all the gloom which surrounds me, I have an abiding confidence that the South will at last prevail. You will soon hear better news from here; you will hear of Lincoln's earnest appeal for more help—for all to come up to their aid; as I believe I have heretofore said to you, I am very sure the last Southern man will die in the ditch sooner than surrender. I have already been sadly bereaved; the son, whom I lost so early, was to me very dear; of kind and amiable disposition, of industrious and steady habits, and upright and honourable in all his deportment; and I had looked upon him as one who would be the prop of my declining years, and had fondly hoped to have left him as the guardian and protector of the younger members of my family. Those only know how keenly I feel his loss who have suffered in the same way; but many better men than I will go down in sorrow to their graves because of this cruel, unnatural, and unholy war. Pardon me though, my dear sir, for thus giving vent to my feelings; they come up as I write, and I cannot well restrain them.

WHAT THEY THINK OF OUR WOMEN.—A correspondent of the New York Times, speaking of the letters found at Fairfax Court-house, Va., says:—"Many of the letters are from mothers and sisters. It is wonderful the energy with which these dear little rebels enter into the cause of the Confederate States. Not one appeal is there to son or brother to return home. It is, 'Fight, John! let me hear from you in the front ranks.'"

Foreign Correspondence.

SUMMARY OF CONFEDERATE OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE CAMPAIGNS IN THE WEST AND EAST DURING THE MONTHS OF FEBRUARY & MARCH.

[The subjoined letter, although long in its way and referring to events which have lost the interest of freshness, will yet repay perusal by all who desire to form an intelligent opinion of the progress of the war. It throws a clear light upon events which have never before been satisfactorily explained to the European public, and may be implicitly relied upon in all its details, both on account of the high character of the writer, and his free access to the archives of the Confederate Government, from which it is compiled.]

RICHMOND, April 5, 1862.

THE reverses to our arms at Forts Henry and Donnelson and at Roanoke Island are of course known to you, but the nature and extent of those disasters have doubtless been so exaggerated by the Northern press that a correct summary may be of use.

FORT HENRY.

Fort Henry, an open earth-work, situated on the banks of the Tennessee, mounting eleven guns, was on February 8 attacked by a fleet of the enemy's gunboats, seven in number, and mounting fifty-four guns, while their transports landed an army of 12,000 men, with a view to the capture of our small force, of less than 3000, stationed there for the defence of the batteries. The contest was at once seen to be so unequal as to leave nothing to be done but to withdraw with the least possible loss. Under these circumstances, General Tilghman, in command of the Fort, determined to hold it with some eighty men to the last moment, in order to cover the retreat of the army. This object was effected, and the forces were marched in safety across the land to Fort Donnelson, on the Cumberland River, without loss. General Tilghman, after sustaining the bombardment of the battery for several hours, and having had all his guns dismounted except four, was compelled to surrender with the few men, less than sixty in number, who remained to serve the guns.

FORT DONNELSON.

Fort Donnelson, situated on the bank of the Cumberland river, was a work of much greater importance than Fort Henry, and covered the approach to Nashville, which, as you are aware, is accessible to boats of large class at high water. General A. S. Johnston, commanding the Western Department, was fully aware of the value of this position, and lost no time, nor did he spare any effort for its defence. His whole force, however, then stationed at Bowling Green, was nominally but 30,000 men, and in effective force not more than 24,000. He had in his front General Buell, with an army of 60,000 men, while Fort Donnelson was threatened by the army of General Grant with a like number, and by the gunboat fleet of the enemy, flushed with its recent success at Fort Henry. The fall of the latter fort had already rendered imperative the abandonment of Bowling Green, as the possession by the enemy of the Tennessee River cut off the army of General Johnston from that of General Polk at Columbus, thus leaving it free to the enemy to attack either division with his entire force. Under these difficult circumstances, General Johnston sent to the aid of Fort Donnelson rather more than one half of his small army, retaining the remainder to cover the withdrawal of his stores and munitions of war, and to check the advance of General Buell, and prevent his direct march to Nashville. After four days' desperate combat, during which the enemy's gunboat fleet was greatly damaged, defeated, and driven back, the constant reinforcements of fresh troops, by which our small army was incessantly assailed, leaving them not an instant's repose, finally succeeded in reducing them to such a state of physical exhaustion that a surrender was deemed unavoidable; and although a considerable body of our men made good their escape, together with Generals Floyd and Pillow, (the two senior generals), the enemy succeeded in capturing the remainder of the force, between 6000 and 7000 in number, together with General Buckner and a large number of commissioned officers. The victory was dearly bought, as the loss of the enemy in killed, wounded, and prisoners (the latter taken in a victorious sortie) cannot have been less than 5000 men.

FALL OF NASHVILLE.

The capture of Fort Donnelson necessarily involved the fall of Nashville, which was soon after taken possession of by the enemy, who have since remained masters of the northern part of central Tennessee.

THE EVACUATION OF COLUMBUS.

These operations rendered the evacuation of Columbus a military necessity, its position on the Mississippi River being too far north to permit our shattered forces to maintain it against a land attack from the combined forces of the enemy, and the armament was accordingly withdrawn, and the evacuation conducted with entire success, while a new position was assumed at Island No. 10, situated about twenty miles above New Madrid.

CONCENTRATION AT CORINTH.

In the meantime General Johnston, reassembling and reorganizing the shattered remnants of the army of Fort Donnelson, and uniting with a small division under General Crittenden, has succeeded in accomplishing one of the most masterly movements of the war. Anticipating the enemy—who, by their enormous fleet of transports on the Cumberland and Tennessee, have the means of rapid concentration in large masses, and in opposition to the advice of all his officers—he succeeded, by a forced march across the country, in moving his forces, with all their baggage train and supplies, to Decatur, in Alabama, which he reached just in time to find himself in front of the enemy, who had endeavoured, by a rapid ascent of the Tennessee River, to place themselves between him and the army of General Polk, now commanded by General Beauregard.

This movement has united into one grand army the forces of General Johnston, the army which evacuated Columbus, now commanded by General Beauregard, and a third force of about 10,000 men under General Bragg, withdrawn from Pensacola. These, with large reinforcements from the States of Louisiana, Alabama, and Mississippi, constitute an army that cannot now number less than 80,000 men, concentrated at Corinth, Mississippi, near which point a great battle is hourly impending.

ISLAND NO. 10.

In the meantime our position at Island No. 10, fortified and reinforced, has been the object of unremitting assault from the enemy's gunboats and mortar fleet, but after fifteen days' incessant firing, accompanied with no appreciable loss to us, and considerable damage to their fleet, they seem to have abandoned in despair the effort to descend the Mississippi River by forcing the passage, and to be now awaiting the operations of the land forces.

ROANOKE ISLAND.

The fall of Roanoke Island occurred on February 8. It yielded to the combined attack of a fleet of gunboats, and an army of 10,000 men, which succeeded in effecting a landing, and forcing the capitulation of our troops, about 2500 in number. This disaster derives its importance from the basis thus afforded to the enemy (commanding, as he does, the navigation of the Pamlico and Albemarle Sounds) for concentrating forces for expeditions against the coast of North Carolina, but chiefly for an attack on Norfolk in the rear. The gathering forces of the enemy on the Peninsula in the neighbourhood of Fortress Monroe, and the strong reinforcements pouring incessantly through Hatterass Inlet, to the aid of General Burnside, indicate an intention to spare no effort for the capture of Richmond; and we are hourly in anticipation of heavy engagements in this neighbourhood.

NEWBERN AND WASHINGTON TAKEN.

The army of General Burnside, after the capture of Roanoke Island, has made two further captures, viz., the towns of Newbern and Washington, North Carolina. At the latter place there was no defence, the town being quite insignificant, the population not exceeding 1200 or 1500 souls; but at Newbern a very gallant defence was made by about 4000 men against the combined fleet and army of the enemy, and, although our forces were compelled to retreat, the loss of the enemy cannot have fallen short of 1500, while the results of the capture of the town are unimportant.

CONDITION OF PUBLIC FEELING.

It is most gratifying to observe that the series of disasters, of which I have given you an impartial narration, have had the most beneficial effect on the temper, tone, and spirit of our people. The long inaction to which we had been condemned by the inferiority of our forces had produced its usual effect on our troops. A feeling of listlessness; a growing belief that there would be little more fighting; the irksomeness of camp life when unvaried by active service; the prevalence of camp diseases; the desire to revisit home and family—all had combined to produce a state of things under which our army was wasting away, and the spirit of volunteering had almost died out. The change has been magical. Our people are alive to the magnitude of the contest. A stern and resolute spirit is manifested, far more promising than the unreflecting enthusiasm under which the volunteers first rushed to our standard. The whole people are at war with our deadly foes. Nothing is wanted but an ample supply of arms and munitions to place on foot the most formidable array of modern times. Entire confidence in the result of the contest is felt to the very core of the national heart, and you need entertain not the slightest hesitation in giving every assurance that this contest can by no possibility, and under no stress of human power, end in aught but final separation between the contending parties. The temper of Congress cannot be better evinced than by the following resolution, unanimously adopted on March 5:—

